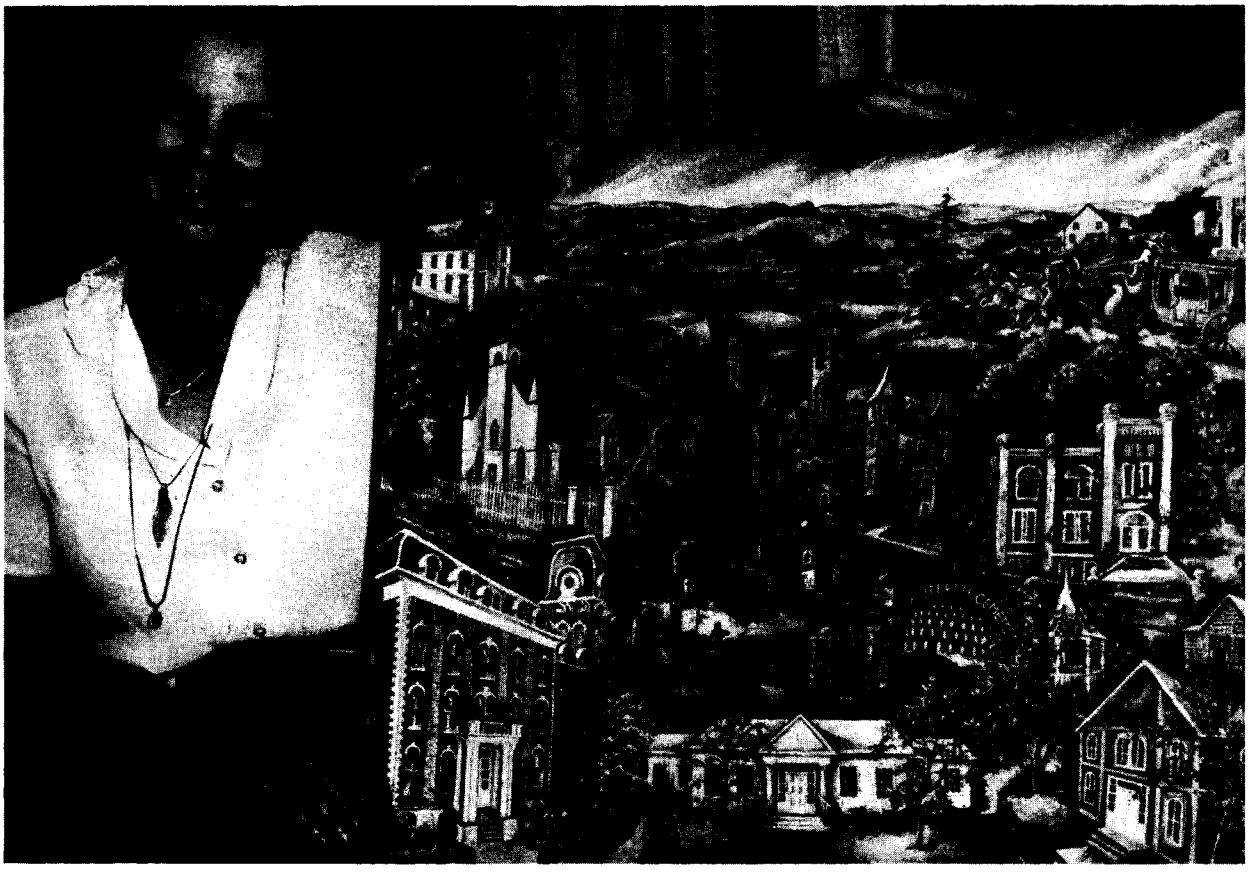
All places depicted in the painting are still standing in Washington County in 1989.



"Washington County Revisited" by Mary Anna Jones was judged the winning painting in the cover contest for the History of Washington County. The painting is a montage of 18 elements, each of which represents an historically important location or event in the county. Jones, a native of Washington County, estimates that she worked some 300 hours in research, photographing locations, sketching, and painting the winning artwork.

The artist and her husband, Robert, live in Bentonville and own the Robert L. Jones Real Estate Company. "My husband knew this painting was a real labor of love for me. He told me he would run the business, and I should just stay home and paint," Jones said.

Jones has been researching her family history for the past 18 years and has drawn from her own northwest Arkansas family heritage in creating the painting. She was born in Springdale and attended first grade in the old Springdale high school building, which is part of her painting. Her father, Nolan Helstern, moved his dental practice to Fayetteville, and there Mary Anna completed her education, graduating from the University of Arkansas with a degree in art. "Many of my art classes and labs were in Old Main, so naturally it was imperative to include that gorgeous building in the painting," Jones said.

"The painting includes an apple orchard not only because the fruit and canning industry was once the dominant industry in the county, but also because my grandfather Helstern owned and operated an apple orchard at one time, and my father sold apples by freight carload in Texas, Kansas and Oklahoma," Jones added.

"My grandfather Ruble was a Methodist circuit-riding preacher and preached at small churches throughout Washington and Benton counties, so two church buildings have been included in the painting to represent the significant role churches played in the county's development," she said.

The White River and its bluffs hold special memories for Jones. "When I was a girl, our family would go to the river on Sunday outings. While Dad fished and Mom sat in her canvas chair reading, my cousin and I would explore the bluffs and the river bank."

Jones' pioneer ancestors were caught up in the Civil War that had such a terrible impact on Washington County. "My great-grandfather, Jacob Ruble, was away commanding a Southern regiment, but his family stayed in the county and braved the horrors of the conflict," she remarked.

"Washington County Revisited" is only her second attempt at painting a montage. She said that she never really cared for that style of painting and that she usually worked with water-color. However, in this painting she considered that the use of oils was more appropriate.

Jones and her husband have two daughters, Lauriel Howard of Stillwater, Oklahoma, and Melissa Garrett of Bella Vista, and a granddaughter, Heather Garrett, age 9. The Jones' family history is included in this book.

The four runner-up entries were painted by Bonnie Holt, Jan Huff, Steve Johnson, and Mary Mitchell, all of Springdale. Mary Mitchell's picture and family story can be found in the family section of this book.

All persons living in or having previously lived in Washington County were eligible to enter the contest for the painting to be reproduced on the cover of the History of Washington County, Arkansas.

Although the winner was Mary Anna Jones, the Shiloh Museum Board of Trustees thanks all the contestants and commends Jones and the four runners-up—Bonny Holt, Janet Huff, Mary Mitchell, and Steve Johnson—for their special contributions to the pictorial history of the county.

Introduction

We began the History of Washington County in the summer of 1986. The fact that it has taken some three years to complete is due not only to unexpected delays, but also to our desire to produce a book as complete and accurate as possible. However, if errors are found, please note them in your family copy.

This is the first comprehensive history of Washington County published since 1889, when the Goodspeed Publishing Company compiled in one giant book the histories of Benton, Washington, Carroll, Madison, Crawford, Franklin, and Sebastian counties. That was a remarkable undertaking. Even today, using computer programs and laser printers, a massive book such as this requires an incredible amount of time and effort, especially as we were committed to producing a quality book with readable text and a profusion of historic photographs. Joseph C. Neal, a Fayetteville author, historian, and naturalist, was engaged to research and write the county history section. We commend him for his zeal in locating information, verifying its accuracy, and preparing an historically sound and very readable account of the county's history.

Mary Ellen Johnson of Johnson volunteered her services at the beginning of the project, was later employed as office director, and until the end of the project acted as the publisher's executive assistant. This book is evidence of her dedication and competence. The history book office staff also included Kay Hall, who proved to be exceptionally well-qualified to write, revise, and edit stories, and Audra Curtis, who was an efficient receptionist and data entry clerk.

Publicity was given to the project by local newspapers, television channels, and radio stations. County residents were informed concerning the proposed Washington County history and urged to write their family stories. The publicity also generated interest in the histories of churches, schools, organizations, and clubs around the county, some no longer in existence. A plea went out to historians and members of these institutions to submit brief histories of their founding, purposes, and goals.

Individuals and groups were urged to bring suitable photographs to illustrate their stories. The response was immediate and most rewarding. We are especially grateful to all those who allowed their photographs to be copied for use in Joe Neal's county history. We have included their names with the photographs. Our special thanks go to the Washington County Historical Society for its generosity in allowing us to use photos from its files, which proved to be a wonderful source of supply. Prints and negatives of photographs in the county history are on file in the Shiloh Museum for future reference.

To thank all those who supported this project with their enthusiasm and by gifts of their time, talent, and financial support is an impossible undertaking. Some names have surely been omitted, but the Shiloh Museum Board of Trustees is grateful to all who participated in the success of this book in any way. Among those who have helped are June Barrett, Charles Bickford, Audrea Cantrell, Bob Clark, Gayle Clizer, Norm Clizer, Theresa Eubanks, Eugene Gibson, Marie Harp, Bobbie Lynch, Jackie Mooney, Ruth Morris, Doyle Morrison, Jim Morriss, Linda Oxford, Beverly Pense, Shirley Quick, Don Schaefer, Robert Serio, Ed Smith, Buster Stewart, Julie Stewart, Ray Toler, Lloyd Warren, Muria Whittaker, Kay Yates, and David Zodrow.

The Shiloh Museum staff contributed in various ways —locating, selecting, and copying photographs and illustrations; writing and editing sections; preparing bibliographies; proofreading; typing; and computerizing parts of the book.

Maudine Sanders, past president of the Board of Trustees of Shiloh Museum, participated in every phase of the development of the book. Her editorial experience and advice were invaluable. Her enthusiasm and support were responsible for the recruitment of many of the volunteers for editing and indexing.

The History Book Committee of the Shiloh Museum (Stanley Applegate, Jean Ann Boyer, Russell Charlesworth, Dwight Heathman, Maudine Sanders, and Ann Webb) met regularly to review the progress of the book and to make necessary decisions regarding its publication.

The Springdale Chamber of Commerce members, staff, and executive secretary Lee Zachary provided constant support and promotion of the history book. Janet Edwards was especially helpful in keeping financial records.

It gives us great pleasure to present to you this history of Washington County.

Preface to County History

The written history of the area now known as Washington County dates to October 27, 1828. It was formed from Lovely Purchase lands, the remainder of which is now part of eastern Oklahoma. The historical period of the county, therefore, amounts to about 160 years.

Prior to the historical period, human beings of various cultural affinities had lived in the county for approximately 10,000 years. An even earlier period in the county's history is recorded in geological formations which have had a powerful influence on human destiny.

In compiling this book, I have consulted books and journals dealing with geology, paleontology, archeology, anthropology as well as the extensive historical literature of the past 160 years. I have tried to see the overall picture while keeping the focus as local as possible.

Journals like the Washington County Historical Society's quarterly Flashback are gold mines. I have mined nuggets from this journal and others. Books, articles, and authors are acknowledged in the text, in the bibliography, or in both. It is my intention to give the authors due credit and to provide readers with an opportunity to pursue subjects in depth.

The geological history of the county has been documented by the Arkansas Geological Commission and students and faculty of the Department of Geology, University of Arkansas, Fayetteville. Washington County is fortunate in having the headquarters of the Arkansas Archeological Survey in Fayetteville. Staff and members of the Arkansas Archeological Society and the Northwest Arkansas Archeological Society have made significant contributions to our understanding of the human beings who lived here prior to the 1820s.

My own involvement with Washington County history began in the 1950s when family trips from Fort Smith brought us to the Fayetteville-Springdale area as well as to the region's Civil War battlefields. I attended the University in the 1960s, obtaining a degree in history. Starting in 1971, I began contributing feature stories to a local weekly newspaper, the Grapevine. During the next 15 years I found my own interests tending toward local history, including natural history of the southwestern Ozarks, of which Washington County is a part.

The stimulus for working on this book dates to 1984, when Bob Besom of Shiloh Museum, Springdale, was able to provide small grants for research into local agricultural history. When combined with my own personal interests, these grants allowed me to locate and develop information for this survey. Funds obtained from the Washington County history book project permitted me to undertake the present writing.

Some individuals provided invaluable help:

Walt Manger, geologist and teacher, gave generously of his time and insight in helping develop Chapter One. Geologists are historians, too. They look at years in the millions, rather than in the hundreds.

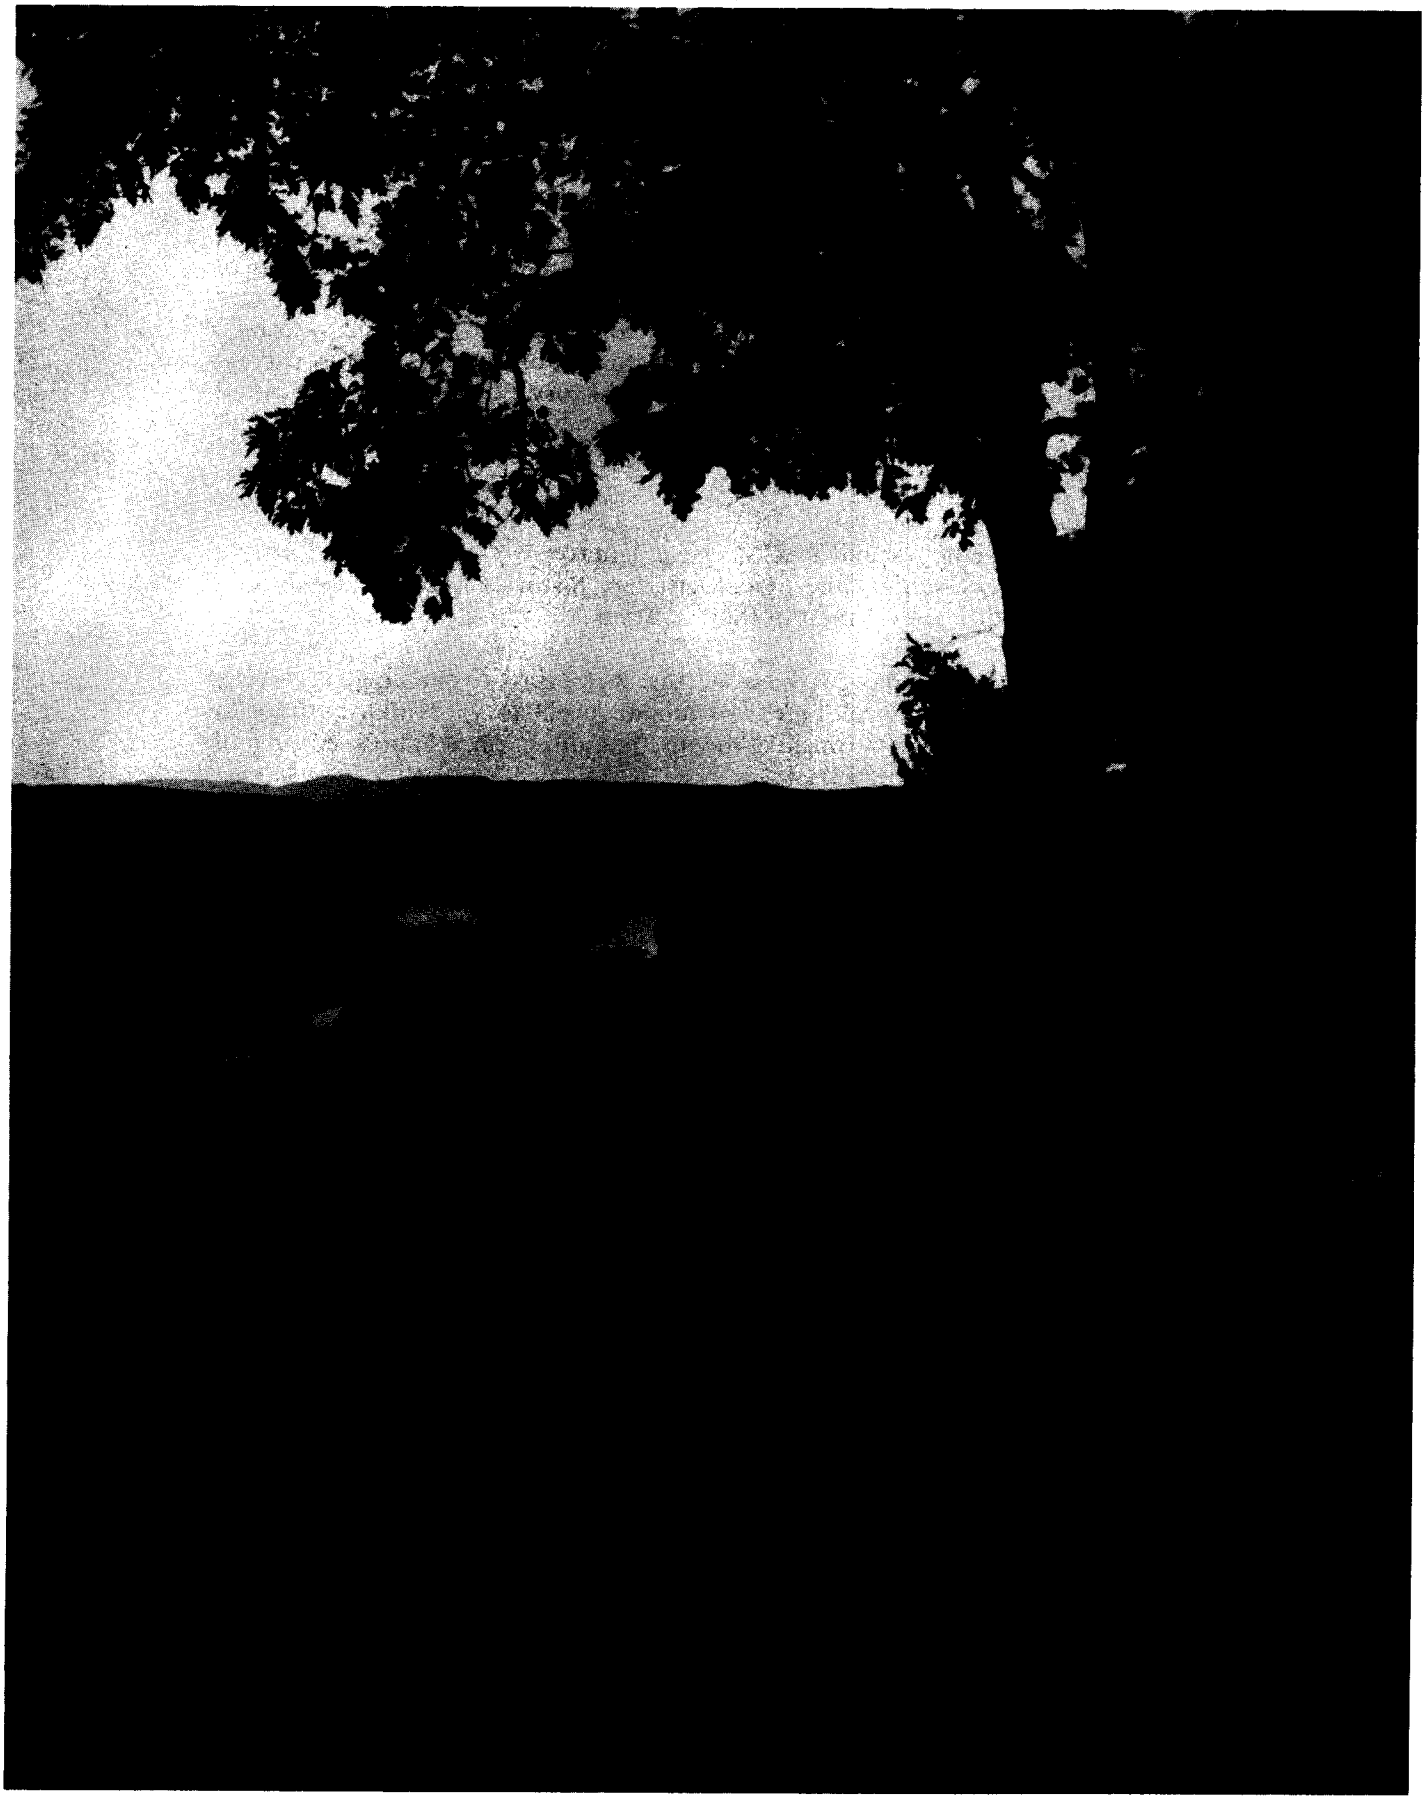
Jerry Hilliard and George Sabo of the Arkansas Archeological Survey guided me through the development of human prehistory. Hilliard's interest in the Sam Dellinger story pushed me in that direction. Sabo's editing of Chapter Two kept me on track.

The staff at Shiloh Museum, and especially my friend Bob Besom, has generously supported my investigation of pre-history and local history. Working with them on museum projects has clarified important themes. Just as the old blacksmiths bent iron into useful shapes, the museum's professional staff (Bob, Mary Parsons, Betty Bowling, Carolyn Reno, and M. K. Motherwell, who planned and laid out the illustrations for the county history) has shaped the final manuscript.

Washington County historian Bob Winn has provided articles, photographs, fossils, and especially friendship. Bob is keen on preserving the history remembered by oldtimers—personal history, told by those who lived it or who heard it from those who came before them. He generously gave permission to publish in this book a cross-section of his informative and often humorous articles which have appeared in local newspapers.

When compared to most counties in Arkansas, the wealth of written material concerning Washington County is downright embarrassing. I gratefully tip my hat to all those many people whose efforts make a history like this one possible.

—Joseph C. Neal



Chapter One

Fossil Lands, Fossil Seas

"Those who draw inspiration from reflection on the processes of creation and the discovery of evidence of the genesis of the land and its inhabitants, will not explore the deep recesses of these ancient hills without reward."

—from The High Ozarks by Neil Compton

Washington County comprises 955 square miles in the northwestern corner of Arkansas. The county lies in the southwestern section of the Ozarks, which are 40,000 square miles of uplands west of the Mississippi River and south of the Missouri River. Geologically speaking, this is an ancient land. The soils in which the county's early agricultural wealth originated are derived from the weathering of its ancient rocks. It is fitting, then, that this history of Washington County commences with the story of its rocks.

Through ages of geological time the sandstones, siltstones, and shales of the rugged terrain in the southern half of the county have contributed to soils that favored the development of hardwood forests, an early source of economic wealth. In the northern half of the county these soils also supported hardwood forests and the presence of limestone-derived soils provided a basis for the development of grasslands that supported herds of grazing buffalo and flocks of prairie chickens. Later, this limestone country was plowed for field crops that made the county an agricultural leader during the earliest years of Arkansas statehood.

Geology has so favored the county that we often grow lax in our appreciation of natural wealth so easily and bountifully received.

Copious springs were the first magnets that drew the builders of early

Oak trees grace our Ozark hills. The Boston Mountains in Washington County are a section of the Ozarks comprised of sediments deposited in ancient seas. The hilltops, once the floor of these seas, are generally level. In more recent times, streams have eroded these beds, resulting in deep valleys. (Arkansas Department of Parks and Tourism) day homes, and spring runs powered the early grist mills. The immensely plentiful sandstone provided all of the early foundations for buildings and the raw material for chimneys. Natural clays furnished materials for the county's substantial brick dwellings and public buildings. Lime sweetened the soils upon which so much depended. Hard, durable chert went into the first road beds, speeding development of transportation.

The Plateaus of Home

Those of us used to referring to the "Ozark Mountains" are surprised to learn from geologists that we actually live on plateaus. Erosion has carved this once relatively level land into rough, mountain-looking terrain.

U. S. Highway 71 transects Washington County from south to north, providing us with a view of the landforms upon which human settlement has taken place. In the south, the road enters the county atop scenic Mt. Gaylor, approximately 2,000 feet above sea level. Massive, flat-topped mountains march away in all directions, some reaching an elevation of 2,250 feet. The same mountains also comprise the scenic country in the southwestern corner of the county, in the vicinity of Dutch Mills and Evansville.

From Gaylor, the mountains slip via bench-like stairs to streams whose valleys are hundreds of feet below, often 1,100 to about 1,400 feet in elevation. This is the typical pattern of the Boston Mountains section of the Ozarks in Washington County: high, flat-topped hills below which run creeks that rise from springs (or rainfall) on the hillsides and pour through ravines that have been eroded from the hills.

The Boston Mountains hold sway at Winslow, north of Gaylor, and in the Devil's Den country west of Gaylor and Winslow. Upon reaching Brentwood, Highway 71 is running through the broad, cleared valley of the West Fork, a tributary stream that joins the White River east of Fayetteville. The elevation at Winslow is 1734 feet (old railroad station site) and 1,877 feet at the site of the old Summit Hotel. In the valley at Brentwood, the elevation is about 1,550 feet. This trend of broad valley and declining elevation is pronounced where Highway 71 enters Fayetteville, elevation 1,340 feet. Between Fayetteville and Springdale there is little change in elevation. The Boston Mountains have been largely left behind.

The White River in Washington County has cut deeply into the Paleozoic Era sandstone and limestone rock strata, leaving exposures like Walker Bluff, east of Springdale. (Roy Nixon)

Now the mountainous terrain of the Bostons has been replaced by the low, rolling country of the Springfield Plateau section of the Ozarks, only occasionally interrupted by outliers of higher elevation. Elevations are often in the range of 1,000 to 1,450 feet, and the stream courses are rarely more than 50-150 feet below this elevation.

The rugged terrain of the Boston Mountains holds sway over about one-third of the county, especially in the south-central and southeastern areas. Because of difficulties in transportation and communication and the relative paucity of good agricultural land, human population density has always been low in these areas. By contrast, since Indian times the Springfield Plateau has been highly suitable for hunting and farming. Relatively few obstacles have existed for transportation.

The observer who looks closely at the Ozarks notices similarity in the flat-topped hills of the Boston Mountains and the relatively flat country of the Springfield Plateau. Though often called "mountains," the Ozarks are actually layers of rock in relatively flat beds, one upon another like a wedding cake. For hundreds of millions of years, sediments of sand, silt,

Serpentine Rivers of Washington County

Small creeks that race down mountainsides in Washington County generally follow a relatively straight course toward the larger collector streams below. However, if you look at a Washington County map that shows larger streams like the White and Illinois Rivers you will notice that they twist and turn like the Mississippi River. What are the reasons for these differences?

The small creeks usually rise on a hillside where an underground spring emerges. This water, which is slightly acidic, is capable of dissolving limestone. Even sandstone and shale can be broken down by small amounts of water, which expands in the summer and contracts in the winter, splitting up even the hardest substances. During times of high rainfall the springs may turn into torrents capable of blasting away almost anything in its path. Finally, the forces of gravity direct the flow of the water downhill by the shortest route possible. Slowly but inexorably, the spring run cuts back into the hillside, carving a ravine. Some of these are huge, a testimony to the power of a little water over a vast period of time.

The situation for the Illinois and White Rivers is quite different. The winding form of the rivers is called an entrenched meander. It seems to have developed tens of millions of years ago when Washington County was still a lowland. The ancient rivers that carried sand into the county (which eventually became sandstone) were probably like today's Mississippi—big and sluggish, wandering across lowlands in search of the path of least resistance. As the county was slowly uplifted to elevations more like those of today, the sluggish rivers tended to remain in the twisting and turning channels, downcutting into the elevated lowland, taking the forms we see today.

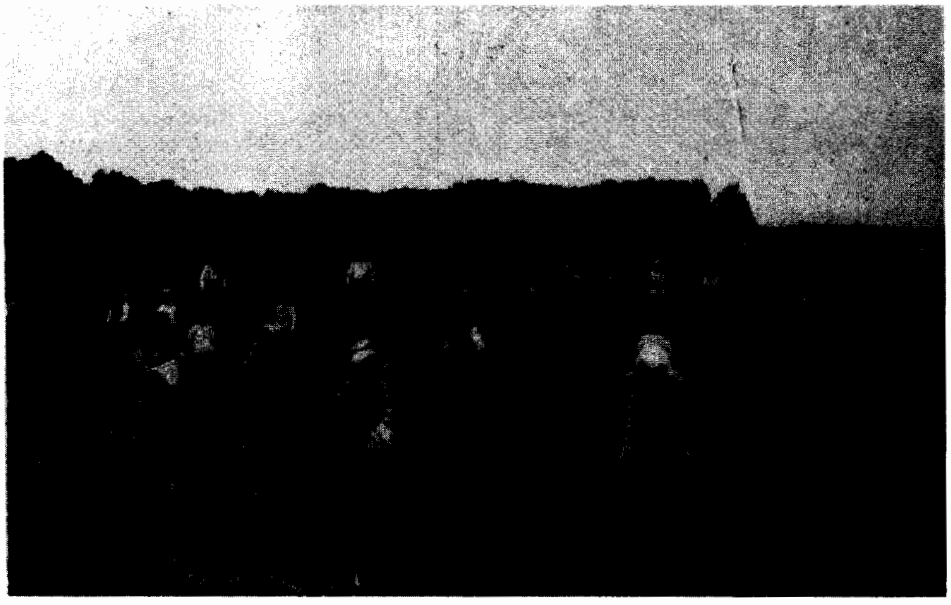
Prairies and Prairie Mounds

Prairie grasslands which are concentrated in the northern and western parts of Washington County developed on soils derived from limestones. (Limestones, of course, are in turn the result of geological processes which converted the bits and pieces of marine shells and other hard parts of marine animals into limestone.)

A geologist who visited Washington County prior to the Civil War described prairies around Fayetteville: "The vegetation. . .is nearly the same as that of the high prairies, and still shows the influence of the limestone. The shrubs are the Sumachs, the Hawthorns, the Brambles, and the Winged Elm. Some of the coarsest species of the prairie plants—the Ragweed, the Ironweed, the Basil, the Boneset—grows there in abundance. Part of the prairies are in cultivation. . ."

Tales of buffalo grazing on these prairies are cherished traditions of the early days. It is said that in 1819 Frank Pierce was stalking buffalo within the modern limits of Fayetteville when he was surprised to see Indians doing the same thing! Prairie chickens, which are totally dependent upon prairie grasslands, are mentioned in several historical accounts. Bones of these birds were found in the excavation of the Ridge House cellar at Fayetteville. The buffalo and prairie chickens disappeared early in the county's history, a result of both hunting and the plowing of these prairies. It was found that the prairie soils supported wheat, corn, and oats which were important crops in the county in the 19th century.

Our prairies have developed on the red clay soils that are characteristic of the chert and limestone of the Boone Formation. The limestone dissolves, leaving angular fragments of chert and red clay. These tight, fine-grained clay soils tend to retain water from spring rains and are therefore too wet for most trees. When the land does finally dry, it tends to inhibit the growth of vegetation except that which is specially adapted to drying conditions.



In the late 19th and early 20th centuries, the generally level terrain of the Springfield Plateau Section of the Ozarks hosted a thriving agricultural industry centered on production of fruits and vegetables. This strawberry field was near Prairie Grove. (Siloam Springs Museum) clay, and calcite were deposited in shallow seas or river deltas and were subsequently consolidated into rock. The sand became sandstone, the silt or muds were consolidated into siltstone, shales or clays, and the calcite—derived from pieces of shell and other bone-like structures of marine animals—became limestone.

The most recent of these sediments was deposited more than 200 million years ago in what is now the top layer of the Ozarks—the Boston Mountains in southern Washington County. Directly below the sediments of the Boston Mountains—sediments associated with seas of an even more ancient time—are those of the Springfield Plateau.

In summary, the southern part of the county preserves in its flat-topped hills ancient lowlands (including seabeds and river deltas) that were in relatively recent times elevated several thousand feet. Subsequently, erosion carved deeply into this elevated lowland, sculpting the mountainous appearances of the region. In the north, almost the entire Boston Mountains plateau has been removed by erosion, widely exposing the beds of sediment that constitutes the Springfield Plateau.

Early Geological Explorations

Geologists have been visiting Washington County for more than a century. The first highly detailed account was that made by Frederic W. Simonds, a special assistant to state geologist John C. Banner. Simonds' report was published in 1891. But even earlier reports were made by geologists working under D. D. Owen, who pioneered geological surveys in Arkansas. "The rocks of Washington County," Simonds wrote, "are limestones, sandstones, shales and cherts, which lie in horizonal beds. In these beds erosion has cut out gullies, gorges and valleys, narrow and broad, and has left behind many flat-topped hills and mountains. These rocks, moreover, vary much in hardness and in their ability to withstand weathering influences. When subjected to erosion, this difference gives rise to a varied topographic expression. Wherever the harder rock prevails there is usually a bench around the mountain, terminated exteriorly by a bluff, giving rise to what is known as bench and bluff topography.

"The bluffs are of limestone and sandstone, and their wasting away is very great; they are undermined, as they usually rest upon a softer rock, shale or flaggy sandstone; their overhanging masses are fissured, and broken up by frost; and vegetation—the roots of trees especially—penetrating small cracks, assists materially in wedging off large blocks. The accumulated debris of the limestone bluffs skirting the mountains. . .is remarkable, blocks of immense size having tumbled together in the greatest confusion. . .But the wasting of rocks does not cease here; the fragments themselves are in the process of decay, and ultimately the material which constitutes them will be borne away. . .The material deposited in the valleys forms the alluvium of the bottoms. . ."

Reports from before the Civil War, published by D. D. Owen in the 1850s and the early 1860s, recorded favorable impressions about the fertility of the soils. The report for the years 1859-1860 included information about beds of coal and a soil called the "red upland" which formed prairies. This was considered "the most fertile soil of this division. . .easily penetrated by the roots of the trees, and easily decomposed by atmospheric action, it makes an excellent ground for the growth of the trees, and consequently for the culture of fruit trees. . .nearly every plantation on the red-upland is surrounded by a fine orchard of peach and apple trees. Most of the too extensive flat lands of this division are Mounds roughly 30 to 60 feet in diameter and two to four feet in height have developed in many places in the county where these Boone soils are present. These mounds are often scattered randomly across open grasslands, but oak forests have also developed on them. In the past people have speculated that the mounds were the work of Indians, who supposedly set their tepees on them. James H. Quinn, the late head of the Department of Geology, University of Arkansas, showed that the mounds were actually the result of natural forces.

The process that resulted in the formation of mounds in the county is still taking place elsewhere. According to Quinn, "the mounds are built by a weed or other plant getting started, its branches slowing the wind, and causing deposition of its load of sand which then forms a more favorable place for rainfall penetration and more plants. Thus the mound grows." This occurs in areas with rainfall of less than 10 inches annually, less than a quarter of the average annual rainfall in modern Washington County. "The material composting the mounds probably was derived under conditions similar to those of 1934-35 when great dust storms removed from the High Plains vast quantities prairies, which, underlain as they are by impermeable beds of shales or of fine clay, are generally marshy. Their soil is too strong, hard, cold, acid, and scarcely cultivated. In Washington County only some of these prairies underlain by red shales have a soil more permeable to water and are partly cultivated. . ."

However, at least some of this soil was considered potentially rich. In the report for 1857-1858, Owen noted that certain soil types of neighboring Benton County appeared "to be well adapted for wheat, having a substratum of red clay, which, no doubt, will be found to have fertilizing effects, the productiveness of the surface-soil, by judicious management, need not be materially impaired, even by continuous culture." What was said about Benton County applied as well to northern and western Washington County. It was not long after this report that wheat became an important crop in Washington County.

In the days before reservoirs like Beaver Lake and the introduction of municipal water systems capable of delivering a reliable supply of clean water to homes, the natural flows of springs were considered a precious resource. Perennial flows from the larger springs could power mills. Therefore, the geologists who surveyed the county listed springs along with other resources like soils, coal, and precious metals.

The geological report for 1857-1858 stated that "one of the most interesting features of the northern part of Washington County consists in the noble springs, which gush forth amongst the ledges of limestone, in such volume and force as to afford water-powers for small mills, even at their very source. The Elm springs, forming the head of one of the branches of the Clear Fork of the Illinois river, are one of the most remarkable of these springs. They are, no doubt, due to the fissured and cavernous of earth material which was deposited over the eastern portion of the United States," Quinn wrote.

Unfortunately, the buffalo and prairie chickens of pioneer days are gone. Many prairie mounds have been plowed away, along with most of the native prairie vegetation. Where there has been little or no plowing, mounds remain. Here and there we can still find patches of the native prairie flowers, reminders of what this country was like in the past.

nature of the barren limestone, reposing on its underlying impermeable shale. Atmospheric water, filtering with facility through the cavities and rents of the limestone, is arrested by the impervious shale beneath, and flows out along the slope of the southerly dip. Besides affording convenient and permanent water powers, these springs, no doubt, contribute greatly to the fertility of the lands in the adjacent valleys, not alone by their irrigating effects, but by reason of the large amount of carbonic acid and lime with which they are charged, which must, undoubtedly, give a remarkable impetous to vegetation, since they are two of the most essential fertilizers in all manures. . ."

The science of geology has grown tremendously in the century since the first county reports were prepared. Today we know in some detail how the land called Washington County developed over a period of a billion years into an environmental setting which by 1980 was supporting a human population of over 100,000.

Deep Down in the Ozark Dome

To get at the roots of this story we must go back to a much earlier time in the earth's history. There is a billion-year-old "basement" far below the surface we walk on today. How deep is this basement? A well drilled one and one-half miles south of Prairie Grove hit it 2,485 feet down. At this point the drillers reached a red granitic arkose identified as Pre-Cambrian granite, that is, granites from rocks formed over one billion years ago! In order to know more about this basement, many more deep wells will have to be drilled—an unlikely prospect in Washington County. However, we can infer certain aspects of our own basement by looking at the results of drilling and analysis of deep wells in neighboring northeastern Oklahoma. We can also consider what Missouri geologists have discovered about the basement rocks in the region of the Ozarks where they have conducted research.

Washington County borders ancient basement rocks in Oklahoma that have been dated to about 1.3 billion years ago. These rocks are classified as complexes of granite and rhyolite typical of ancient basement rocks that have been found throughout the southern continental interior of the United States. "Rhyolite porphyries and their equivalent tuffs are by far the most common and widespread rock type," according to Basement Rocks In Northeastern Oklahoma by Rodger E. Denison. The rocks were extruded as magmas or molten rock. This extrusion seems to have occurred over a relatively short period of time. Even older rocks are present in the same areas, but it is not clear where these older rocks came from.

The lack of deep wells in Washington County makes it difficult to say what our basement looks like, but in Oklahoma the deep underground topographic relief, which is the difference between peaks and valleys, exceeds 1,500 feet in a single township. There may be an ancient mountain range buried below us!

Viewed on a grand geologic scale, the entire region of the Ozarks is a dome. The top of the dome is located in the St. Francois Mountains of southeastern Missouri. From this point, the dome dips away in all directions, including southwest toward Washington County, Arkansas. The granitic rocks exposed on the surface of the St. Francois Mountains are kin to the "red granitic arkose" found buried deeply below the surface of Prairie Grove. Because of the downward dip of the Ozark Dome, a person standing upon an outcrop of billion-year-old rocks in southeastern Missouri who desired to find similar rocks in Washington County, Arkansas, would have to dig over 2,000 feet in the Prairie Grove area and presumably reach similar depths elsewhere in the county.

Writing in 1961, geological investigators in Missouri stated that the "igneous rocks of the St. Francois Mountains are composed of a thick series of extrusive felsitic flows which are intruded by a granitic batholith with its associated intrusive masses of felsitic rocks. . ." The rocks of northeastern Oklahoma and those of the St. Francois Mountains are of similar age, with the exposed knobs of the St. Francois Mountains being a bit older, at approximately 1.4 billion years since the rocks were molten.

Paleozoic Era

The igneous rocks of our basement testify to ancient conditions in the Ozarks. After the close of the volcanic activity, there passed a vast period of time, perhaps as much as 500 million years, in which the igneous rocks underwent erosion. Geologists refer to both the period of volcanic activity and the subsequent age of erosion as the Precambrian Period. At the end of the Precambrian it appears that much of the volcanic material was eroded away. Only the knobs of the St. Francois Mountains persisted as evidence of an ancient time.

At the close of the Precambrian, approximately 570 million years ago, vast changes came to Washington County and to the Ozarks as a whole. The period of erosion came to an end, and the land that had been reduced by erosion to a lowland was next subjected to invasions by oceans. For the next 300 million years seas alternately advanced and retreated from the lowlands of Washington County. Sandstones, clays, shales, and limestones were deposited and eventually consolidated into rocks. There were several cycles of erosion, deposition, and consolidation into rock. The land surface we know today in the county was part of the ancient seabeds of this time.

Geologists have named this the Paleozoic Era, a time in which seas periodically invaded the land. Residents of Washington County who would like to hold in their hands the evidence of igneous rocks of Precambrian time far below the surface are bound to be disappointed. However, evidence of the Paleozoic seas is abundant throughout the county. Consider the following examples.

If you are out driving in the northern part of the county, make a brief stop anywhere you see red dirt and light colored rocks in a field, a roadside ditch, or a quarry. Likely as not you will soon pick up rocks with fossil impressions. There may be penny-like disks of crinoids, fan-like impressions of colonial animals called bryozoans, seashell-like fossils of brachiopods, or fragments of corals. All are evidence of marine animals, creatures that lived in seas that once covered the county. Visit an area with exposed slabs or bluffs of limestone. Limestone in the county is often crowded with fossils.

Next, make an outing to a spot where there are exposures of sandstone, either in bluffs along the road or in creek bottoms exposed when water levels are low. You won't look long before discovering slabs of sandstone, some with unmistakeable ripple marks. If you look at the surface of the rock with a ten power (10X) magnifying glass, you can see grains of sand. These will look a lot like the sand you can collect today if you go walking on a sandbar or gravel bar of the White or Illinois Rivers in the county. Ripple marks are as common today as they were in ancient times.

Geologists have subdivided the Paleozoic into a series of periods that reflect substantial changes in the earth's geological history. These changes are also apparent in Washington County. Sediments associated with these periods accumulated in seas and were subsequently deposited and transformed into beds of rock totaling 2,000 to 3,000 feet in thickness upon the ancient eroded surface of the deeply buried basement rocks.

Rocks exposed in Washington County are from the Devonian, Mississippian, and Pennsylvanian Periods. The deposition of these rocks was influenced by the climate. Research suggests that the earth's equator has shifted considerably through geological time. During the Mississippian and Pennsylvanian Periods, for example, the earth's equator may have passed a few hundred miles north of modern day Washington County, rather than far to the south as it does today. Washington County often had a tropical climate, perhaps like the climate that exists today in the Bahama Islands. Soils vital to the county's agricultural wealth are largely derived from deposits in marine environments. Precious freshwater springs, around which early settlements formed, poured from beds of rock laid down in salt water or in giant river deltas.

The oldest rocks in the county that are exposed on the surface are from the Chattanooga Shale formation deposited in the Devonian Period (405 to 345 million years ago). These shales can be seen as outcrops scattered in the western half of the county, in road cuts, and in the lower sections of bluffs above streams. Shale is a common rock type in the county, appearing in several different formations. The Chattanooga Shale outcrops below the cherty limestone of the Boone Formation (see below).

Life Stories of a Few Common Fossils

Fossils are much more than just some old rock. Actually, they form the pages of an ancient book. With the help of scientists who study fossils, we can begin to read these rock pages and understand more about the ancient geological history of Washington County.

Fenestellid or lacy bryozoans form one of these important pages. These fan-shaped fossils can be found almost anywhere in the rock exposures of Washington County. The fossils are usually two inches or less in length. The preserved shape is the limy skeleton of a colony of coral-like animals called bryozoans that usually lived in shallow marine waters and were often associated with reefs. The oblong chambers that constitute the "fan" provided support for the soft bodies of numerous tiny animals. The individual animals had tentacles, a mouth, and digestive system. The tentacles created water currents that swept particles of food into the mouth.

Lacy Bryzoan

Relatives of these fossil bryozoans live today in aquatic environments, usually oceans. One species of freshwater bryozoan still lives in Washington County. The jelly-like masses of the colonies can be found attached to underwater objects like sticks at Lake Sequoyah near Fayetteville.

One of the great joys of living in Washington County is walking along a quiet stream. Here the wonders of nature are gorgeously displayed. In some places we find the hard shells of freshwater mussels or clams that live in the streams. When we come to a gravel bar, especially in the northern part of the county, we may also find fossil impressions of seashells from ancient times when the Boone Formation was being deposited. These fossils are also common in almost every type of rock formation here, including shales and limestones. Sometimes they are far and away the most common fossil found.

We think of seashells as clams, but the fossils we usually find in the county are brachiopods, a marine animal whose protective shell looks superficially like that of a clam. Numerous species of brachiopod fossils have been found in the county. Some are small, not much more than a half inch across, others as much as several inches in size. These fossils are often molds or casts of the animal that formed after death when it was buried in sediments like lime mud or silt on the floor of the sea.

Brachiopod

Most brachiopods lived attached to the floor of the sea by a fleshy stalk and some burrowed down into the mud of the sea floor. They fed in a manner similar to the bryozoans. The brachipod opened its shell and extended cilia-like tentacles to bring tiny particles of food to the mouth. In ancient times they must have been among the more abundant animals living in the clear, warm, shallow seas that covered Washington County. Worldwide, 30,000 species of fossil brachipods have been identified by scientists; approximately 200 species still live in modern seas. Individual brachiopod fossils are often found, but some rock strata in the county are composed almost entirely of brachiopods in aggregated masses suggestive of the banks where some modern shelled animals (like oysters) live.

Crinoids or sea lilies are also common fossils in Washington

Mississippian and Pennsylvanian Periods

Most rocks seen in the county, however, are younger in age. These rocks are associated with the Mississippian and Pennsylvanian Periods. In terms of rocks visible on the surface, it is easy enough to divide the Mississippian and Pennsylvanian Periods in the county. Remember that the Ozarks are made up of a series of nearly level horizonal surfaces or plateaus like a wedding cake, with the youngest or most recently deposited rocks at the top of the cake. The top of the cake (and therefore the land with the highest elevation) is the Boston Mountains in the south part of Washington County. The flat-topped hills visible from U. S. Highway 71 in the southern part of the county represent the top of the cake. These hills are capped by sandstones and shales laid down in seas or deposited in river deltas during the Pennsylvanian Period.

In the northern part of the county, however, erosion has removed almost this entire layer. The next layer down, which is of an older time, is the Springfield Plateau. The Springfield dominates the surface in the northern part of the county. In general, it is nearly as flat as the flat-topped hills in the south. The sediments that form the Springfield were deposited in Mississippian Period seas and thereafter transformed into the limestones and cherts now common in the northern part of the county.

Geologists date the Mississippian and Pennsylvanian Periods between 345 and 280 million years before the present. Roughly speaking, the Mississippian Period occupied the first half or earliest part of this time and the Pennsylvanian followed. Most geologists now refer to these two periods under the single name Carboniferous. This name was originally used in reference to the rock strata in England where coal was discovered. It is appropriate because the formation of coal involves reducing the complexities of living plants to the essential elements of carbon.

This geological history is part of the heritage of every citizen in Washington County—soils for agriculture, freshwater springs and streams, clays for bricks, lime for fertilizer, coal and trees for fuels, natural beauty of the land for recreation, and the wild plants and animals. One need not be a professional geologist in order to appreciate our geological heritage.

In the northwestern corner of the county, Habberton Road connects Highway 45 east of Fayetteville to Highway 68 (412) east of Springdale near Sonora. There are pastures with a scattering of farm houses along this road. Here as in many other places in the county, red soil is exposed along the road. At the White River, bluffs rise 100 to 200 feet above the water. These bluffs are formed from limestone and chert (sometimes locally called flint) derived from sediments deposited in the Mississippian Period. Red soils in this area are typically derived from decomposition of this limestone. But you don't need to drive this road to see such rocks.

Shoppers headed for the Northwest Arkansas Mall between Springdale and Fayetteville pass several places where the hillsides have been excavated for the roadway, exposing pages from a truly ancient "book" of rock strata: red soil, grayish limestone, and light-colored chert. There are numerous similar exposures along Highway 68 (412) in the western part of the county.

We don't see magnificent bluffs in all parts of the county, but chert and cherty soils provide plenty of evidence of ancient times here. The bluff-forming limestone weathers away. By contrast, chert is resistant to weathering and so durable the Indians frequently used it as the raw material for their tools. Thus, even though the ancient deposits of County. Large eroded chunks of chert are sometimes composed almost entirely of these fossils. In other places in the county the erosion of limestone sometimes reveals huge numbers of crinoid fragments—so many that it's hard to imagine anything else lived in these seas. In life the animal looked something like a flower, with roots for attachment, a long stalk composed of penny-like discs or columnals, and a crown with petal-like arms. Upon death the body parts became disarticulated and were spread by currents across the ocean floor. The fossils are frequently small, round discs found separately or joined together in columns of two or more discs. Impressions of columnals are also common. Less frequently, pieces of the plates, arms, and other parts of the head or crown are found. Entire crowns are rare in our local fossil record.

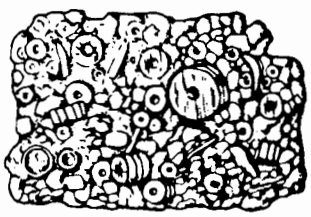
Sea lilies are echinoderms, an animal phylum which includes star fish, sea urchins, and sea cucumbers as well as crinoids. Echinoderms possess an internal skeleton composed of numerous calcareous plates in the body wall. The calcite, or calcium carbonate, in these plates is an important component of our local limestones, including limestones of the Boone Formation. Similar materials are also found in the bryozoans and brachiopods, and these contribute as well to the formation of limestones.



Crinoids

Enormous colonies of sea lilies lived on the ocean floor during the long ages when Washington County was under a sea. The animals came in many colors. We can imagine that 300 million years ago the warm, shallow, tropical seas were filled with masses of sea lilies swaying in the ocean water. Of course there was also a rich fauna of marine animals one would expect to find in modern tropical seas. Nevertheless, it is difficult to imagine that hundreds of vertical feet of limestone could be derived from calcium carbonate that formed the hard parts of echinoderms and other marine animals in the ancient seas of Washington County.

limestone are eroded away, chert remains as evidence of geological history on ridges, in ravines, and as gravel bars in all the streams. In the beds of limestone and chert, the chert is hard and light gray to light brown in color, but when it is exposed to weathering—in a field or stream, for example—the chert becomes even lighter colored, porous, and surprisingly light in weight. The association of cherty soils and ancient rocks is readily visible throughout the northern part of the county.

The cherty limestone is called the Boone Formation, named for similar exposures in Boone County. The formation is 300 to 400 feet thick thoughout northwest Arkansas. Outcrops of the Boone are seen in southern Missouri, northeastern Oklahoma, and in northern Arkanasas as far east as Independence County. A well drilled at Winslow encountered 355 feet of the Boone Formation.

Boone Formation

How do red soils come from limestone and chert, neither of which is red? According to Dr. Walter Manger of the University of Arkansas Department of Geology, "The Boone Formation weathers to a distinctive bright red, chert-bearing regolith (soils and other materials above the bedrock). The origin of the red color is unclear, but presumably it is related to oxidation of iron associated with the cherty limestone. . ."

These red soils have long been considered important to the wealth of the county. In his treatise on the geology of the county, Frederic Simonds stated, "With the exception of a strip along the water courses, broken by numerous gulches and ravines, and covered with flinty debris, it furnishes a very fertile soil, notwithstanding the occurrence of cherty fragments in comparatively level areas. Upon it corn and the various grains grow with the greatest perfection. In some localities where the solid rock approaches the surface, the crops suffer from drouth in dry seasons, and from too much moisture in wet seasons. In some localities, too, the finer products of decomposition have been washed out, yet even here, there usually occurs a valuable growth of timber, especially of oak."

The Boone Formation has contributed generously to the wealth of the county. It formed a soil that in the county's early days was called the "flat woods" country. The stoniest soil was impossible to plow, but as Simonds stated, it was suitable for timber. The flat or slightly undulating surface elsewhere contained a relatively small amount of chert. The reddish soils in these areas was suitable for growth of fruit, grains like corn, oats, and wheat, plus clover and grasses.

Wealth derived from the Boone hardly ends at soils. For a number of years, Dr. Manger has taken his students to the quarry at Johnson operated by the McClinton Brothers company. This quarry, which is now closed, had for most of this century utilized both surface and underground operations in order to obtain the 300 million year old cherty limestone of the Boone Formation. Over the years the limestone was sold as a number of products, most recently as crushed rock utilized throughout northwest Arkansas. The company still operates quarries at West Fork in Washington County, Avoca in Benton County, and Huntsville in Madison County. The caverns excavated in mining are still used for cold storage.

In a book prepared for use by his students, Dr. Manger has written, "Production of the various sizes of crushed rock is reasonably simple. The bedrock is broken from a ledge by means of explosives and hauled by truck to the crusher. The rock passes through a jaw crusher and then

Washington County Lime Sweetens the Soil

In 1924, Dr. N. F. Drake, a geologist with the state Bureau of Mines, Manufactures, and Agriculture published information about the Ozark White Lime Company of Johnson in "Mineral Fertilizers in Arkansas." According to Dr. Drake, the company "operates three kilns that have a capacity of about 12 tons per day each. . .This company sells refuse lime for farm use at $1.50 per wagon load and considerable quantities of that lime have been used locally. . ."

Lime was also available from Mr. I. D. McConnell of Prairie Grove, who had a portable rock pulverizer which he worked in various locations in the south part of the county. He charged $3.00 per ton for crushing rock in 1924.

The lime was important to farmers because it "sweetened" the soil. According to Dr. Drake, "most plants do not thrive well in acid soils and the acid condition may readily be corrected by the application of lime. Moreover, bacteria destructive to nitrates thrive in acid soils, so liming prevents the destruction of nitrates; furthermore, lime fosters nitrate production by making the soil is carried by conveyor belts through a series of different size screens which separate the various rock sizes. . .The finer sizes are used for road base, concrete pads, fill, and agricultural lime. Intermediate sizes serve for road metal. Some of the rock is mixed with asphalt to produce a variety of hot and cold surfaces for roads, driveways, parking lots, etc. The larger sizes are used for filter systems, particularly with septic lines. . ."

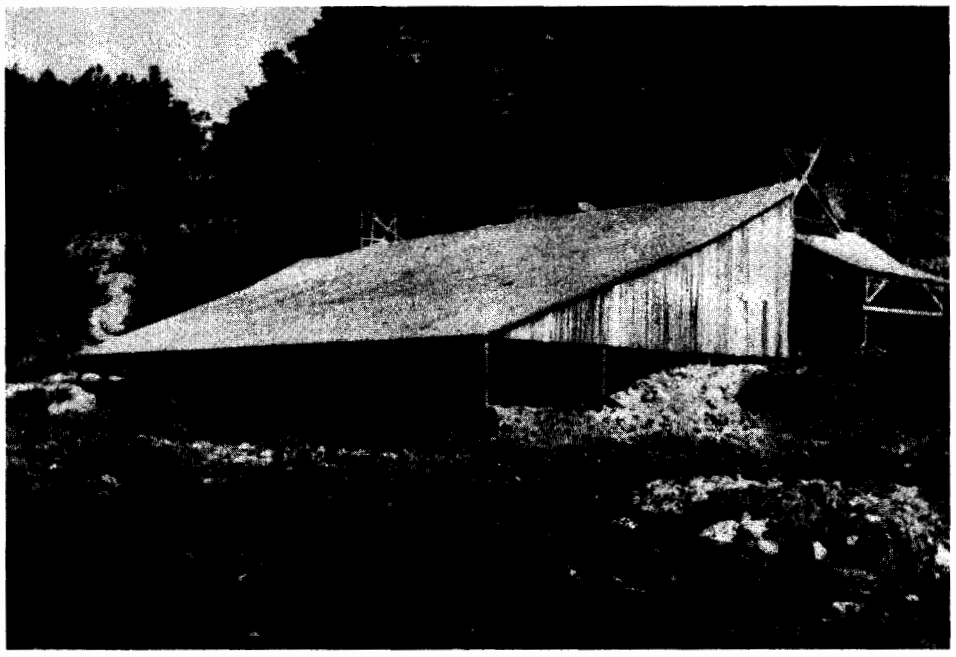
There is a long history of limestone quarrying and production of lime in the county, especially in the Johnson area where there are easily accessible limestone outcrops adjacent to the railroad tracks. In his Geology of Washington County (1891), Simonds reported on some of the economics of geology. "Four miles north of Fayetteville and directly on the line of the St. Louis and San Francisco Railway. . .limestone of the Boone chert formation is extensively quarried for burning lime." He also reported that a quarry had been operated near Mt. Comfort and that in 16 N., 31 W., section 1, a small quantity of this limestone had been taken out along the banks of Hamstring Creek. At the time of his report, Simonds stated that the only active operation was at Johnson (four miles north of Fayetteville).

Ozark White Lime Company

The versatile limestone of the Johnson area also found its way into the classic of local history, William Campbell's One Hundred Years of Fayetteville.

According to Campbell, in 1897 the Crescent White Lime Company purchased land on Clear Creek north of Fayetteville (possibly absorbing at that time the operation mentioned by Simonds). In 1902 the company



Limestone is a common rock in Washington County that has contributed to economic development in numerous ways. The Ozark White Lime Company at Johnson sold lime and limestone used in both agriculture and construction. (Phillip Steele) became Ozark White Lime, capitalized at $100,000. At this time Ozark White Lime absorbed the plant formerly operated as Springdale Lime Company, also in the Johnson area. "All their activities are centered at the Clear Creek plant two miles west of Johnson," wrote Campbell, "where they have the highest grade lime rock deposit in the United States, and one of the most spectacular and interesting industries in all north Arkansas. They have a plant that will manufacture every known quality of lime used by the trade and arts using that commodity, with a capacity of 700 barrels daily."

Limestones also figured early in road building efforts in the county. In his 1928 book, Campbell mentioned a quarry "at the north end of Willow Street" in Fayetteville which provided so much rock that "it floored at least fifteen miles of our paving." Another 1928 publication, "Road Making Materials of Arkansas" (published as University of Arkansas Bulletin 22) by W. R. Spenser, listed the Anderson Stone Company that was operating a plant two miles northeast of Fayetteville on the Goshen Road (now Highway 45) and another at Johnson. Anderson sold limestone screenings and graded crushed limestone.

The Boone limestone and chert holds another type of wealth: fossils—fan-like bryozoans, the penny-like disks of crinoids, the clam-like valves of the brachipods, and others. The relatives of many of these ancient animals still live in tropical seas elsewhere in the world. The fossils tell us about life forms during the Mississippian Period, roughly 345 to 310 million years ago, when the 300 to 400 feet of sediments that constitutes the Boone Formation were accumulating. The limestone often shows evidences of marine animals which upon death drifted to the sea floor. Later these remains were consolidated into limestone.

As mentioned earlier, the Boone consists of alternating beds of chert neutral or alkaline, which condition is favorable for the life and activity of nitrate-producing bacteria, especially those forms that live on the roots of clover, alfalfa, beans, peas and other leguminous plants. . ." etc.

The people who produced lime were proud of what they added to the county. "We wrest our living from the earth just as the pioneers of all ages have and just as the farmers of today do," stated an ad for Ozark White Lime, published in the Northwest Arkansas Times of March 14, 1940. "We convert the rawest of raw materials into a useful building material. We create wealth. . .we ship by train and truck all over this country and the name and fame of OZARK WHITE LIME has spread far and wide. We employ our own home people and the fruits of their labor come back to this community from all over the country. We know we are an asset to this region and we appreciate the opportunity Mother Nature has afforded us here in the Ozarks."

The Stone and the Mule

The Van Hoose scrapbook at the Fayetteville Public Library is a compilation of journalistic writings of the pioneer citizen, J. H. Van Hoose. One of his stories was published in the "Washington County Review," dated February 8, 1894.

According to Van Hoose, in the days after the Civil War a pyramid shaped sandstone block weighing about 300 pounds was often used as a hitching post. One day a country mule did the impossible: it dragged the hitching stone away! "The crowds of boys yelled and cheered the mule as he slowly walked backward with eyes dilated and ears set forward intently gazing at that large stone slowly creeping through the mud. . .

"This stone has a history," Van Hoose explained to his county readers. "It has been a familiar object, standing near the sidewalk on the west side of the square during the last 32 years. Prior to the war it had served as the base of one of the columns that supported the east porch or awning of Hodge's two story brick building which was erected in 1854 on the lot now occupied by Mrs. Young's brick building. . .There were two of these stones, and they were cut and dressed by A. K. Chandler, a stone cutter who did most of the nice work. . .in Fayetteville before the war. . .In and limestone. The cause of the deposition of alternating beds was long an enigma. One theory held that the sediments may have been deposited in a cool sea whose slight alkalinity (perhaps in the range of pH 7.8) would have been sufficient to allow alternate depositions of limestone and chert. Now it is known that chert formation is a secondary process that occurred after the deposition of the limestone in beds. The process is called silicification, which refers to the fine-grained quartz (silica) that filled pores in the original limestone, radically changing its character. According to Dr. Manger, "Silicification proceeds from the bedding planes towards the centers of the beds giving the outcrops the appearance of being interbedded chert and limestone."

At the end of the period in which the Boone Formation sediments were deposited, the seas withdrew, exposing the land to forces of erosion. This erosion can be traced along the top of the Boone deposits. The Boone surface was possibly subjected to leaching under hot humid land conditions. It was certainly reduced by erosion prior to the deposition of sediments in later seas.

Remember that geologically speaking, rock strata in the Ozarks are something like a layered cake. Ages of erosion have removed all or part of the upper (and therefore more recently deposited) layers revealing the layers below. As we move south through the county, we successively encounter rock strata that have not yet been removed by erosion. That is, we move from the Boone Formation upwards through formations that were deposited closer and closer to our own times.

In northern Washington County, erosion has revealed the Boone Formation, but further south the Boone is covered by other deposits. In his 1891 report Simonds described the Batesville Formation (which he called the Wyman Sandstone) that he found atop the Boone across the northern regions of the county. He saw exposures "along the banks of the White River, four and a half miles east of Fayetteville, and. . .in the vicinity of Wyman school house. . ." and elsewhere. "Its thickness is from two to three feet," he wrote. "It is rather soft, and on a weathered surface is of a yellowish brown color." A quarry had been opened at Fayetteville. Though the thickness of the rock was only three feet, "it breaks into layers of convenient thickness for building purposes." This formation may be the original material for many buildings constructed in the northern part of the county at this time. The formation gets thicker to the east.

Fayetteville Formations

The Batesville Sandstone is a relatively minor formation, especially when compared to what was deposited on top of it, the Fayetteville Formation or Fayetteville shale widely exposed in the Fayetteville area. The Fayetteville shale has been identified in outcrops 225 miles wide from east to west, from Independence County in the east into Oklahoma in the west. North to south the outcrops are about 80 miles wide, covering the northern slopes of the Boston Mountains section of the Ozarks. The shale ranges in thickness from 10 to 400 feet, with the greatest thickness in the south. When freshly exposed it is gray-black and easily split, at times actually crumbly. The fine particles that constitute the shale weather into a sticky clay that is reddish and yellowish.

Between Durham and Elkins in the southeastern part of the county, the bed and lower banks of the White River are composed of Fayetteville shale. Upper Lee Creek in the Devil's Den area cuts into the Fayetteville shale. It appears at Cane Hill and in Wedington Gap. In the Fayetteville

February 1862 this brick building and every other building that fronted on the public square were burned, and in the winter of 1863-1864 all the brick and stone that remained in the walls or foundations of the buildings. . .were used by the Federal soldiers, then stationed here, to build chimneys to their winter quarters or to build up walls in the fortifications to protect them from the bullets and shells that were frequently fired at them by the Confederates from the hills east, west, and north of the town.

"The stone of which I write was not fitted for any place in these chimneys as it was neither square or oblong, so it was allowed to remain where it formerly stood, and although it had had some hard knocks, it yet retained its position by the sidewalk until the afternoon in question, when it was forcibly removed and dragged more than 50 feet through the muddy street by that country mule.

"This stone is the only one to be seen near the public square which formed any part of the many business houses which surrounded the public square in ante bellum days, when Fayetteville was a flourishing town, its inhabitants prosperous, happy and contented."

Faults, Collapses, and Crevices

There is a great fault or fracturing that goes right through Washington County. Geologists refer to this as the Price Mountain fault or the Fayetteville Fault. (Price Mountain is near Sonora east of Springdale). A fracture or some other fundamental movement deep within the earth seems to have caused hundreds of feet of vertical movement of surface rocks in the county.

As in the sudden movement caused by an earthquake, this movement split the rock strata, forcing one side up higher than the other; that is, older rocks deep within the earth were brought in direct contact with younger rocks that were once above them. At Sonora, vertical displacements of rock strata ranging from 20 feet to over 300 feet have been measured. In the Greenland-Prairie Grove area displacements of as much as 250 feet are known. Within the city limits of Fayetteville the displacements are much less, infrequently over 50 feet.

The displacement is apparent in the railroad cut at Fayetteville between Lafayette and Maple Streets. Here in the early 1880s, the cut for the rails was made in the dark beds of Fayetteville Formation shale. Within the cut there was a place where light-colored limestone surprisingly butted directly into the dark shale! Clearly the rock strata had shifted, with the dark shale here brought upwards into contact with the overlying limestone.

The fault has been traced from the Fort Smith area toward the northeast, all the way across Washington County to the Arkansas-Missouri line. Other minor faults are also seen in the county. An interesting one at Devil's Den State Park has pushed Mississippian Period rocks up into contact with younger rocks in the valley of Lee Creek.

Along the line of the Fayetteville Fault geologists have noted a series of pronounced depressions which have been called subsidence or collapse structures. James H. Quinn of the University of Arkansas's Department of Geology theorized that groundwater had eroded massive caverns into the limestone strata below the surface which eventually area it is widespread in the beds of several tributaries and in the main section of the White River. In the 1880s the railroad cut between Maple and Lafayette Streets in Fayetteville was partly excavated in the Fayetteville shale. (Most of the cut was made into the Cane Hill member of the Hale Formation.)

Research on the shale was conducted primarily during 1923-1925 when Carey Croneis was on the University of Arkansas Department of Geology faculty. He believed the sediments that formed the shale were muds derived from soils washed from an eroding landmass to the south. Whatever their source, these muds were deposited as sediments in a broad, shallow, calm sea apparently without strong currents or tides.

While much of the formation lacks fossils, certain areas contain a great many of them. Croneis identified 248 species in the shale, including 52 then new to science. The most numerous were brachipods with 85 species. He identified clams, bryozoans, snails, cephalopods, corals, crinoids, trilobites, sharks, and a few others. These were animals that lived primarily in shallow water.

The cephalopods are a class of animals like squids and octopuses. Cephalopods in the Fayetteville sea included nautiloids and ammonoids, relatives of the modern chambered nautilus. Squids and octopuses have suckers on their tentacles. It is believed, on the other hand, that like the modern chambered nautilus, the ancient ammonoids and nautiloids did not have these suckers on their tentacles. The ancient cephalopods had shells that were coiled or straight. With large eyes and tentacles, they had the appearance of an octopus with an attached shell. Cephalopods swam in the sea and were predators on other marine animals.

In 1977 a geology student named Royal H. Mapes found a nine foot long fossil of the straight-shelled nautiloid Rayonnoceras solidiforme in Town Branch at Fayetteville. This giant is on public display in the University of Arkansas Geology Department. Fossil nautiloids one to two feet in length are found eroding from Fayetteville shale in streambeds.

Ammonoids are now extinct. They were abundant at certain times in the Fayetteville sea. Both nautiloids and ammonoids had shells that were partitioned into chambers. The sutures that formed these partitions underwent considerable evolution in the ammonoids, ranging from relatively simple to highly convoluted forms. Tracing this change in suture form can help date different species of ammonoids as well as the sediments in which they are found. By the time of the Fayetteville sea, ammonoids had developed a distinctive suture with eight lobes that can be clearly seen on fossils. When geologists encounter species with these same goniatitic sutures in marine deposits in different places in the world, they know that the sediments were deposited in roughly the same time period and presumably under similar environmental conditions. The abundance of goniatitic ammonoids in the Fayetteville shale in Washington County makes this fossil interesting to researchers.

Fossil ammonoids are found by breaking open concretions that occur at certain levels in the shale. Concretions are compact aggregates of mineral matter formed by precipitation from water solution around a central object, like a mud ball or the shell of an ammonoid. Concretions of several types, shapes, and sizes are typical of this formation. The wagon-wheel size "turtle rocks" seen in the White River between Elkins and Durham (and elsewhere in the county) are concretions in which the systematic arrangement of minerals featuring distinctive septa looks like a turtle's shell.

collapsed, causing the surface rocks above to curve downward. The bowl shape of Fayetteville's old City Park (now Wilson Park) shows a downward dip in strata of about 100 feet, apparently the result of a collapse structure. Lake Lucille in northern Fayetteville demonstrates about 200 feet of downward displacement of rock strata.

A very different process has been at work at Devil's Den. The devil's den at the state park is not a limestone cave. Rather, it was formed by fracturing and movement of the sandstone rocks. The weathering of the shale below the massive sandstones of the park has created a slick surface of clay down which blocks of sandstone can slide. If the big blocks slide only a short distance, a cave-like crevice is the result—a fitting den for the devil.

How old are these structures? The process of weathering and movement of sandstone blocks is still underway in the county. Collapse structures seem to have formed within the past one million years. The main movement deep within the earth's crust which created the fault seems to have occurred approximately 300 million years ago during the early Pennsylvanian Period.

Legacy in Sandstone

The first sidewalks here made of anything but wood were big attractive slabs of sandstone. County historian Robert G. Winn remembers when, more than a half century ago, massive slabs of sandstone formed a beautiful walk from Old Main on the University of Arkansas campus down to Dickson Street. Stone sidewalks are a rarity today.

The sandstone we see today was once part of an ancient seashore, sandbar, delta of a river, or perhaps sand dunes like those we see in coastal areas today. We have gotten a lot of use out of these ancient geological deposits. Sandstone was the bane of early farming efforts in southern Washington County, but this common field stone also served as material for chimneys, foundations of houses, and stone walls around yards in towns as well as fields in the country—a far cry from ancient sand dunes!

A trip to the University campus shows how important sandstone once was here. The retaining walls that front Maple Street, Arkansas Avenue, and Dickson Street on the east side of campus hill are laid with beautiful sandstone blocks. In size and purpose these blocks once served the same function as today's concrete

Wedington Sandstone

Besides the black shale, fossils, and various concretions, the Fayetteville Formation includes a section called the Wedington Sandstone which occurs at the top of the Fayetteville (and was therefore deposited at a more recent date than the black shale). It is named for the sandstone outcroppings that form the Wedington Mountains, northwest of Prairie Grove in the region of the Wedington Unit of the Ozark National Forest. In this area the bluff forming sandstone is over 150 feet thick. At West Fork it forms the familiar sandstone bluff where Highway 156 crosses West Fork branch. This bluff is apparently deltaic in origin. That is, the sand was deposited in a shallow sea at the mouth of a river where a delta was forming.

According to Carey Croneis, much of the Wedington "was laid down in shallow water, for at many places it bears ripple marks of short wave length and oscillation ripples. The cross-bedding, which is characteristic, indicates that the sediments came from the south, southwest, or possibly the southeast. . ." The ripple marked sandstones can be seen easily in the bed of Hog Eye Creek, where it flows under Highway 265 a half mile north of Hog Eye. The association with water is not just a phenomenon of ancient times. People who were digging wells a century ago in Washington County sought this formation. According to Simonds' 1891 report, "Wells dug in this sandstone usually yield an abundance of excellent soft water."

The Wedington contains numerous fossils, notably fossil plants. These plants inform us that, all the way back in Mississippian time, plants were growing on the delta that was forming in what would be Washington County. The Wedington sand was deposited in shallow water, evidence of which remains in sandstones marked by cross bedding and ripple marks.

These geologists were inspecting a sandstone exposure at West Fork on May 12, 1928. Geological research has contributed significantly to the economic development of Washington County. (Department of Geology, University of Arkansas)

The fossil plants were the subject of a study by David White, "Fossil Flora of the Wedington Sandstone Member of the Fayetteville Shale" published by the U. S. Geological Survey in 1937. Fossil plant collections were initially made by H. D. Miser in sandstone outcrops near Lincoln in 1928. Later collections were made by C. L. Cooper, L. G. Henbest, C. L. Read, and White.

Additional collecting localities included Wedington outcrops at Cane Hill and Prairie Grove. White identified 37 species of plants from these collections. "The Wedington flora is of mixed composition," he wrote. "It comprises ferns and fernlike plants. . ." In addition there were calamarian forms that are like the horsetails or scouring rushes that grow in the county today, except White's plants were like those which in ancient times attained 50 feet in height! He also found considerable evidence of the giant scale trees like Lepidodendron. White's research was significant, because these fossils represented the first definite Mississippian Period land flora that had been discovered in the midcontinent region of the United States.

Before leaving the Fayetteville formation, it is necessary to mention that the abundant shales deteriorate into a sticky clay that is familiar to all citizens of Washington County. This clay (as well as clay from several other formations) can be used for making bricks. According to Bob Besom of the Shiloh Museum in Springdale, bricks were apparently made at Cane Hill as early as the 1830s. The post-Civil War period, roughly 1867 to 1880, was a kind of golden age for brick use in the county. Besom speculates that a number of "great architectural gems of the Arkansas Ozarks," constructed of brick in this period, may have been the result of widespread destruction of wood frame buildings during the Civil War. The clay used for bricks in the University of Arkansas' Old Main was ob-blocks. The sandstone was hewn from local outcrops and artfully dressed by highly skilled craftsmen. While functional as building materials, they were also attractive additions to the homes and buildings in which they were used. The blocks retain natural earth tones, fossils, ripple marks, and other distinctive geological characters.

William Campbell wrote in 1928 that 2,300 perch of rock went into the foundation of Old Main when it was built in the 1870s. He stated the rock was quarried on "the farm" (presumably the McIlroy farm). These same types of blocks made the foundations for most of the grand homes that are now part of the Washington-Willow Historical District in Fayetteville. The hewn sandstone was used as the chief construction material for numerous commercial buildings, many of which still stand. Campbell stated, "stone has been quarried by many masons from the west side of the hill from the McIlroy home, the south side, and also from the side of the hill south of the (Fayetteville) Square."

In the Washington County Courthouse complex, sandstone is prominently displayed. The old jail, constructed in about 1897, shows several different kinds of sandstone used in its construction and is a real showcase for this building material. The old National Guard Armory, constructed after World War I, has a sturdy sandstone foundation, as does the Courts Building, at the corner of Center Street and College Avenue. The American Legion Building next to the old jail, constructed in 1940, features beautiful sandstone work. It's altogether fitting that the county's governmental center features an abundance of native stone.

Unfortunately, there are no more sandstone quarries in the county. In recent years, however, there has been a revival in the use of field stone. It was used to build steps, pathways, foundations, and a chimney and springhouse at the Shiloh Museum in 1988 and '89. It is now used in the construction and decoration of fine homes and commercial buildings in the county. The common material of yesteryear now commands a premium price. The concrete blocks so widely used today are attractive on account of their price, functionality, and availability. We can appreciate the versatility of this modern building material without losing sight of the treasures once produced by stone cutters in the county.

tained, molded, and fired in Washington County at several kilns not far from the modern campus. The longest-lived brick works in the county, the Terpening Brick and Tile Company located between Prairie Grove and Farmington, opened about 1890 and stopped making bricks on the eve of World War I. The clay used by Terpening was dug in bottomland soils, laid down in ancient times.

Reefs

The Mississippian Period occupied approximately 35 million years, 345 to 310 million years ago. The last phase of this period in Washington County was marked by the deposition of limestones bearing distinctive corkscrew-like fossils of a bryozoan named Archimedes associated with the reefs that characterized this time in the county's geological history. Rocks of this last phase of the Mississippian constitute the Pitkin Formation.

The Pitkin, which rests atop the Fayetteville Formation in many places, was once called the Archimedes Limestone. It was first described from outcroppings in the vicinity of Pitkin (now Woolsey) a few miles south of West Fork in the valley of the West Fork branch. The name was later changed to the Pitkin Formation. The limestone contains many other fossils as well, especially crinoids, corals, and brachiopods. The Pitkin attains its maximum thickness near the base of the Boston Mountains in the southern parts of the county and thins toward the north, disappearing in the Fayetteville area.

The Pitkin can be easily seen a mile or two south of West Fork on the east side of Highway 71. For approximately one-half mile, bluffs rise above the road, and enormous detached blocks of the limestone provide

This seven-foot long fossil is that of a nautiloid cephalopod found in the Fayetteville Formation shale within the city limits of Fayetteville. easy inspection. There are numerous fossils visible on the detached blocks, including a whole "seabed" of the corkscrews.

The high bluffs along Highway 16, visible between Elkins and Durham, are capped by this limestone. In the Black Oak community, the ceiling of Fincher's Cave is formed by corals, crinoids, and Archimedes fossils. Elsewhere in the Middle Fork valley the Pitkin forms bluffs above the river. In the Cane Hill area the Pitkin is exposed in bluffs along Jordan Creek. "In the exposure nearly south of the Cane Hill College building . . .the limestone occurs twenty feet above the principal street of the town," wrote Frederic Simonds in his report. "The stone, which is hard, gray and very fossiliferous, presents a series of steps formed by the various layers." At Evansville a 30 foot layer of the Pitkin first appears 80 feet above the creek.

As in the case of bryozoans already mentioned, Archimedes was a colonial animal. Its delicate fan-shaped fronds were arranged around a backbone-like central axis that looked like a wide-flanged screw. In life the screw was upright and provided the colony with support. Upon death the screw fell over. In some places in Washington County the Pitkin is crowded with these fossils, showing how abundant the animal must have been in life. Most fossils preserve only the screw, but in some cases the screw is in life position with parts of the soft fronds extending well beyond the hard part of the screw.

The shoreline during Pitkin times seems to have passed through Washington County. Warm shallow seas covering the county included reef formations. These were not atolls, islands, or vast ridges like the modern Great Barrier Reef of coastal Australia. Rather, Washington County reefs were low mounds of soft lime muds that resisted wave and

We are not used to thinking of Washington County as a place for the development of reefs. Nevertheless, in the geological past reefs of varying sizes developed in warm shallow seas. The evidence can be seen in the limestone rocks of the Pitkin Formation (and other formations) in the county. One reef at Cane Hill is 15 feet long and 10 feet high. One of the largest, located in the bluffs above the White River at Durham, is 60 feet high and 315 feet long.

Reef limestones contain well-preserved fossils. At Durham, researchers found an Archimedes fossil with its delicate fronds preserved that was approximately seven inches long and three inches wide. The dense reef limestone contains numerous branching veinlets filled with clear calcite. The weathered appearance of the rock is lumpy, nodular masses with spaces filled by a crumbly material of fossil detritus weakly cemented by lime mud.

These reefs, often called lime-mud mounds by geologists, formed in water probably no more than 20 feet deep. They were subsequently colonized by marine animals like sponges, corals, brachiopods, bryozoans, and crinoids. Once formed these mounds effectively baffled currents and waves. According to researchers Robert Tehan and Alex Warmath, "The organisms stabilized the buildups by rooting and perpetuated mound growth by baffling currents and trapping lime mud. As mounds in the south developed, they began to influence carbonate deposition shoreward. This allowed subsequent mound development to the north."

The lime-muds may have originated through the dissolution of marine algae. Modern blue-green algae, for example, trap calcium carbonate (lime) particles from the sea water in which they live; upon dissolution this calcium carbonate would be available for mound formation where environmental conditions were suitable. According to Victoria Pinkley, who studied lime-mud mounds at Durham, "The algal current actions and therefore created environmental conditions suitable for certain life forms intolerant of the open sea. Fossils of corals, brachiopods, bryozoans, and crinoids are frequently seen in these reef formations. Reefs have been seen in Pitkin outcrops throughout the county.

The Pitkin is occasionally oolithic. Ooliths, which look like tiny fish eggs, are grains of sand or other matter around which have formed thin layers of limestone. They may have formed in agitated waters as waves hit beaches here. In modern tropical coasts ooliths form dunes and occur in sand waves in shallow water.

Pitkin exposures mark the end of the Mississippian Period in Washington County. The seas in which the Pitkin reefs developed retreated. Now the land emerged from the sea, and for ages the Pitkin beds were subjected to erosion. Later the land again subsided and was covered by the sea. This brings us to the Pennsylvanian Period, approximately 310 million years ago.

Pennsylvanian Period

Whereas the Mississippian sediments mainly produced limestones and shales with minor sandstones, the Pennsylvanian produced sediments that consolidated mainly into sandstones, siltstones, and shales, with relatively minor limestones.

Concerning the Pennsylvanian age rocks in the Devil's Den area, John McFarland of the Arkansas Geological Survey has written, "The deposition of sandstone, siltstone, and shale is controlled to a large part by the energy of the waves, currents, and storms affecting the sediment. When a muddy river discharges its sediment load into an ocean basin, the larger and heavier particles are the first to drop out, followed by other particles in order of decreasing size and weight as the current wanes. We know that during Pennsylvanian time rivers from the north were pumping sediments out onto the continenal shelf in this general area, building up deltas much as the Mississippi River has built a delta into the Gulf of Mexico in more modern times. . .When the sands, silts and clays build up enough they reach the surface of the ocean basin. Plants begin to grow trapping more sediment. Eventually swamps and bogs form, decaying vegetation matter builds up, is buried, and with time turns to coal. . ."

The sand in Washington County's Pennsylvanian sandstones seems to have been carried here in a river system originating in southeastern Canada where Precambrian granites were being eroded. During this time Washington County was a low lying body of land, nothing like it is today. At times it must have resembled coastal Louisiana or the fresh water swamps of southern Florida. It was so low that the slightest oscillation in sea level could bury the land under salt water or alternately expose a coastal plain of shallow, flat land covered with fresh water lagoons. However, as we can see today, it did not always remain a lowland.

The Pennsylvanian shales and sandstones are the most recently deposited rocks in the county. Because of a much more recent elevation of the whole region, these rocks now form the tops of the Boston Mountains. In the Fayetteville area, for example, Mt. Sequoyah, Kessler Mountain, South Mountain, Washington Mountain, and others are all capped by rocks of Pennsylvanian age. At Devil's Den State Park the hills above Lee Creek are all capped by the Pennsylvanian. Highway 71 through the southern part of the county runs a considerable distance upon Pennsylvanian age ridges, with flat-topped Pennsylvanian Period mountains in view in all directions. In the southwestern corner of the county, in the vicinity of Morrow and Evansville, the roads traverse these ancient rocks.

structures probably maintained a living veneer over the mounds—trapping and perhaps precipitating, and binding sediment." Donald Smith, who studied Pitkin reefs in the Greenland area, said, "Pitkin reefs are composed mainly of dense masses of calcareous algae which surround corals, bryozoans, and other calcareous organisms as well as accumulations of fragments in a matrix of calcareous mud. Corals, bryozoans, and calcareous algae are the reef-forming organisms. Of these, calcareous algae were the principal frame-building and sediment-binding organisms."

On Ellis Branch, approximately one mile down Lee Creek from Devil's Den State Park, geologist John McFarland of the Arkansas Geological Commission has identified limestones that include Archimedes, other bryozoans, several kinds of coral, brachiopods, crinoids, snails, and occasional nautiloids. Here, he writes, "these fossils can be seen in a 'life association,' in other words, the animals have been preserved in fossils in much the same geometry as when the area was a living ecosystem."

The bricks that went into construction of Old Main at the University of Arkansas were made from local clays and fired at local brick yards. The building, the finest 19th century structure in the county, illustrates the importance of geology in economic development. (Russell Charlesworth)

Pennsylvanian deposits in the county amounting to hundreds of vertical feet of sediments have been named the Hale, Bloyd, and Atoka Formations. Some formations have subdivisions called members. This series of formations and members make up the hills in the Fayetteville area. Southward into the Boston Mountains, where the basement strata of the Ozark Dome dips steeply toward the Arkansas River Valley, Pennsylvanian sediments are exposed in creek bottoms all the way up through the mountaintops.

Hale Formation

The return of the sea after the erosion of the Pitkin limestones resulted in the deposition of the Hale Formation, the first of the Pennsylvanian Period. The formation is named for over 100 feet of sediments exposed in a ravine below what was the Hale Mountain School at Hale Mountain in the extreme southwestern part of the county, three and one-half miles from Morrow. The Hale has been subdivided into several members. These members represent even more oscillations of the sea and land.

The Cane Hill member, for example, is named for a series of alternating beds of shaly siltstone and fine-grained sandstone that are well developed in the Cane Hill area. Fossils in the Cane Hill deposits include sinuous tracks of polycheate or bristle worms that fed in the sediments that are now siltstone. These clearly imprinted, roughly paired tracks wind among the ripple marks now, just as they did in life. There are also the curious "fucoid structures" that resemble an animal's paw. It is thought they might be casts of tunnels made by worms or arthropods that burrowed in the soft muds.

After Cane Hill time the seas again withdrew, subjecting the earlier sediments to erosion. Later upon this erosional surface was deposited the Prairie Grove member of the Hale Formation, which is named for beds of calcareous sandstone (i. e. sandstone with calcium carbonate that forms limestone) exposed east and south of Prairie Grove (there are also numerous other exposures in the county).

One distinctive feature of this member is the honeycomb pattern formed by the weathering out of carbonate patches in the sandstone. No one knows how these honeycomb-like features were formed. The sandstone is resistant to weathering which causes it to stand out as bluffs. It is exposed beside Highway 59 for three miles along the road south of Evansville. At Washington Mountain in Fayetteville, the south-facing bluff along the hilltop is composed of this sandstone, which has weathered into an interesting pattern of shallow caves.

Later upon the Prairie Grove member was deposited the initial sediments of the Bloyd Formation. The Bloyd was named for typical exposures found on the southwest part of Bloyd Mountain near West Fork. The Bloyd is a diverse formation with sediments of limestone, siltstone, sandstone, and shale that were deposited in marine and non-marine environments. The Bloyd also contains the only coal seam found in the county. The Bloyd has been subdivided into four members: Brentwood Limestone, Woolsey, Dye Shale, and Kessler Limestone.

The Brentwood member includes limestones and shales that were deposited in a shallow sea. The limestone contains a great many fossils. It was once called the Pentremital Limestone because in some locales in the Brentwood area large numbers of the blastoid Pentremites have weathered free of the limestone. One sometimes hears them called "fossil acorns" or "fossil hickory nuts." The animals were kin to crinoids and had similar life habitats. They lived in warm shallow water and were attached to the sea floor.

You can get some idea of how abundant the marine animals were during Brentwood time by stopping at the Highway 71 rest stop near Brentwood. The stream that flows along the west border of the picnic area is the West Fork branch of the White River. Except at times of flooding, the Brentwood limestone is conveniently exposed on the banks and in the creek bottom. The fossils can sometimes be seen better if the rock is slightly wet. Inspection shows an enormous number of animals including crinoids, cephalopods, blastoids, various bryozoans, brachiopods, corals, and an occasional tail of a trilobite.

After Brentwood time the sea in which the limestone was deposited regressed. Once again, Washington County was an emergent lowland. According to the University of Arkansas' Doy Zachry, ". . .nonmarine shale, siltstone, and coal accumulated in a variety of flood-plain and coastal marsh environments. . .East of Washington County thick fluvial sands were deposited by south-flowing braided stream systems. . ." These deposits comprise the Woolsey member of the Bloyd Formation. During this time, rivers carrying sediments into the county had built up a delta sufficient to support a tropical forest. Some of this forest is preserved in the form of coal and plant fossils.

Coal

For coal to form, the vegetation must, at death, escape total deterioration, usually by rapid burial under water. The vegetation that escapes must eventually be compacted under weight of sediments like sand and silt. Only a small amount of the swamp forest's vegetation would likely meet these conditions. Furthermore, vegetation that escaped deterioration was first transformed into peat. The ratio of uncompacted peat to coal, about 10 to 1, suggests that a typical coal seam in the county that is today six inches thick would have required the burial under ideal conditions of enough vegetation to make five feet of peat! Fossils found in the county preserve some evidence of these coal-forming plants.

As in the cases of clay for bricks, limestone for a variety of uses, and sandstone for building, coal has had an economic impact on the county. Information published in Frederic Simonds' report (1891) suggests that coal was relatively important in the early days of Washington County. It was being mined as early as the 1840s at Brown's coal bank (or mine) near modern West Fork. This bank was later called Robinson's. In the 1880s, local coal was available for stoves, steam heating, and blacksmithing. Between July 1889 and June 1890 the coal marketed from Lemon's Bank, a few miles east of present Lake Fayetteville, amounted to 321 loads or tons. Lemon's bank is especially well-known among geologists because fossil insects were found there. One of these fossils is a superb impression of a cockroach wing.

According to Robert G. Winn, a frequent contributor to the county's history, "Until about the time of World War II. . .some coal was mined by land owners who dug the fuel and hauled it in wagonloads or at times carried it in gunny sacks for their own use or sold small quantities locally. The coal found in the southern part of Washington County, especially in the Blackburn Creek area, was of superior quality—known locally as 'peacock coal.'"

In 1859 the renowned botanist Leo Lesquereux traveled to Arkansas at the request of D. D. Owen of the State Geological Survey of Arkansas.

Coal, as Lesquereux pointed out, is "that originator of industrial life," the fuel upon which the industrial revolution of the 19th Century was erected. Owen wanted to know if major coal seams existed in the state. Lesquereux was already widely known for his work with fossil plants. Comparisons of fossil plants from Arkansas with those from other states where major coal seams had been found might indicate Arkansas' possibilities. Lesquereux visited Washington County in his quest.

In the Fayetteville area Lesquereux inspected several coal seams without discovering anything of interest. The stop at Male's coal bank in the headwaters of Mill Creek, several miles east of modern West Fork, was productive. Male's was a strip mine worked by digging a trench down into the 8-10 inches of coal. There was too little coal to fuel dreams of an industrial empire in Washington County, but Male's had another wealth, plant fossils.

Lesquereux was impressed with fossils from Lepidodendron, the scale tree that formed the overhead canopy in ancient swamp forests. He found Cordaites, a tree that reached 75 feet in height and bore long, blade or strap-like leaves. Calamites, a tree that reached 50 feet, was common in this forest. He also found an abundance of ferns and fern-like foliage that had much the same appearance as ferns that grow in Washington County today. He collected 27 species of fossil plants, some of them new to science. "I doubt not that if we had had a whole day to spend at Male's coal-bank instead of an hour, we would. . .have collected at least a dozen other new species," he wrote.

In Washington County termination of these lowland forests is defined by the Dye Shale member of the Bloyd Formation, interpreted as the initial deposit of an advancing sea which covered the beaches, coastal plain, and swamp forest of Woolsey time. Sandstone, siltstone, claystone, and limestone with marine fossils were deposited in the shallow sea. Upon the Dye Shale was deposited the Kessler Limestone, which indicates that a marine environment with shallow water conditions continued to prevail.

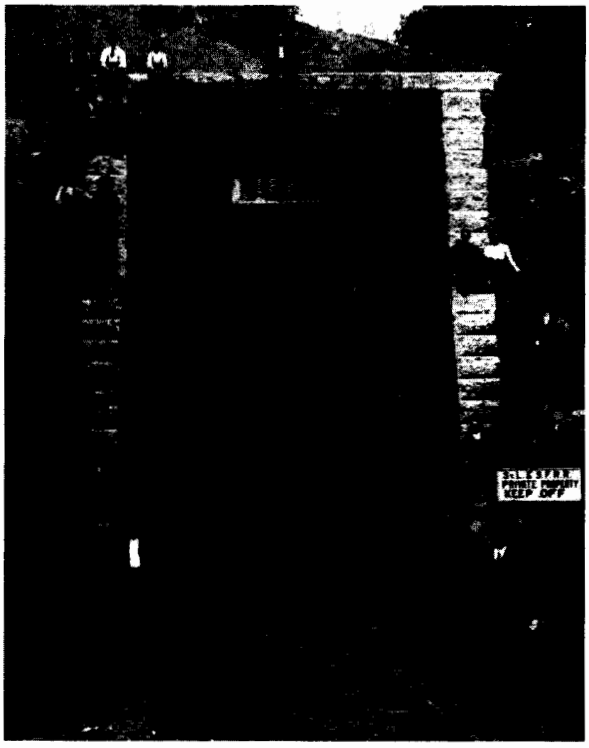
This member is named for limestone exposures on Kessler Mountain near Fayetteville. The most typical rocks of the Kessler are limestones composed of shell fragments and other organisms. There is an unconformity in the rocks between the Kessler member and the next deposition of rocks. This unconformity marks a period when the earlier sediments were being eroded. Upon this unconformity was deposited the initial sediments of a new formation, the Atoka, the last—and therefore most recent—formation deposited in the county.

Atoka Formation

Geologists call the initial Atoka deposits the Trace Creek member. It consists of thick beds of marine shales and thin beds of sandstone. After Trace Creek time, the seas once again withdrew from the land.

The nonmarine sands that were deposited atop the Trace Creek shales mark a major transition in the geological story of Washington County. The predominant sandstones and shales of the Atoka Formation are believed to have been deposited primarily in a lowland river delta system. Today this old river delta system forms the highest elevations in the county—testimony to the power of geological processes to alter the face of the land. In southern Washington County, the lower sections of the Atoka form distinctive "double ledged" sandstone outcrops that can be traced 120 miles east.

A century ago the Atoka was termed the Millstone Grit Formation.



Geology influences human destiny. The great engineering feat at Winslow required tunneling one-third of a mile through sediments of the Atoka Formation. The tunnel, pictured here in 1907, was completed in 1882. (Bob Besom)

The basal sandstone is gray to brown in color, coarse-grained, and often contains small, light-colored quartz pebbles. This reminded early geologists of a formation in England from which millstones were quarried. Later the formation was called the Winslow, for at Winslow it is over 2,000 feet thick. The famous railroad tunnel at Winslow was driven through shales of the Atoka. Research in recent times has shown that these sandstones and shales occur over a huge area, and so the name Atoka is now used.

In Arkansas the Atoka ranges from relatively thin deposits in the northwest to more than 10,000 feet in the basin of the Arkansas River in Arkansas and Oklahoma. It is apparent in the figures that during Atoka time a huge amount of sediment was flooding into this region. According to Simonds (1891), "In general, these sandstones and shales cap the Boston Mountains and their outliers, and wind in and out along the sides of the ravines and spurs that extend northward from the main ridge. The outcrops of the shales are generally concealed by debris and residuary soils, while the more massive sandstones and grits often form conspicuous bluffs on or near mountain tops" in the Bostons. The shales deteriorate into sticky clays, as anyone can tell you who has driven country roads during rainy seasons.

At one place Simonds encountered "a nearly level surface. . .completely covered with sandstone slabs, from 4 to 6 or more feet in length, and from 6 to 8 inches thick, their regular form giving them the appearance of building material just taken from the quarry." These stones have been used for building materials wherever found.

In the Bug Scuffle Church area north of Devil's Den State Park there is an outstanding example of thin sandstone beds that look like the pages of a book. These "pages" show that the mouth of a river was near here. The sand that became stone was part of a channel which branched away from the main river. Another outcrop reflects the presence of an offshore sandbar or sand deposits directly at the river's mouth. The sandstones that constitute Yellow Rock in Devil's Den State Park were also deposited in a delta environment.

Zoophycos is the intriguing name given to a fossil commonly seen on the sandstones of Yellow Rock Trial and elsewhere in Atokan rocks. Radiating swirls of lines suggest a feather. At one time it was thought to represent some type of plant, but now it is thought to record the feeding activities of a worm whose modern relatives have a feeding apparatus of moving gill rays that when extended intercept microscopic bits of plant and animal food settling in the shallow water where the contemporary animal lives.

Fossils

Compared to some of the limestones of the Mississippian Period, the sandstones of the Atoka Formation are relatively barren of fossils. However, in some places marine fossils like brachiopods crowd the sandstones. Fine examples of ammonoids, the marine cephalopods kin to modern nautiluses, also occur. Therefore, while the Atoka deposits seem mainly to reflect times when Washington County was emergent from the sea, other evidence like these marine fossils show that oscillations of land and sea were still occurring.

Recent research suggests that during Pennsylvanian times the worldwide configuration of continents was much different than it is today. North America and Europe were joined as one continent. To the south,

Tripoli

There are a number of little known minerals that have been found in the county, but usually not in quantities that have made them famous. The Arkansas Geological Survey, for example, has reported two deposits of tripoli in the county, both in the extreme northeast in the Springdale area where the Boone Formation is widely exposed. Tripoli is a fine-grained, sand-like substance used for abrasive purposes. These deposits were not as large or as good quality as those that have been actively mined in neighboring Benton County.

Small deposits of lead and zinc are also known, but as in the case of tripoli, these deposits haven't made anyone rich. The mineral occurs as galena (lead sulphide) in the Boone Formation. According to a 1940 report by the survey, one deposit is located near Morrow on the bank of Fly Creek. Mining attempts began around 1880, but not seriously until 1908. A mill was erected on the site but it never amounted to much. Most of the mining seems to have occurred during the period of high prices in World War I. Another deposit has been worked one mile north of Rhea's Mill. Around 1905 the Arkansas Mining and Milling Company sank five test shafts into the Boone Formation there, but total production came to only five or six tons of low grade ore.

Natural gas, which is formed by the same geological processes leading to oil, has also been found in the county. In the early days, "shows" of oil in water wells lead to exploration and wildcating for oil and gas. Small "shows" of oil were found, but too small to be of real interest. A report published by the Arkansas Oil and Gas Commission in 1973 showed that two natural gas wells at West Fork had produced 851,000 million cubic feet of gas. Wells had also been drilled at Brentwood, but these were not then producing.

the supercontinent Gondwanaland included South America, Africa, Antarctica, Australia, and India. The most widely accepted theories explaining Pennsylvanian oscillations are that sea levels worldwide changed in response to the advances and retreats of continental glaciers on Gondwanaland or to large-scale warping of the deep-sea floor associated with the changing configurations of the continents.

Whatever the cause, the oscillations that resulted in the deposit of the Atoka sandstones and shales seem to have marked the last large scale sedimentation affecting the geological structure of Washington County. The Atoka is, in a manner of speaking, "the top of the rock." We can go no higher in the geological column. The seas of later (i. e., more recent) times left no traces in the Ozarks. The roughly 280 million years since the close of the Pennsylvanian has been a time when sediments laid down in the previous 300 million years were consolidated into rock and subsequently shaped into today's land surface. The ancient sediments have been subjected to regionwide uplifts which produced the elevations of today, some 1,000 to over 2,000 feet higher than the old sea-land.

Finally, we take note of the reality that in fairly recent times the land we call Washington County underwent great change on the surface or near the surface. During the Pleistocene Epoch, which began two to three million years ago and lasted until about 8,000 years ago, the North American landmass of which Washington County is a part was subjected to extremes in climate marked by the periodical advance and retreat of glaciers. There is no evidence that glaciers reached the county, but as they advanced south they created conditions in which rainfall was greatly increased. The elevated landmass of Washington County underwent heavy erosion due to increased rainfall.

The valleys of rivers were deepened, caves were eroded from the limestone bedrock, and the plateaus themselves were reduced by erosion. The red soils associated with the limestone of the Boone Formation probably formed at this time. The movement of ground water through limestone caused the development of cave systems as the limestone eroded. In places these caverns collapsed, altering the surface of the land above.

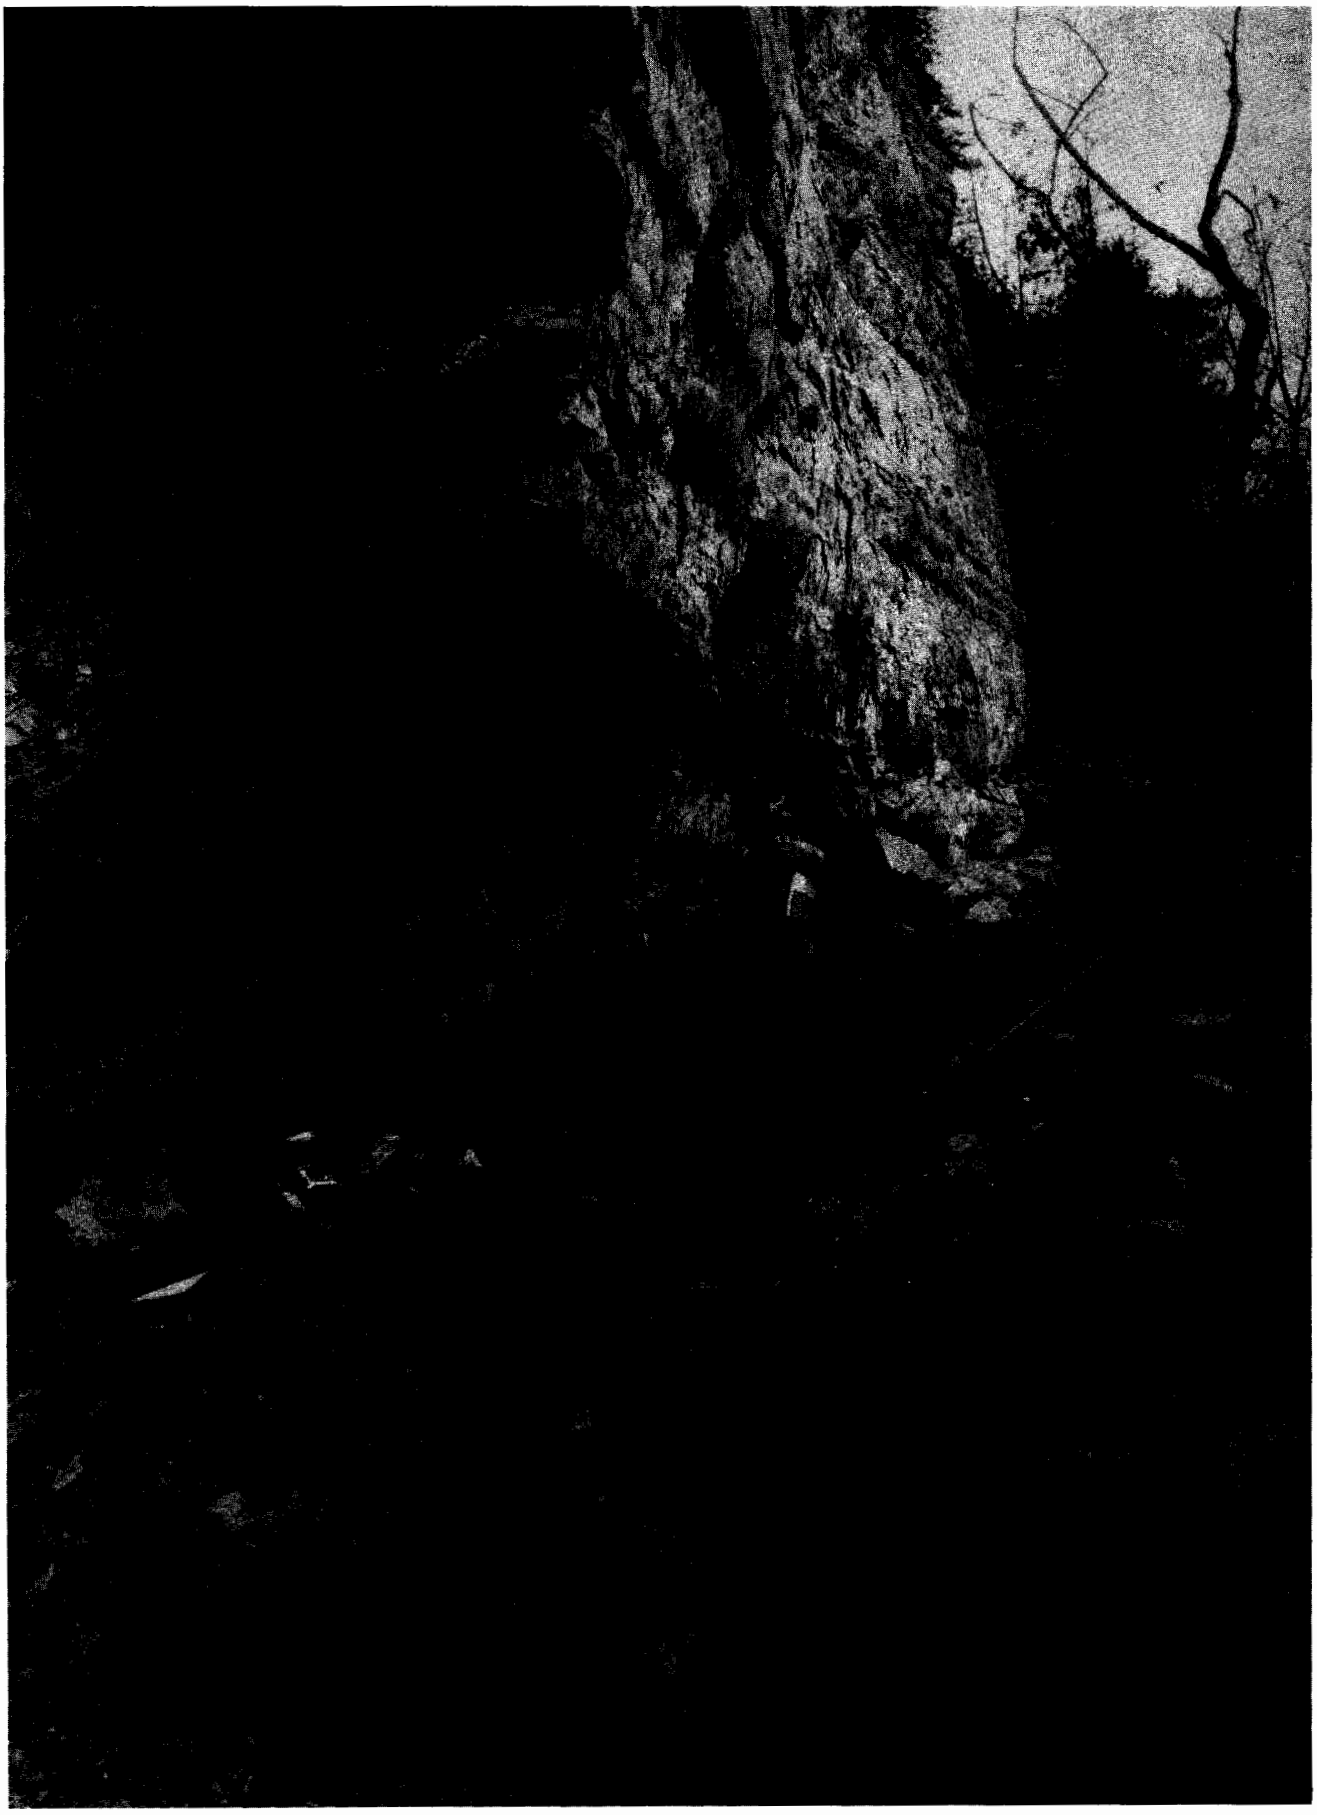
Drier conditions developed when the glaciers retreated back to the north. At one point several thousand years ago local conditions became so dry that rainfall here was more like it is today in the arid West. Prairie vegetation grew here, prairie animals like bison lived on the land, and distinctive conical mounds of wind blown dust (called "prairie pimples" or "prairie mounds") developed around clumps of vegetation.

We are reminded in all of this that the process of change, which has gone on for hundreds of millions of years here, is going on today—just as it has in the past. Geology is not just about "old stuff."



Chapter Two

The First People of Washington County

"An arrowhead in a shoebox doesn't tell you much about the people who made it."

—Hester Davis

The grassy fields where the cattle of Washington County graze were once the domain of mules, horses, and tractors that turned the rich soils of bottomland fields that wind along the streams and rivers. Back then the fields were planted in wheat, corn, and oats. There were crops of hay, strawberries, beans, or tomatoes. The first heavy rain would wash away loose soil, exposing arrowheads fashioned from hard chert, sometimes called flint.

Then as now the hillsides above some of these valleys were marked by bluffs below which had formed shallow caves or rockshelters. Water running down the bluffs had cut away some kinds of rocks while other rocks resisted dissolution and therefore stood out as conspicuous ledges. In some places shale had eroded from below layers of hard limestone or sandstone. The rocks that were most resistant to dissolution formed the ceiling over the cavity that remained when the less resistant rocks dissolved. In the early days wild animals like bears and panthers (mountain lions) frequented such places. In some rockshelters there were enigmatic paintings on the rocks and arrowheads among the debris on the floor. Most surprisingly, in some shelters there were pieces of Indian baskets and other perishable materials preserved in the dry soils.

Who were the Indians who made the arrowheads and created the paintings found in the shelters? How did they live? What work did they do? What did they wear? What did they do for recreation? The silent arrowheads collected in plowed fields and then stored in buckets and shoeboxes don't help much in the way of answering.

Sam Dellinger early in his career, circa 1915—1921. The Indian artifacts that he and his crews recovered from rockshelters in Northwest Arkansas formed the basis of an important research collection still in use today. (University Museum)

Even three decades ago a visit to the museum at the University of Arkansas in Fayetteville might have provided a few answers. The museum occupied the rustic upper quarters of Old Main. Displayed in glass cases were arrowheads, pieces of pottery, and desiccated (dried) remains of people whose burials had been found in rockshelters in northwest Arkansas, including Washington County. The shelters were so remarkably dry that baskets and even clothing were preserved along with human remains. Putting two and two together, an imaginative person might have guessed at the relationship between the museum exhibits and the relics found in plowed fields.

Samuel C. Dellinger and Mark Harrington

The materials in the exhibits were collected in the 1920s and 1930s under the direction of a Washington County resident, Samuel C. Dellinger. Professor Michael Hoffman of the museum and the University's Department of Anthropology has written that Dellinger was a native of North Carolina who came to Arkansas in 1915 in order to teach biology at Hendrix College in Conway. In 1921 he was appointed assistant professor in the Zoology Department at the University of Arkansas.

Archaeologically speaking, Dellinger arrived in Arkansas at a critical time. Just as he was settling into Washington County, another young professional, Mark R. Harrington of the Museum of the American Indian in New York, arrived in order to conduct archaeological excavations in dry rockshelters. Harrington had learned that as far back as 1872 "Uncle Jack" Bland of Larue (which is now a finger of land jutting into Beaver Lake in Benton County) had "found a basket made of split cane, a needle or awl of bone, and. . .a woven moccasin of grass, all under the great shelving limestone ledge near his home. . ." The material attracted Harrington because it was in a remarkable state of preservation.

His excavations in 1922-1923 resulted in discovery of prehistoric baby carriers made of cane, stone celts still hafted in wooden handles, storage pits lined with woven baskets, a woven bag filled with acorns, woven nets suitable for catching fish or rabbits, spear throwers or atlatls upon which were mounted stone points often mistakenly called arrowheads (an accurate name is dart point), buckskin moccasins, woven sandals, beads, musical instruments such as a flute made from cane, human burials, and stone tools like those collected today in plowed fields.

Melvin R. Gilmore

Harrington sent the collections of seed, grass, and other plant remains to botanist Melvin R. Gilmore at the University of Michigan "for the purpose of determining the species of plants represented and interpreting the uses which they served in the life of that people." Gilmore reported that the people who left these artifacts were certainly farmers. "We have no traces of their fields," he wrote, "which no doubt were cultivated in the alluvial soil of the river valleys, but abundant evidence of those fields is found in the products remaining in their places of habitation, and in the tools with which they worked, and bags of select seed put away against the next planting time."

Gilmore's identifications provided a picture of gardening in ancient

Ancient Cradles

During the 1920s and 1930s, archaeologists who performed excavations in Washington County and elsewhere in the Ozarks were intrigued to discover, almost intact, baby cradles or baby carriers that had been preserved from decay by the dry soils in some rockshelters. Samuel C. Dellinger of the University of Arkansas Department of Zoology and the University museum published a paper on this subject in the magazine American Antiquity in 1936.

In the Putman Shelter along the White River in extreme northeastern Washington County, Dellinger's crews from the museum uncovered a baby carrier that was apparently common in northwest Arkansas. It was made from materials that are still common in the county today. River cane splints were wrapped around a rectangular foundation which was itself made from a cane stalk. The cane frame was made firm by being wrapped with the pliable bark from what was probably a leatherwood bush. Next to the canes, at the head of the cradle, was a layer of fibers and down which apparently served as a pillow.

Some baby cradles from the Ozarks were made with a hood that would times. There was corn of several varieties, garden beans, squashes, and pumpkins. "They also cultivated egg gourds large and small, which they used as vessels of various kinds, cups, ladles, jugs and bottles, bowls and so forth." They raised sunflowers whose seeds were one-half inch long. There were varieties of wild plants common in the Ozarks today, like lamb's-quarters, which were probably cultivated. "The seed of these other species of plants were carefully put away together with the selected seed of corn, beans, sunflowers, squashes and pumpkins." Gilmore identified a number of nut species including acorns, hickory nuts, black walnuts, hazelnuts, pecans, and chinquapins.

Gilmore found that numerous species of native plants of the Ozarks were utilized by these prehistoric people. Ropes were made from bluestem grass. "From this grass rope (they) also made large net bags for carrying home the garden produce or other commodities. . .This grass was also used to make sandals for warm weather and insoles and warm padding for moccasins in cold weather. There was found a pair of overshoes woven from twisted stems of bluestem grass. Dried Ozark mud was still clinging to them. . ." There were also strings of "beautiful, pearly white beads, made from the seeds of Ozark gromwell."

The rockshelters excavated by Harrington were primarily in Benton and Carroll Counties. However, his discoveries were also relevant to the history of Washington County and the Ozarks region in general, since the same kind of rockshelters existed in Washington County. Eventually, work by Dellinger resulted in the discovery of artifacts made by the same prehistoric people.

Early Excavations

The timing of Dellinger's arrival in Washington County is critical, because Harrington deposited his entire collection with the Museum of the American Indian in New York. And even though Samuel Dellinger was not a native of Arkansas, he believed the people of the state had been robbed of part of their natural heritage when the Harrington materials left the state.

In 1926 he stated his feelings in plain English for the readers of Arkansas Alumnus, "Imagine my chagrin when I visited such museums as Peabody at Harvard, the National at Washington, D. C., the one at the University of Michigan, the Heye Museum of the American Indian at New York and found there that their finest and most valuable Indian displays had been sent from Arkansas. Specimens are there that can never be found again in our state. . .They are not like a crop of cotton or corn that can be grown again but when these go out of the state they are lost forever. . ."

Dellinger realized that Arkansas had to move quickly to protect its archaeological resources. "These objects are the only documents we have of our past history for these people could leave no written record," he stated. "To a state, a museum is not merely a place for sight seeing but a place for study. Here in the University we have specialists who can make a study of natural history specimens of the state and at the same time instill in our own boys and girls not only a love for their state and its worth, but also give them some idea of her wonderful possibilities."

He commenced excavations under the auspices of the museum in 1927. According to Dr. Hoffman, Dellinger secured a grant in 1930 from the Carnegie Foundation. This money financed three years of work,

This example of plied cordage is from a Northwest Arkansas rockshelter. Prehistoric people in Washington County were skilled in making ropes and cords.

Art and Beauty in Ancient Washington County

The prehistoric residents of what we call Washington County sometimes decorated rockshelters in the bluff lines above stream valleys. During the 1930s, Samuel Dellinger of the University of Arkansas' Department of Zoology and the University's museum directed excavations at a number of prehistoric sites in Washington County. At Bradley Cave, which is located in the Wedington area, he found artwork on the rocks. Unfortunately, when this site was revisited by Jerry Hilliard and John Riggs of the Arkansas Archaeological Survey in the 1980s, the rock art had disappeared, perhaps removed by treasure hunters. Similarly, the enigmatic figure of a human being seen in the 1930s on the wall of the Gibson rockshelter north of Spring Valley in the modern Beaver Lake area had disappeared by the 1980s.

Prehistoric people also decorated themselves. Analysis of materials recovered during archaeological work in the 1920s and 1930s showed that people collected the white seeds of wild gromwell for use in necklaces. The oval, nut-like seed is hard, white, and lustrous and therefore perfect as a bead. Many beads were made from tubular sections of bird bone. Small snail shells were also commonly used.

The most intriguing find of beads in Washington County involved 16 shells from a burial in the Gibson Shelter. The tips of the spires of the shells had been removed so that the shells could be strung as a necklace. These were not your garden variety, run-of-the-mill shells, however. The shells are those of the lettered olive, a marine snail which occurs no closer to Washington County than the Gulf of Mexico. This indicates that the people here long ago had either direct or indirect trade contact with people along the coast.

The art on the walls and the beads for decorations are just two facts among many that are slowly opening a window on the prehistoric past of Washington County.

This pictograph was painted by prehistoric people on a sandstone wall at Hulet (or Bradley) cave in Washington County. (Arkansas Archaeological Survey)

1931–1934. Between 1928 and 1934, Dellinger's crews excavated approximately 85 bluff shelters, the majority of them along the White River in Washington and Benton Counties, War Eagle Creek in Benton and Madison Counties, the Illinois River in Washington County, the Kings River in Carroll and Madison Counties, Lee Creek and Frog Bayou in Washington and Crawford Counties, and the Buffalo River in Newton County. Included in these excavations were more than a dozen rock shelters used by prehistoric Indians in Washington County, similar to those excavated by Harrington.

Dellinger directed the excavations, but they were actually carried out by crews under various foremen, among whom were Charles J. Finger, Jr., Wayne Henbest, James H. Durham, and Tom Millard. They spent anywhere from a few days to a few weeks at locations that often were reported by families or people who lived nearby. Archaeologist Gayle Fritz recently published one note that Dellinger received from a resident of Elkins in 1929 (the grammatical errors are in the original letter):

"Dear Sir:

I noticed an article in South West American paper where there was some exkavating to be done in Ark. this summer for Indian relics. Will Say Would like to have you come to Elkins and look at some mounds which there has bin several relics found such as Potery Pullies Pipes and arrow heads. I have quite a collection would be glad to have you drive out here some time in the near future. When the roads permit and I will be delighted to show you around. . ."

In Dellinger's excavations, care was taken so that the materials recovered could be studied by scientists in the future. A report from 1931 states, ". . .the entire shelter was staked off in three feet squares. A map was drawn showing these squares. Dirt was removed from these sections and a note was made of everything found, giving the number of the section in which it was found as well as position and depth. A careful record was also made of its relationship to other objects in the shelter. . .Each article found was given a number, and this number is entered both in the notes and on the map. . .The work was done for the most part with sieves and hand trowels. Where there was sufficient light, pictures were made of the objects in place. Otherwise drawings were made."

Contents of Rockshelters

In the Illinois River area of western Washington County, there were Bradley Cave, Ezel Cave, Thomas Cave, and the Ricart Shelter. Along the White River in the modern Beaver Lake area, there were Putnam Farm Shelter, Peterbottom Cave, and Gibson Shelter. Along the White River in the eastern part of the county the crews excavated at the Collin's Farm, Watt's Farm, and the Ester Harris site. In the Lee Creek and upper West Fork drainages in the southern region of the county, they worked at Noah's Garden, Brown Bluff, Klondike Bluff, Mill Creek Bluff, and Curiosity Bluff. Some of these places received picturesque names on account of their great beauty. Noah's Garden was two shelters located across from one another in an isolated and heavily forested hollow.

As was the case in the Harrington excavations, the rockshelters excavated by Dellinger contained quantities of normally perishable materials consisting of basketry, textiles, and occasional desiccated bodies buried in a flexed position with knees against the chest and arms folded over the knees. The same kinds of plants studied by Gilmore were found in the Washington County rockshelters. There were numerous artifacts of stone, bone, and some pottery.

John Riggs of the Arkansas Archaeological Survey holds a stadia rod during survey work on the Brown Bluff site in 1986. Riggs and Jerry Hilliard, also of the A. A. S., have been revisiting and documenting sites reported a half-century ago by Sam Dellinger. (Arkansas Archaeological Survey)

A National Historic Site in Washington County

Many residents of Washington County in the 1980s look forward to the time when when a four-lane, interstate highway is constructed from Fayetteville south to Alma, connecting northwest Arkansas with Interstate 40. Not many people, however, know that when constructed this new highway will pass directly over one of the county's most significant archaeological sites.

In 1932, workers from the University Museum in Fayetteville excavated trenches in a small section of a long, overhanging sandstone bluffline above a stream. Numerous artifacts including basketry, pottery, caches of plant foods, stone tools, two human burials, and one dog burial were found. These materials are now curated at the University Museum. Some of them have been dated to about A. D. 1100.

Most surprising to the workers of the 1930s, however, were panels of red-painted Indian pictures that were applied along an 80 meter section of the bluff that is protected from the weather. The distinctive pictograph style at Brown Bluff may be related to a similar style in Indian rock painting that has been observed in the Arkansas River Valley to the south.

Recently, Brown Bluff was revisited by Jerry Hilliard and John Riggs from the Arkansas Archaeological Survey as part of their project of relocating and mapping archaeological sites where crews from the University Museum conducted excavations in the 1930s. They found that only a small area of the rockshelter was excavated in 1932, leading them to believe that future archaeologists could learn much more about the prehistoric people of

In some shelters Dellinger's crews found curious paintings on the stone walls. University of Arkansas photographer Walter J. Lemke, who in 1951 would found the Washington County Historical Society, accompanied Dellinger on one trip in order to make photographs of some of the rock art. One of the great treasure troves was Brown Bluff, located in a south-facing exposure of sandstone and shale above a tributary stream of the West Fork north of Winslow. Excavated in 1932, Dellinger's crews found basketry, pottery, caches of plant foods, stone tools, human burials, and a dog burial. (Later, radiocarbon dates were obtained for some of these materials that established dates of around A. D. 1100 for at least part of the human occupation of the area.)

The prehistoric Indians at Brown Bluff had also made pictures. According to recent work by Jerry Hilliard and John Riggs of the Arkansas Archaeological Survey, a sandstone surface had been flaked smooth by these early people before red color was applied. The pictographs consist of "a cross representation, vertically drawn lines in panels, circles, and geometric patterns, possible anthropomorphic or zoomorphic" figures. The Brown Bluff art looks a great deal like art that has been found in the Arkansas River Valley to the south, suggesting the possibility of cultural relationships.

A huge quantity of faunal material—hide, animal bone, broken egg shells, and feathers—was recovered by Dellinger's crews and deposited in the University of Arkansas museum. These materials were analyzed in 1959 and 1960 by Charles E. Cleland, then a student at the University. He wanted to establish which animal species were available to the people of the bluffs and to what extent these animals were used. Cleland studied faunal remains from 57 shelters and identified remains of 42 species of animals. Far and away the most common animal was deer and secondarily turkey, followed by raccoon, common box turtle, woodchuck, bison, box turtle, and black bear. In addition, there were remains of woodrats, elks, beavers, cottontail rabbits, ornate box turtles, gray foxes, opossums, striped skunks, bobcats, dogs, and an unidentified species of fox.

It seems likely that animals like bison, elk, and bear played an even larger role in the diets of these people than the relatively few bone fragments suggest. "The long bones, skull fragments, or vertebrae [of bison and elk] were not recovered. This perhaps implies that bison and perhaps elk were killed at some distance. . .and that only the meat and a few bones were brought back. . ." Turkey bones and egg shells were common. It seems possible that young turkeys might have been captured and kept in a state of partial domestication. "Other large and small mammals, fish, small birds. . .crayfish, freshwater mussels, and box turtles occasionally supplemented the diet." Of the fish remains, those of the long-nosed gar were most numerous. This fish could have been caught with the many nets found in the remains.

Cleland identified numerous fragments of tanned deer hide which were apparently used as clothing, footgear, thongs, etc. Animal bone was fashioned into numerous tools: awls, antler flakers (probably for working stone), needles, spades or hoes, and projectile points. A sickle recovered from Brown Bluff was made by attaching a deer jaw bone to a stick handle. The sharp teeth served as the cutting edge. Cleland believed this tool was used in harvesting grasses.

this area if further work at Brown Bluff were possible.

Because of its already proven uniqueness in interpreting the history of this region, Brown Bluff has been nominated to the National Register of Historic Places. It is hoped that excavations can be undertaken prior to the construction of the new highway. New excavations might allow a more in-depth look at the prehistoric people of Washington County. Artifacts preserved in a new study of the site would allow future scientific analysis of the materials, just as the materials collected in 1932 continue to be studied today.

Ancient Dogs of Washington County

As long as anyone can remember, dogs and people have been together in Washington County. We are not surprised to learn, then, that the tradition that dates back to pioneer days in the county actually dates back a lot further. Archaeologists working in the county and elsewhere in the Ozarks have found lots of evidence that the prehistoric Indian people here also kept dogs.

During excavations carried out by the University of Arkansas during the 1930s, dog burials were found in rockshelters at the Mill Creek and Brown Bluff sites which are both in Washington County. In both cases the dogs were buried in a flexed (or doubled up) position in a manner similar to human burials of the times. The animal at Mill Creek still had a hickory bark collar around its neck! The dog at Brown Bluff was about the size of a modern terrier.

These animal remains were studied by Charles Cleland, then a graduate student. According to Cleland, "the head is delicate and the ears seem to have been rather small and pointed. A few hairs still clinging to the tail of this individual were about an inch and a half long with a white base

Bluff-dwellers in the Attic

Cleland's analysis marked a considerable advance in our knowledge of the prehistory of Washington County, but many questions remained. Based upon his collections of 1922—1923, Mark Harrington proposed the interesting theory that these people comprised a distinct cultural entity, a tribe or nation separate from others. He called them the Ozark Bluff-dwellers.

They occupied a large territory, Harrington believed, ranging from the eastern edge of the Oklahoma prairies to the mouth of the Buffalo River in Arkansas and from central Missouri south to the Arkansas River. These first people of Washington County, he thought, seemed to have made their homes under the rock ledges, and only rarely did they build villages in open areas. Firm dating procedures, like the carbon-14 method that is available to scientists today, were unknown in the 1920s and 1930s when Harrington and Dellinger did their field work. Harrington thought the latest date at which the shelters were occupied was around 500 to 600 A. D. and that the shelters had by that time been in use for a "long, long time" by the Bluff-dwellers.

As originally presented by Harrington and expanded on by others, the Ozark Bluff-dweller culture was a manifestation of an isolation caused by the rugged terrain of the Ozarks region. In this theory the people were cut off by natural barriers from more progressive Indian cultures elsewhere and therefore retained primitive characteristics. The Bluff-dwellers were thought not to have known well-established village life. Their techniques in pottery making seemed to lag behind other North American Indians. The considerable evidence of hunting and wild plant usage found in the shelters was interpreted as meaning that the Bluff-dwellers were only at the dawn of an agricultural revolution that had already swept other Indian cultures.

In short, what Harrington proposed was a cultural enclave as separated from other prehistoric people of North America as the so-called hillbilly culture of more recent times. But just as the notion of the Ozark hillbilly has been discarded, so too has the notion of the prehistoric Ozark Bluff-dweller. Archaeologist Gayle J. Fritz has written that the data now available "cast grave doubt upon the notion that late prehistoric inhabitants of this region were simple provincials living out their lives in isolation from neighbors beyond the mountains. . .a reappraisal of the archaeological picture is in order."

In the introduction to his study of animal materials recovered from bluff shelters in northwest Arkansas, Charles Cleland provided a history of the modern evolution of theory concerning Harrington's Bluff-dwellers. In this introduction we can see some of the roots of the reappraisal called for by Fritz.

Doubts about the supposed cultural isolation of the Bluff-dwellers appeared in James B. Griffin's 1937 study of some of the pottery found in the rock shelters. Rather than showing that this pottery was a unique type limited to the Bluff-dweller homeland, Griffin found the style similar to that of peoples who lived in the southeastern United States in the late prehistoric period. These late prehistoric Indians, called by archaeologists the Mississippians, intensively farmed rich bottomland soils, built villages, were highly skilled in pottery making and other artistic activities, and constructed mounds that were used for ceremonial purposes. They were not isolated people. A study published by Dellinger and S. D. Dickinson in 1942 suggested cultural links with peoples south and east of Harrington's Ozark Bluff-dweller homeland.

and black tip." Because of the obvious ceremonial way in which these dogs were buried, Cleland surmised that these dogs were probably kept as pets.

Other dog bones have been identified from rockshelters in northwest Arkansas. Of course some of these may also have been pets, but some not. At the Tick Creek Cave site along the Gasconade River in the Missouri Ozarks, archaeologists recovered remains of at least 28 dogs. According to Elmo Ingenthron, "cut marks on the bones examined revealed that some 15 to 20 percent of the Tick Creek dogs had been butchered and probably consumed. . ." This study also showed that the domesticated dog had lived with the Indians over a long period of thousands of years.

The scientific examination of the bones and other remains of dogs sheds interesting light on the prehistoric people of this area. Such studies bring to our modern minds pictures of long ago. Not only has the dog been with us for a long time, but in some cases people then as now valued dogs almost as much as their fellow humans! In this way, at least, very little has changed through time.

Prehistoric Plies

The museum at the University of Arkansas, Fayetteville includes in its collections a treasure trove of Indian artifacts that were found in rockshelters in Washington County and elsewhere in northwest Arkansas during the 1930s. This material was collected by crews that performed scientific excavations under the direction of Samuel C. Dellinger, then a professor in the University's Department of Zoology as well as Curator of the museum.

The collections include articles of leather, feather, and grass which are in many cases around 1,000 years old. They were protected from deterioration by the dry soils under the overhanging ledges that form the rockshelters. After their collection, these priceless artifacts were carefully stored in the museum. Because they are now protected from vandalism, they have been available for 50 years to researchers probing the lives of the ancient people who lived here.

One of the many important studies that have emerged from analysis of these materials involved prehistoric plies—cordage, netting, basketry, and fabric. The analysis was performed by Sandra Clements Scholtz whose work was published by the Arkansas Archaeological Survey in 1975. Materials from a number of shelters in northwest Arkansas were examined, including those recovered from Brown Bluff, Curiosity Bluff, Gibson Shelter, Klondike Bluff, and

Shelters Used by Various Cultural Identities

Excavations at the Breckenridge Shelter in Carroll County (near the site of Beaver Lake Dam on the White River) in the early 1960s showed intermittent occupation by peoples of various cultural identities from the early Archaic Period to the late Mississippi period, or roughly 7500 B. C. to approximately A. D. 1600. Included were those whom Harrington had called the Ozark Bluff-dwellers. Taking note of Breckenridge and other research, Cleland concluded his introduction by speculating that the major period of occupation of the Ozark rockshelters (which includes Washington County) occurred between A. D. 500 and A. D. 1400, with the bulk of the perishable materials dating to the Mississippi period, roughly A. D. 900 to A. D. 1600.

In summary, by the time Cleland was writing in 1965, it was clear that Indians of several different cultural identities had used the shelters rather than one predominant group, whom Harrington had termed the Ozark Bluff-dwellers. The perishable materials—cultivated plants, leather, basketry, and burials—were not nearly as old as Harrington had thought. The people who left the bulk of them in the shelters were culturally identified with the Mississippians, who were not primitive, isolated, or backward.

Work by personnel from the Arkansas Archaeological Survey in the 1970s and 1980s on a series of earthen mounds in northwest Arkansas shows the mounds are also part of the Mississippi period culture. These mounds are in the valley of the White River in Washington County near Elkins, the valley of the Illinois River south of Siloam Springs in Benton County, and in War Eagle Valley near Huntsville in Madison County. Similar mounds occur in the major stream valleys of the Ozarks in Oklahoma and Missouri. These mounds and the structures often built upon them served as civic or ceremonial centers where important social and ritual activities took place. The mounds in northwest Arkansas were used for at least 500 years, or from about A. D. 900 to A. D. 1400.

While interpreting the prehistory of northwest Arkansas, including Washington County, neither Harrington nor Dellinger had the kinds of information now available. What they did have was a vast storehouse of archaeological treasures—foods, clothing, adornments, and tools—unearthed in the rockshelters. Harrington was able to use these materials as the basis of a theory about the prehistoric peoples who lived here that was very appealing at the time. We can now see that the knowledge gained from these artifacts tended to focus attention on the rockshelters themselves as a central fact in the lives of the prehistoric peoples and to simultaneously divert attention away from other perspectives. That is, it is as though Harrington and Dellinger had entered an ancient attic, but thought this long-neglected attic was the whole house. It has taken several decades of work to reveal the rest of the house.

If not protected from the weather, perishable items deteriorate and disappear. Non-perishables like stone tools survive—whether they are protected inside the rockshelters or are subjected to weathering and plowing in the valley fields below. In retrospect, we can see that the perishable Mississippi period artifacts Harrington and Dellinger recovered from the shelters were unique survivors of a much larger inventory of foods, clothing, adornments, and tools used by prehistoric peoples. Today the perishables are being studied from a whole house perspective. Researchers now believe that the perishables date to a time when most prehistoric peoples in Washington County lived in stream valleys. Rockshelters served a variety of purposes, including seasonal base camps during winter, temporary hunting camps, and special purposes such as burial and food storage.

the Putman Farm Shelter, all in Washington County.

These artifacts illustrate considerable weaving skill among the people who left them in the shelters. Cords were used as rope. In one case a cord was used to repair a broken gourd. Nets were made by tying knots in cords. Feathers were wrapped on cords in order to make coats or blankets. Cane splints were interlaced to make baskets, mats, baby cradles, and sifters. Twining was employed in the construction of fabrics and bags. Combs were made from cane. Various barks and plant fibers were employed in the production of clothing.

We can be proud that the early people who made these items were highly skilled in their craft and obviously knowledgeable about the raw materials available in what we now call Washington County. We are fortunate that some people in the 1930s had the foresight to undertake the archaeological excavations that saved these artifacts for future study and to deposit these collections in a museum where they where they could be protected. The wealth of knowledge obvious in Sandra Scholtz's study is a tribute both to the people who made these prehistoric plies, and other people who saved them for future study.

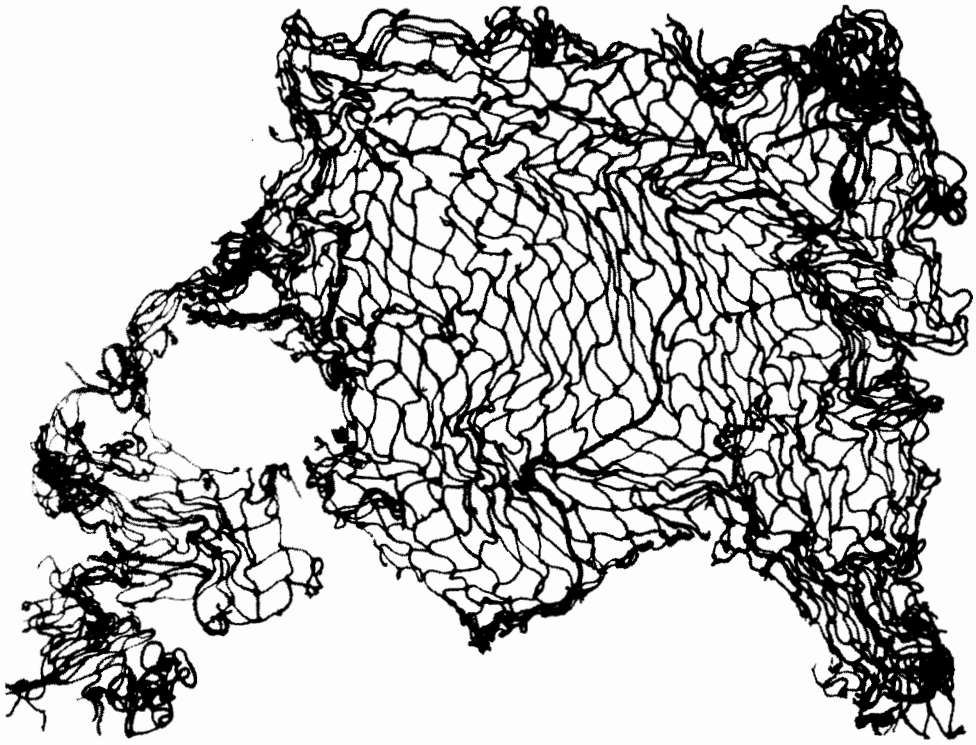
This large fragment of a net was made by knotting two-ply, Z-twist bast fiber cords made from locally obtained plant materials. The fragmentary nature of this artifact makes it difficult to say precisely how prehistoric people in the Ozarks used it.



This basket from a rockshelter in Northwest Arkansas illustrates prehistoric peoples' mastery of the patterned float weave technique. The patterned areas form geometric shapes, primarily triangles.

Washington County Arrowheads

The great bulk of the stone relics that have been found in plowed fields in Washington County are not arrowheads. Rather, they are various kinds of tools that have been chipped from hard chert.

Among these pseudo-arrowheads are projectile points that were fixed on the tips of darts or lances. Other stone tools that look like arrowheads include knives that were mounted on handles. Blades sharpened on the ends could be used as scrapers or knives. Stone drills were hafted on handles and used in the same way drills are used today. All of these tools can look like arrowheads to untrained observers. This leads to the mistaken idea that most Indian artifacts are arrowheads, and that Indians must therefore have spent all of their time making war!

Another misunderstood artifact from the county is the "ax" chipped from stone. Many of these axes are in fact hoes that were used for working the ground, just as gardeners do today. Archaeologists who inspect these artifacts usually note that the hoes exhibit heavy use wear in the form of polished edges and scratches. Another kind of "ax" is actually a

The re-evaluation of the Ozark Bluff-dweller concept is part of a broad, evolving picture about life in Washington County during the past 10,000 or more years. In addition to the people who left perishable items in the rock-shelters, many other Indians lived in Washington County during these thousands of years. Different languages have undoubtedly been spoken here, food has been prepared in a variety of ways, the clothing worn by the people has varied in radical ways, and religious beliefs have changed through time.

We tend to be ignorant about these aspects of ancient life because the tales of prehistoric residents of the county were not preserved in letters, newspapers, or diaries. There are no childhood photographs and no stories about the games children played here for thousands of years. However, ancient people left other permanent kinds of information. Our knowledge, while not complete, is adequate to make generalizations. They can now take their rightful place in a general history of the county.

The County's First People

No perishable artifacts like corn, baskets, or feather coats are associated with the very first people of the land we call Washington County. Instead, we know them from a few stone tools they made from chert found here.

The most distinctive of these tools is an arrowhead-like object that may have been used as a knife, a projectile point on a spear or dart, or used to work hides of animals. It is lanceolate (lance or spear head) in shape.

In his book Indians of Arkansas, Charles McGimsey states, "when the Paleo-Indians came into the New World they already had the knowledge of how to chip stone and work it into a desired shape. In fact, they had so mastered the technique of flaking stone that they could closely control the size and shape of a chip removed from a piece of stone and produce a point beautifully made as well as efficient in killing game."

The earliest of these stone points had large channels or flutes carefully removed from both sides of the base. These people have been called the fluted-point hunters or Paleo-Indians (paleo means ancient or remote in the past). There are several sites in Washington County where finds of these chert points indicate the long ago presence of these people or a slightly later people. Just west of Washington County in Mayes County, Oklahoma, an ancient fireplace was dated to about 9,400 years before the present. This site contained a stone point comparable to the few that have been found in Washington County; presumably the Mayes County date reflects ancient life here as well.

People in modern times would barely recognize Washington County as it existed upon the arrival of these hunters. The hills, rolling country, and streams were here, of course, but the climate and vegetation were different. During the Pleistocene Epoch great sheets of ice centered in Canada had on several occasions moved southward toward Arkansas and then retreated. The most recent glaciations seem to have taken place between 25,000 and 10,000 years ago. As little as 6,000 years ago southern Canada in the Toronto area was still under ice! On several occasions ice had covered extensive areas in northern Missouri. There were times when the near presence of the ice seems to have produced in northwest Arkansas a cool taiga climate (imagine Siberia in Arkansas!) and a boreal forest in which spruce was the dominant tree.

Worldwide sea levels had dropped because so much of the world's chopper which is usually large, heavy and shows much use wear in the form of fractures and abrasions.

If many "arrowheads" are not actually arrowheads, what IS an arrowhead? Bow and arrow technology did not arrive in Washington County until many thousands of years of prehistoric time had elapsed. In fact, it seems to have arrived here only about 1,100 years ago, at which time humans had been living here and making various kinds of stone tools that "look like" arrowheads for more than 8,000 years!

True arrowheads are small stone points, sometimes called "bird points." The concept of bird points originated with the incorrect assumption that all arrowhead-looking stone points are arrowheads. Therefore, the smaller ones would be suitable for shooting birds. In light of what the average person knew about the county's first people, this was not a bad theory. These small arrowpoints may of course have been used for bird hunting, but they were used for many other purposes as well.

The point in all of this is that Indian society was much more complex, and therefore much more interesting, than many of us have previously thought. The study and correct identification of prehistoric tools makes it clear that these people possessed a technology that was well adapted to the times in which they lived. Like modern people in the 20th century, they tried to make the most of the resources that were available to them by designing tools and crafting raw materials into the substance of daily life. Their successful adaptation to the natural environment can be a useful lesson to us today.

water was frozen in glaciers. The level of the Bering Sea was lowered, allowing the emergence of a broad bridge of land in the Bering Strait between Asia and North America that connected Siberia and Alaska. Scientific research continues on the questions of who the first peoples in North America were and how they got here, but many believe the Bering Sea bridge was utilized by a host of Arctic life forms, including nomadic groups of humans who could have made the crossing during most of the period that extended from 25,000 to 10,000 years ago. Paleo-Indians certainly appeared in North America about 12,000 years ago, and as we have already seen, they were present in Mayes County, Oklahoma, by 9,400 years ago. Even with the scanty evidence now available, we can confidently say that within the past 10,000 years—long before the Pharaohs of Egypt built their pyramids and long before the glories of Greece and Rome—the descendants of the first Native Americans made their way south into what is today Washington County.

Ice Age Animal Traces

The boreal climate associated with the Ice Age had a profound effect on the kinds of animals these early hunters would have known. A large cache of fossil bones was found at the foot of a limestone cliff just south of West Fork along Highway 71. This cache reminds us of an "attic" of perishable artifacts because the cache of bones preserves objects of a long ago time in Washington County.

Among these bones are those of many Ice Age animals that are either extinct or which disappeared from the county over the next few thousands of years as the climate warmed, making this land environmentally unsuitable for northern species of animals. The extinct species include the giant armadillo, dire wolf, mastodon, a prehistoric form of the horse, and the giant peccary. Species that were in Washington County when the climate was still boreal were short-tailed shrew, star-nosed mole, red squirrel, Gapper's red-backed vole, heather vole, meadow vole, and Andean tapir. Remains of elk, bison, and pronghorn antelope were also found at this location. Evidence of sabre-toothed tiger, mammoth, elk, and musk ox have also come from northwest Arkansas and were probably in Washington County.

People arrived here in a time of transition. Glaciers were retreating and the climate was changing. The Paleo-Indians in Washington County at this time may have been hunting musk oxen, mastodons, and other Pleistocene animals. "Kill sites" that feature Paleo-Indian projectile points embedded in the bones of Ice Age mammals have been found in a few places in North America, and presumably these animals were also hunted here. Of course we have no way to know exactly what kinds of lives these first peoples lived, but it is known that the big Ice Age animals like musk ox, elk, bison, and mastodon were relatively common and that in the glacier-influenced climate wild plant foods were relatively sparse. It has therefore been assumed that Paleo-Indian peoples were nomadic hunters, following the big game animals.

In Washington County the sparsity of artifacts suggests that population densities were low. The discovery of Paleo-Indian points in both rock shelters and on river terraces in northwest Arkansas suggests they ·· ed a variety of habitats. We can assume they were adjusting to changes, presumably exhibiting flexibility in their hunting of animals and gathering of wild foods.

By about 10,500 years ago, the large, fluted lanceolate shaped points that had long been in use were being replaced by another style ar-

The Invincible Wild Turkey

Archaeologists who conducted excavations in the dry rockshelters of northwest Arkansas in the 1920s and 1930s reported discovery of numerous evidences of wild turkey. In prehistoric times the Indians here regularly hunted turkeys and made considerable use of turkey feathers. In the Tick Creek rockshelter in the Missouri Ozarks, researchers identified over 1,000 turkey bones. In northwest Arkansas, including Washington County, turkey bones were recovered from two-thirds of the rockshelters visited during excavations by the University of Arkansas museum in the 1930s.

One use of the turkey involved the construction of coats or robes that must have been warm in winter. Down feathers, probably those of turkeys, were wound around fiber cords in order to form a feathery rope that served as the warp. The welt was formed from plant fibers or deerhide strips. When twined together this made a light, highly functional coat.

Did prehistoric people here keep turkeys in domestication? The presence of the down coats, and the great abundance of turkey bones and egg shells, has caused researchers to speculate about possible domestication. No pens where turkeys would have been kept have been found among the normally perishable items in the rockshelters. Charles Cleland, who studied materials from 57 shelters in northwest Arkansas, including a dozen in Washington County, proposed the idea that the Indians captured young wild turkeys and then allowed them to range freely in the woods near the rockshelters. Perhaps the turkeys were fed to keep them nearby. If the birds were nearby, their nests could be raided for eggs, and meat could be obtained by simple trapping.

Turkeys were still common birds in Washington County during pioneer times. According to T. H. Holder in his authoritative A Survey of Arkansas Game (published in 1951), "the early settlers made a sport of hunting flocks, or 'gangs,' of turkeys with dogs. . .The dogs, barking furiously, would run among the flock, causing the birds to fly at the tops of nearest trees. . .Then the hunters would slip behind trees and fire. . .The flocks began to decline soon after each region was settled." However, hunting was not the only pressure on turkeys. By the turn of the century, much of the forest in which turkeys must live had been cleared for small farms.

It is not easy to imagine that an animal that had had such a long and beneficial relationship with people in what is now Washington County could have been exterminated here in such a short time—but it happened, a conservation lesson for all to see. Holder reported that turkeys disappeared from Washington County by 1900. Due to soil exhaustion and the failure of numerous farms during the 1930s, the forest began to return to much of the county, especially in those areas eventually included in the Ozark National Forest. The return of the forest and the regulation of hunting benefited the turkey. In 1941, birds captured in southeastern Arkansas were reintroduced into the county, forming the "pioneers" of the turkeys we occasionally see in the county today.

chaeologists today call Dalton points, which have been found in a number of surface locations in Washington County. These are roughly triangular in shape with a flared base created by the removal of a large flake. The blade is usually well-flaked to produce serrations which forms a saw-like edge. The reason for this change in point style isn't known. However, the environment in which the Paleo-Indian peoples had lived in Washington County had also changed. The spruce-dominated boreal forest persisted, but now as the glaciers continued to retreat, deciduous forest species like oak, hickory, and elm expanded. The big Ice Age animals were also going extinct, presumably causing local peoples to seek other quarry.

The change in point styles is so striking that it seems to mark a cultural change among the prehistoric peoples who were making them. In his 1969 summary of prehistory in northwest Arkansas, James A. Scholtz referred to a proto-Archaic time, "a transitional stage between big-game hunting orientation and the hunting-and-gathering orientation of the subsequent Archaic stage cultures. This is reflected archaeologically. . .by the presence of lanceolate spear points without flutes, but whose smooth concave bases are often well-thinned by the bifacial removal of several flakes." More recently this transitional time has been called the Dalton period, approximately 10,500-9,500 years before the present.

The evidence of Dalton culture in the county is not limited to the distinctive Dalton culture points. Dalton culture peoples made other stone tools as well. Their stone adzes served for woodworking. Their spokeshaves were suitable for scraping or shaving wood. According to George Sabo and others at the Arkansas Archaeological Survey, tools in the Dalton kit "reflect the importance of woodworking to produce such items as weapon shafts, tool handles, containers, snares and traps. . .Bone awls and needles along with scrapers and chipped stone perforators suggest that clothing and perhaps other items were fashioned from animal hides. Sandstone mortars, grinding stones, and pestles were used to process wild plant foods such as nuts, berries, and seeds."

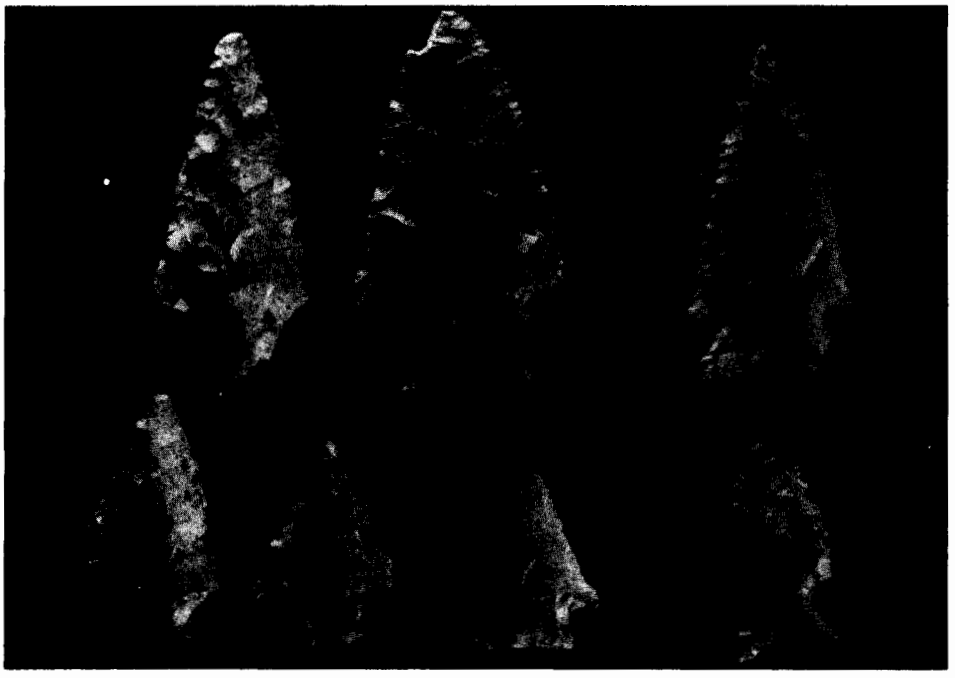
Archaic Period

Based upon the records maintained by the Arkansas Archaeological Survey in Fayetteville, Indian activity in Washington County may have increased after the Paleo-Indian and Dalton periods. While there are only a bare handful of sites on record representing these earlist periods, more than 175 sites have been found which produced artifacts associated with the subsequent Archaic period cultures. During the 1970s a survey of the White River and its tributaries in northwest Arkansas (including Washington County) revealed nearly 300 Archaic sites, and these probably represent only a fraction of the actual total. An archaeological survey done in the Beaver Lake area in the 1960s located 73 Archaic sites in that one area.

The name Archaic has been assigned to a long period dated from the end of the Dalton period, about 9,500 years ago, to about 2,500 years ago. It consists of numerous evolutionary cultural developments that connect the sparse, mobile populations of early Paleo-Indian hunting and gathering peoples with the agriculture, social complexities, and village lives of later prehistoric Indian peoples. As in earlier times stone points were used as missiles on spears or darts, as knives, or in other ways. They continued to be generally large in size, but now many more types were being produced, suggesting a proliferation of functions and styles. For the first time many of the stone points were distinctively notched on the sides near the base, a technical innovation which aided in attaching the point to a shaft or tool handle.



Collection of dart points recovered from the Moss rockshelter in Washington County during 1977 excavations. The Moss site was utilized by various prehistoric peoples from at least the Archaic to the comparatively recent Mississippian Periods, or for approximately 8,000 years. (Arkansas Archaeological Survey)

Many of the stone "arrowheads" that have been found in plowed Washington County fields were made in Archaic times. However, Archaic peoples of Washington County knew no more about arrows and arrowheads than the people who legally organized Washington County in 1828 knew about automobiles. That is, the bow and arrow was a later "invention," unknown in Archaic times. Many Archaic points were tools (like knives) or were attached to spears or darts, as in earlier times.

According to Charles McGimsey, "The difference between these two hand weapons, the spear and the dart, is principally in the length of the shaft upon which the stone point was hafted—spears had a long shaft and darts a shorter one. Both were used in essentially the same way, and, as far as we know, the stone points with which the spear and dart were tipped were not necessarily different in size. . .(Very small points, of course, were used on arrows, which are later in time). . .We find definite evidence of the use of the atlatl in the Archaic period. The atlatl is a throwing stick or dart thrower which consists of a short piece of wood, or of wood and bone, perhaps two feet in length, with a hook at one end and a hand hold at the other. A dart shaft is placed against the hook while the hunter's hand grasps both the other end of the atlatl and the center of the shaft. Use of the atlatl gives greater force and power to the dart thrust."

The Ice Age glaciers continued their northward retreat during Archaic times. By about 8,000 years ago the climate in Washington County was shifting from the cool and moist boreal world of the Paleo-Indians to conditions that were warmer and drier, perhaps comparable to conditions which today prevail west of Washington County in central Oklahoma. This was probably the time when the conspicuous prairie mounds, which are today widespread in northern and western Washington County, were being formed by the accumulation of wind-blown dust around clumps of vegetation. The great Ice Age mammals like dire wolf and mastodon were gone. With prairie conditions came animals like bison, antelope, prairie chickens, and others. (The bones of these animals were found in a rock shelter near West Fork.) It is thought that these animals of dry environments moved into the area about 6,300 to 3,600 years ago.

Plant Foods

George Sabo and others have pointed out that dry conditions probably restricted the former forests of this area to belts along the rivers. The ranges of deer and other forest animals would therefore have also been restricted. Many known Archaic period sites occur in river valleys, where the effects of the dryness would have been buffered. "Some important shifts in food-getting activities are also reflected. There is a marked decline in the dietary importance of deer, with smaller mammals, especially rabbit and squirrel, being more intensively hunted. Birds and fish were also utilized, and mussels are added to the diet in increasing numbers. . .Another shift in food procurement may be reflected in the significant increase in the quantity of artifacts used for grinding and processing plant foods."

Tools utilized for grinding and processing wild foods are indicators of a significant cultural heritage. Elsewhere in North America studies have shown that Archaic peoples probably made use of at least 20% of the wild plants available to them. These people did not have libraries filled with easily accessible, lavishly illustrated botany books. Rather, the possession of such a vast wealth of knowledge of locally-available wild food and fiber plants must have been gradually acquired and then carefully passed from generation to generation over a very long period of time.

The Future of the County's Prehistoric Past

Charles McGimsey, Director of the Arkansas Archaeological Survey, and Hester Davis, Arkansas State Archaeologist, have their headquarters in adjoining offices on West Avenue in Fayetteville. McGimsey came to Washington County in September, 1957, while Davis arrived in July, 1959. Both served as officers when the Arkansas Archaeological Society was organized in 1960. McGimsey became director of the Arkansas Archaeological Survey when it was established by an Act of the Arkansas Legislature in 1967. Davis became State Archaeologist.

McGimsey and Davis are in a sense "children" of Samuel C. Dellinger whose work, starting in the late 1920s, resulted in the preservation of archaeological materials in Washington County, northwest Arkansas, and elsewhere in the state. These materials have subsequently formed the basis of studies that continue to help us understand the prehistoric people who lived here before we did. During the 1930s Dellinger labored to save parts of Arkansas' rich and varied archaeological heritage. Beginning in the late 1950s, Davis and McGimsey labored to extend what Dellinger had begun.

The introduction to Indians of Arkansas, written by McGimsey and Davis, contains the following statement: "The archaeologists can succeed only if they have the assistance and cooperation of all interested citizens in Arkansas. Time is short. Advanced land use and agricultural practices so necessary for the State's continued economic development. . .as well as change in the land's surface brought about by construction and urban expansion are rapidly destroying nearly all evidence of Arkansas' early history. . . Everyone may assist in this effort to preserve the past. . ."

Obviously, this knowledge was critical for the survival of the Archaic peoples who did not practice large-scale agriculture. The same type of knowledge was greatly valued by the 19th Century pioneers of Washington County.

We can get some idea of how the rockshelters were being used in Washington County during Archaic times from scientific studies of sites located in neighboring counties. For example, careful excavations of the Albertson rockshelter in Benton County by Don R. Dickson indicated that the site was used as a temporary family group habitation during the early phase of the Archaic period. The shelter was also used regularly by hunting parties during fall and winter. By midway in the Archaic there was a noticeable expansion in the type of tools used by the Indians, implying a longer term seasonal occupation. Results from Dickson's excavations at another, larger shelter seem to indicate that it was used as the base camp of a larger family or even of a multiple family group.

The adaptive and evolutionary trends that had been afoot in the Ozarks for several thousand years continued, linking the late phase of the Archaic period with the early part of the Woodland period, some 5,000 to 1,800 years before the present. During this time people in the Ozarks made their first pottery and utilized a few domesticated plants. That is, the time-honored Ozark tradition of gardening dates a long, long way back in prehistory! New tools also appeared. There were new stone point styles, manos and grinding basins, double-bitted chipped stone axes, and chipped stone hoes that seem to have been used for ground-working activities.

Approximately 90 sites in Washington County have been identified as having Woodland period occupation as indicated primarily by stone tool styles. One of these places is the Moss rockshelter in western Washington County where excavations were made in 1977 by personnel from the Arkansas Archaeological Survey. This site actually consists of three rockshelters. The excavators slowly worked their way down about 100 inches, finding old occupation zones that represented 3 or 4 separate periods of shelter use. Stone tools were found that date all the way back to the early Archaic, or as much as 9,500 years ago. The top 31 inches contained various tools that seem to date to the Woodland and later Mississippi periods, including stone hoes and a stone ax as well as scrapers, pitted cobbles (which may have been used as nutting stones), and other stone tools. Between 32 and 64 inches from the top there were artifacts that date to middle and late Archaic times. It is possible that the deeper, undisturbed areas may even contain information about the Paleo-Indians.

Woodland Periods

What was the environment like for people at that time? In the transition between the late Archaic and early Woodland periods, the dry conditions that had fostered the spread of prairie habitat in the region were moderated by a trend toward more rainfall. This encouraged development of open oak-hickory forests that are still typical of Washington County today. This relationship between the former prairie and the modern forest can be viewed in some places in the county, like the University Experimental Farm at Fayetteville, where the oak-hickory forest grows on a land surface formed by prairie mounds. The increased forest cover seems to have encouraged an expansion of the region's deer populations. Kitchen debris recovered from rock shelters in northwest Arkansas indicates that by late Archaic times the Indians had shifted to a considerable dependence upon deer. They were also exploiting a wide

We are proud to note that volunteers have come forward in Washington County. On October 12, 1958, the Northwest Arkansas Archaeological Society was organized at the Fayetteville home of the group's first president, Harry R. McPherson. Besides McPherson, officers were Mrs. J. C. Ferguson, Fayetteville, secretary; Charles McNair, Prairie Grove, treasurer. Don Dickson of Gentry was the society's first editor. Within a year the society had 200 members. It sponsored an active educational program, strove to preserve and protect archaeological sites and artifacts, and to promote the program of archaeological research in the state. The society assisted the museum at the University in its survey of the White River prior to the construction of Beaver Lake.

McPherson was a native of Ohio who had worked with the Ohio State Historical Society. He accumulated a collection of pottery from eastern Arkansas that was later donated to the museum in Fayetteville. According to an early newsletter of the Arkansas Archaeological Society, "Mr. Mac has been the steam behind the founding, organization, and growth of the Northwest Arkansas Archaeological Society. . .He has envisioned the formation of a statewide archaeological organization since he first came here."

Public spirited people are trying to preserve the future of our past. According to Hester Davis, "arrowheads, dart points, broken pieces of pottery, and other artifacts are found in most places where the ground is broken by plowing or construction. But an arrowhead or a piece of pottery by itself tells us nothing. It is like a word which has no meaning unless it is combined with other words in a sentence. Only when we know exactly where the arrowhead was found, what other tools were found with it, whether there were houses or burials or firepits in association with it, can we begin to piece together the story of the Indians who lived in that particular place and who made that particular arrowhead. . .

"Every day pages from the unwritten book of history are being destroyed. . .Every time someone digs in an Indian site just looking for relics, he destroys another part of this unwritten story. In this way the past is disappearing faster than it is possible to make a record of it."

range of animal foods, including other mammals, turkeys, fish, and freshwater mussels.

One indication that human culture was changing in what eventually became Washington County was the introduction of pottery, which had been unknown to the Paleo-Indian, Dalton, and Archaic cultures. Sherds or broken pieces of pottery have been found in rock shelters dated as early as the middle Woodland period. These first ceramics were characterized by fired clay tempered with dry clay or occasionally grit from pulverized rock, and they were either plain or decorated with simple incised designs. Whatever its form or appearance, pottery that could be manufactured as needed made these first peoples less dependent upon the vagaries of nature in supplying the essential vessels of domestic existence.

Late Archaic and early Woodland times also saw what appears to have been the first unequivocal effort at cultivation of domesticated plants—what we call gardening today. Squash and gourds that have been recovered from shelters in Washington County are like those that have been identified in middens excavated in southwest Missouri dated to 4,200 years ago. This initial effort at gardening was adopted alongside the ancient traditions of hunting animals and gathering wild plants for food and fiber.

The squash and gourd originally seem to have come from tropical areas to the south like Mexico and Central America, arriving here via neighbor-to-neighbor trade. Whatever their source, they probably initiated a major change in the lives of the Indians of this region, who before were almost exclusively dependent upon the availability of wild foods and raw materials. According to George Sabo and his co-workers, "one immediate effect of even small scale crop production would be to buffer occasional fluctuations in the availability of other native food sources. Over the longer run, increasing production of and greater dependence on tropical cultigens permitted human populations to exert even greater control over portions of their environment."

Evidence of this change can be inferred from at least one place that is located in Washington County. On several occasions between late Archaic and middle Woodland times (roughly 5,000 to 1,800 years ago), native peoples inhabited a strip of land along the White River near Lake Sequoyah. These habitations may have represented base camps or perhaps even villages, but it is yet premature to say. Considerable evidence of hunting and gathering of wild foods were found there during excavations. It must have been a busy place at times because among the artifacts were many cores, blanks, and preforms—raw materials from which other stone tools would emerge. Numerous dart points were found, as well as a few actual arrow points. These are suggestive of hunting, which may have been excellent in the forests along the river. There were hand-held grinding stones and pitted cobbles. The latter may have been used for cracking acorns or perhaps as pivots for starting fires with the bow technique. There were also fragments of hoes that are suggestive of gardening. A double-bitted siltstone ax would have assisted in woodworking.

Archaeological field work in the upper Lee Creek area (in Crawford County just south of the Washington County line) indicates that Woodland people were possibly living on farmsteads or in agricultural hamlets. The recovery of agricultural tools like chipped stone hoes on terraces above the creek suggests that bottomland fields made fertile by periodical flooding of the creek were used for gardening. The nearby rockshelters seemed to serve specialized purposes including food storage, burial of some of the dead, and temporary hunting camps.

McGimsey, Davis, and their professional and volunteer associates in groups like the Northwest Arkansas Archaeological Society are trying to preserve enough of the archaeological record in Washington County and elsewhere so that future researchers can continue the kinds of studies that will shed light on the lives of the people who lived here before we did. In this respect, they are the counterparts of the Washington County Historical Society which seeks to preserve the history of Washington County since the pioneer times of the 1820s.

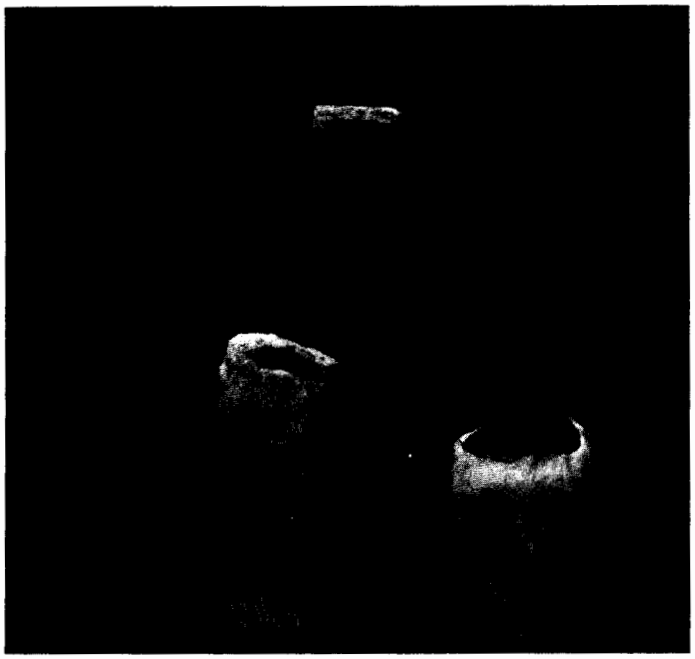
Gardening Efforts

From the initial period of tropical plant introduction (at least 4,200 years ago) the people living here incorporated into their diets a variety of plant foods subject to gardening efforts. The first arrival of the most famous of these domesticates, maize (corn), is indicated by a single kernel found in a bluff shelter in Benton County, which dates to late Woodland times (prior to 1,100 years ago). Corn is found in great abundance in shelters in Washington County and elsewhere in northwest Arkansas that were occupied during the subsequent Mississippi period.

By late Woodland times the relatively large projectile points or darts used on the atlatl by Indian peoples for thousands of years were being replaced by small stone points hafted upon arrows. Surely the revolution wrought in the lives of these people via the use of bow and arrow technology was as great as the later revolution resulting from the introduction of gunpowder.

According to George Sabo and his co-workers, "by late Woodland times the Ozarks were occupied by groups scattered along some of the major waterways . . .These groups made occasional use of rockshelter sites, most often for specialized purposes but sometimes for habitation. More permanently settled sites were concentrated on terraces overlooking fertile bottomlands. Small bits of evidence scattered amongst a few of these sites indicate that these populations were becoming more involved in the development of horticulture. . .these groups still strongly supplemented their efforts to raise crops. . .by hunting and by extensive use of wild plant species. . ."



Carved from animal bones, these beads were recovered from the Brown Bluff site in southern Washington County. Beads carved from bone, seeds, and the shells of snails and clams were common forms of adornment. (Arkansas Archaeological Survey)

The Mississippians

By 1,000 years ago, or roughly 800 years before the arrival of the first white pioneers here, the native peoples of Washington County were part of a far-flung network of complex Indian societies that has been called the Mississippian culture. During this time prosperous, well-organized Indian societies based upon intensive cultivation of maize and other plants developed in the lower valley of the Mississippi River and spread elsewhere. Mississippian culture was highly developed throughout the lowlands of eastern Arkansas during the 1500s. In 1541 Hernando DeSoto marched his gold-hungry army through eastern Arkansas and there met Indian peoples who farmed large acreages and lived relatively prosperous lives in well-ordered towns presided over by powerful chiefs.

A variation of this culture penetrated the Ozarks during this period, prevailing in Washington County and northwest Arkansas for about 700 years, until late prehistoric times, around 300 years ago. As was the case elsewhere in the southeastern United States, these people in Washington County lived in a social order whose sophistication was sufficient to marshal resources for the construction of earthen mounds that served as civic-ceremonial centers, a kind of prehistoric town square and church combined. Some individuals were buried with special objects, suggesting that Mississippi period people (like people today) recognized social rank, with chiefs or priests presumably occupying high positions.

One of the hallmarks of this period is that a variety of domesticated plants were grown in the fertile river bottomlands. Nevertheless, the ancient tradition of hunting and gathering of wild foods continued. The collection of wild foods was hardly a matter of randomly wandering through the woods and hoping for the best. Consider, for example, the ubiquitous acorn—the nut that well-fed modern people in the county are content to ignore.

Anyone who visits the woods in Washington County today knows that in many years there are good crops of acorns. As is the case today, in prehistory acorns came in many shapes and sizes. Jerry Hilliard of the Arkansas Archaeological Survey recently analyzed almost 3,000 acorns from eight rock shelter deposits associated with the Mississippi period. Five species of acorns were dominant, including white oak and post oak from the white oak group, and Shumard, black, and northern red oak from the red oak group. The high number associated with the red oak group (67% of the 3,000) suggests that these people may have preferred collecting them, perhaps because these acorns have a higher nutritional value. The acorns were parched or roasted whole prior to storage in order to prevent spoilage and worm infestation. The abundance of acorns in cultural deposits suggests they were highly prized.

Today, cows graze in a big pasture situated in the broad bottomlands of the upper White River near Elkins. In Mississippi times Indians of the region must have gathered there on special occasions. We are reminded of this time by a cluster of five mounds that rise above the field. The mounds enclose a broad flat area which may have served as a plaza or gathering place. These people were apparently careful observers of astronomical phenomena, for recent study shows the mounds were constructed with solar alignments in mind. The arrangement of the mounds demonstrates alignment with the summer solstice sunrise and winter solstice sunset, the solar equinox, and the summer solstice sunset and winter solstice sunrise.

We don't know what the exact purposes of these alignments were, but calendar-like functions come to mind, like the timing of religious ritual or the planting of crops. Were great dances lit by bonfires held in the plaza by the mounds, the hill slopes ringing with chants, drums, and singing? There were structures on the mounds at various times, but the information available from the Elkins mounds is too little to say what the structures were or what purpose they served.

Elkins and Huntsville Mounds

Clusters of mounds whose builders were culturally affiliated with the Elkins mounds have been identified in the Illinois River bottomlands near Siloam Springs in Benton County and in the valley of the War Eagle near Huntsville in Madison County (and elsewhere). More is known about these mounds. Excavations at the Illinois River mound sites revealed the presence of several structures, including one described as a mortuary house dated to about 900 years ago. Several of the mounds were purposefully constructed with distinctive cores of alternating light and dark colored sediments encased in black clay. At Huntsville, the flat-topped primary mound was constructed in three stages. Several structures were identified as having been built upon the last two mound stages. One of these dated to about 500 years ago, at which time a final cap of clay was added to the top of the mound.

The people who built the mounds shared the same culture as the people who left most of the perishable materials—baby cradles, corn cobs, cane flutes, pieces of leather clothing, and stone tools—recovered by Harrington in the 1920s and Dellinger in the 1930s (including material from more than a dozen rockshelters in Washington County). They were the same people whose talents were described by Sandra Scholtz in her analysis of cordage, netting, basketry, and fabric recovered from rockshelters in Washington County and elsewhere.

The skills these people demonstrated in making tools, clothing, baskets, and growing food also extended to pottery making. One good example is a ceramic bowl found in a rockshelter above the Middle Fork of the White River in Washington County. In Woodland times pottery had been tempered with clay or grit, but by Mississippi times the pottery was strengthened by the use of shell as tempering. The Middle Fork bowl was shell-tempered and finely decorated with the head and tail of a bird (perhaps that of a Wood Duck), an ornamental style common in Mississippian cultures of the Arkansas River Valley and the Mississippi River Valley. Its discovery in Washington County is an example of cultural links in prehistorical times.

The same kinds of links are revealed in the deliberate elements of mound construction techniques discovered through careful archaeological work. Celestial alignments have already been mentioned. Horizontal and vertical alignments within the mounds were maintained even when, over long periods of time the mounds were remodeled. Excavations revealed that the old mound surfaces were cleared of debris, indicating intentional cleaning. Burial chambers in mounds elsewhere in the Ozarks indicate ritualized treatment of the dead—a habit that continues today in a somewhat different form. Sediments used in mound construction often contrasted in color and texture and seemed to have been used to delineate spaces, such as to set off one construction stage from another. According to George Sabo and others who are studying the mounds, "these qualities of mound construction can be interpreted as symbols expressing the underlying structuring principles, which must have been very meaningful elements in the cultures of the groups who built and used these mounds."

Cultural Links of Prehistoric People

The people who built mounds and who took part in rituals in what is today Washington County shared this culture with people in the Arkansas River Valley, the Red River Valley, as well as with other prehistoric people in the southwest Ozarks of Arkansas, Missouri, and Oklahoma. The particular qualities in mound construction were associated with the prehistoric Caddoan culture, which originally emanated from the four state corner region of Oklahoma, Arkansas, Louisiana, and Texas. An important center of Caddoan culture was located at the Spiro site, which is a cluster of mounds in a bend of the Arkansas River in Oklahoma, just west of Fort Smith, Arkansas. The people who constructed Mississippi period mounds in Washington County were likely at one point associated with the Caddoan center at Spiro.

In trying to explain the amazing artifacts of the Ozark rock shelters, Harrington and others of a half-century ago were not able to see the network of cultural links apparent today. Now we know that far from being isolated, these people in what would one day become Washington County were in contact with the outside world, interacting socially and ritually with people in adjacent areas, especially those in the valley of the Arkansas River and the Mississippi River to the east.

During the Mississippi period, Indian settlements in Washington County were probably organized according to the distribution of agriculturally productive soil in bottomlands of major streams and rivers as well as in relationship to the location of civic-ceremonial centers, like the one at modern day Elkins. However, despite advances in agriculture, hunting and foraging for wild foods continued to be important in the subsistence life patterns of these people. Presumably the availability of these wild foods also influenced where these people lived. Narrow strips of bottomland soils along the rivers would have been suitable for gardening, just as they still are today. The nearby forest and river would have been an ideal place for both hunting and gathering wild foods.

Back in 1933 Dellinger's crew from the University museum excavated what is now recognized as a Mississippi period habitation. The location is a bottomland field in Washington County between Elkins and Durham a few miles up the White River from the Elkins' mound group. Then as now, the land would have been excellent for gardening, hunting, and the collection of wild plants. The people who lived there could have easily participated in the cultural activities associated with the mound center at Elkins. The crews found some kind of an "earth house" as well as three burials. Among the artifacts were a black phosphate nodule bead, two T-shaped stone pipes, pottery sherds, and various stone chipped artifacts, including nine hoes or spades. Nearby was found another "earth house" which was associated with burned logs, cane, clay daub, and a spade.

End of the Prehistoric Period

What became of these people? There were no Mississippian peoples in Washington County when European hunters passed through in the early 1800s. This is not to say that the people who made elegant pottery, erected mounds, watched the stars, and farmed valley soils "disappeared" in some mysterious way. Virulent diseases, inadvertently introduced into North America from the time of Columbus and thereafter, led to unimaginable suffering and death among native peoples, who had no natural resistance to these diseases. Professor Michael Hoffman has written, "in several areas where there is written documentation, 95% of the original population was gone within 100 years of White contact.

Archaeology at Lincoln Reservoir

During the spring of 1963, members of the Northwest Arkansas Archaeological Society (NWAAS) learned that the Soil Conservation Service was planning to construct a dam over Moore's Creek north of Lincoln. This dam would cover 89 acres. Permission was received to conduct archaeological work, which was performed between May 1963 and December 1965.

According to the report compiled by Don R. Dickson, "a comprehensive site survey was headed by Dwight Morris of Siloam Springs. . .and 26 bluff shelter sites were recorded in the area to be flooded. . .Each of the 26 shelter sites was delegated to one or more NWAAS members. . .All inexperienced members were required to attend a special instructional meeting. . ." where they learned modern techniques in "basic site mapping and excavation techniques. . ."

Dickson concluded that the various rockshelters were in use at irregular intervals from early in the Archaic period through late prehistoric times, or a period of thousands of years. One apparent village site was located. Some of the shelters seemed to have been occupied on a seasonal or part-time basis. Moore's Creek was an important place for people who lived here in the distant past.

The Lincoln Reservoir project illustrates the importance of cooperation in developing knowledge about prehistoric times. Besides Dickson and other volunteer excavators, considerable help was obtained from personnel at the University Museum, the Soil Conservation Service, and the City of Lincoln. Without cooperative efforts, much of what we know about the human history along Moore Creek would have been lost.

Single smallpox epidemics in which essentially everyone got the disease had a 75% mortality. In areas such as Arkansas it is probable that disease depletion began even before the DeSoto expedition since there was a major smallpox outbreak in Mexico in 1520-24 which probably spread north by Indian to Indian contact. . ." Was this the fate of the people who lived here?

Did the Mississippian Indians in Washington County at some point give up their efforts in the Arkansas Ozarks and go south, joining their cultural kin in the Arkansas River Valley? No one lived here permanently at the time the first white hunters made their way into the county. The native peoples encountered at that time were the Osages, who occasionally hunted in northwest Arkansas, but whose villages and gardens were in Missouri. The very top midden layer in some rockshelters contain artifacts identified with a late prehistoric period culture manifestation that some archaeologists believe may be the ancestral culture of the Osages. If this is so, at one time the Osages may have spent more time in Washington County than they did later in early historic times. Future research may shed more light on this question, or perhaps we will never know what became of the people who built the mounds.

The past 50 years has witnessed a considerable expansion in knowledge about the roughly 10,000 years of human activity in Washington County that preceded the settlers who in 1828 formally created a government here. In terms of what contemporary people understand about the land called Washington County, we have gone from relics in shoeboxes to Ozark Bluff-dwellers to an agricultural people who aligned their monuments with movements of the sun. The changes through time have ranged from sparse evidences of the Paleo-Indians who were apparently descended from those first immigrants who crossed from Siberia to Alaska on the Bering Sea land bridge, to skilled potters and hunters who learned to quiet their hunger by planting crops in bottomland fields.

Only very recently—a few hundred years ago at most—was the stage set for yet another assemblage of cultural ideas. These belonged to the English-speaker, an immigrant who had crossed an ocean in a wooden boat and whose descendants were wandering across a continent in a manner the ancient Paleo-Indian might have appreciated.

Chapter Three

Pioneer Trails to Washington County: From the Early Days to the Eve of the Civil War

"If any man had had a lock on any of his doars in those days he would have been look on with suspicn."

—John Billingsley, pioneer

In the mid—1820s a caravan of 60 relatively well-to-do families with their black slaves left Charleston, South Carolina, in order to seek their fortunes in the newly opening American West. In the York District of South Carolina the caravan was joined by the family headed by John Latta. The travels were made primarily in ox wagons. When they reached rivers, they used rafts. These families reached the states of Kentucky and Tennessee, where they apparently remained several years. The family headed by Samuel Latta seems to have already been in Tennessee, ahead of the new immigrants. Several of these families eventually settled in Arkansas Territory.

During this period, members of the Latta family made several scouting trips further west, into what became Washington County. One of these trips may have been made as early as 1826. Whatever the actual year, during that first trip a small cabin was constructed. The land was part of the Lovely Purchase, claimed by the Cherokees and closed to white settlement. No Indians were living in the immediate area, however, and whites were squatting on the land in expectation that legal settlements would soon be possible. According to Latta family history, a plow was made from the crotch of an oak tree, and a few acres of grain were planted. It was perhaps in this manner that the Lattas established what, at the time, amounted to squatter's rights to some gorgeous mountainous land that would be called Vineyard (site of Washington County's second post office, established February 21, 1829, with the name and location changed to Evansville in 1837).

Latta Settlement

In 1828 the Cherokees were forced west. Washington County was then created out of the Lovely Purchase lands, and white squatters were able to legally claim land. In 1831, several years after their initial scouting trip, John Latta, two black slaves named Dan and Ben, and several other family members collected wagons, teams, pine lumber that had been cut and milled in Tennessee, and tools. Two rafts of logs and lumber were floated and poled down the Tennessee River into the Ohio, then down the Mississippi to the mouth of the Arkansas River. The rafts were then towed up the Arkansas by a government steamboat to Phillips Landing (Van Buren), then freighted 45 rugged miles to Vineyard.

Here a settlement had already begun under Captain Lewis Evans, the new county's first sheriff. According to the Goodspeed Publishing Company's History of Benton, Washington, Carroll, Madison, Crawford, Franklin and Sebastian Counties, Arkansas, "A horse-mill was built by Evans soon after he opened his store, and for a short time it supplied nearly the whole county with meal." A few miles to the north at Cane Hill, several related families had settled and built homes by 1827.

At the Latta settlement, tents were put up and work started on houses. According to an account written by a Latta descendant, The Lord's Vineyard, "The colored mechanics, Ben and Dan, did the mechanical masonry work. . .They would work at one home at a time. Ben and Dan put in the stone foundations and chimneys, and moved to the next place. The rest of the workers hewed the logs and erected the frame of the building. Then Ben and Dan would come back and do the cabinet and inside finish work. . ."

Most of the work on the main Latta house seems to have been finished in 1832. During the 1831 trip, the other members of the large Latta family had remained in Tennessee. The families seem to have completed the westward migration into Arkansas Territory by 1833. In this final move there may have been as many as 30 people, including the numerous Latta children and the families of the slaves. The site chosen for the main house was a gently sloping hillside above a tributary of Evansville Creek that is today called Possum Hollow Creek, two miles from the state line and an equal distance northeast of Evansville on Highway 59. A log house was constructed nearby for the slaves.

In mid-March of 1833, the new arrivals to Washington County could see mountains in all directions. There were no leaves on the trees, but the sarvice trees were covered with gorgeous white flowers, and spice bush and witch hazel were blooming in the creek bottoms. Springs flowed freely throughout the area. Vultures were soaring above, and the little spring peeper frogs announced a new land and a promising season.

According to descendant F. F. Latta, "An industrial establishment was planned, developing a general manufactory, including a blacksmith shop under the Negroes, Ben and Dan; cabinet, carpenter and wheelwright shops under grandfather (John Latta); cobbler, saddle and harness shops under Eli Kelly; weaving and tailor shop under Aunt Leah Hale; and a grist mill. 'The Lord's Vineyard' was intended to be as near self-sufficient as necessary to insulate and isolate it from the outside world."

Pioneer Trails From Old Crawford County

At least 26 of the "first families" in Washington County came from old Crawford County. As constituted in October 1820, its territory embraced all or parts of the present state of Oklahoma, as well as the present counties of Yell, Logan, Johnson, Franklin, Scott, and Sebastian. Present day Crawford County was in Indian country and was therefore not included. The 1821 Crawford County tax list contained 94 names, including 26 which appeared later on the 1829 Sheriff's Census of Washington County.

According to Walter J. Lemke, "It seems logical to conclude that the 26 families. . .emigrated from the original Crawford County (south of the Arkansas River) to what is now Washington County—probably in 1827 when Lovely County was created or in 1828 when this territory became Washington County. The Billingsleys, Buchanans, Coxes, Curetons, Morrows, Tyners and Wilsons—all of whom are named on the tax list of 1821 in the original Crawford County—may have joined the Carnahan-Pyeatt trek from Pulaski to Washington County in 1827-28" (Flashback, January 1960, p. 39).

The two-story log home and several outbuildings stood more than a century at Vineyard, long after almost every trace of Washington County's pioneer day structures had disappeared. In 1958 the Latta buildings were carefully dismantled, transported to Prairie Grove Battlefield Park, and there reassembled. Modern visitors to the park may now ponder the achievements of pioneering carpenters, white and black, in a young Washington County.

Before Washington County

The pioneer efforts of the Lattas stir our imaginations, even if the Lattas were not the "first of the first" pioneers here. In fact, it is certain that many people passed through the land we call Washington County, leaving little trace of their times. The presence of other early settlers, like those at Cane Hill in 1827 and 1828, is well documented. The early, early story of Washington County is wrapped in mist and ensnared in a complicated tangle of legal actions involving the forced migration of Indians and several shifts in the western boundary of Arkansas Territory.

The Osage Indians once ranged over a huge territory embracing parts of modern day Kansas, Oklahoma, Missouri, and Arkansas. In the late 1600s, Osage villages were seen along the Osage River in modern Missouri by European travelers, and by the late 1700s and early 1800s Osage villages were seen on the Osage River and along the Neosho and Verdigris Rivers in what we now call Oklahoma. The Osages were farmers, but they also were hunters, and they raided neighboring Indians. Their hunts for deer, bison, bear, and beaver and their raids took them far from their villages. Northwest Arkansas was part of their hunting territory.

This Osage hunting territory was also coveted by various European countries. France had claimed the land from 1682 until it was ceded to Spain in 1762. Spain retained it until the land was returned to France in 1800, who in turn sold it to the fledgling United States in the Louisiana Purchase of 1803. East of the Mississippi, the rising clamor among white people for the removal of all Indians greatly increased after acquisition of the Louisiana Purchase lands. Pressure on the Osages to cede their lands coincided with pressure on Indians like the Cherokees who had extensive holdings east of the Mississippi. The Osages ceded lands in treaties dated 1808, 1818, and 1825. In terms of the future Arkansas Territory, the cession of 1808 provided lands for part of what became Washington County.

Under earlier Spanish influence, some members of the powerful Cherokee tribe had voluntarily moved west and settled in what is now northeastern Arkansas. However, as a result of the New Madrid earthquakes in December 1811, many of these Cherokees abandoned northeastern Arkansas and moved further west. There is no evidence that Cherokees established villages in what is now Washington County, but they did so in several neighboring counties. Therefore, it seems likely that Cherokees were hunting here in this period, and some might have taken up residence.

Pressed by demands for land cessions, the Osages naturally resented and resisted the activities of other Indians, like the Cherokees, who were being pressured by white settlers to move west. As the pressure increased on the eastern Cherokees to move west, so did the pressure and conflict increase between the Osages and the newcomer Indians. Warfare broke out between the tribes. In 1813 this warfare, and the unsettled conditions on the frontier the warfare created, prompted the United States government to assign William L. Lovely as an agent to the western Cherokees. In December 1817 a military post was established at Fort Smith above the Others listed in the 1821 list came to Washington County later—Mark and Richard Bean, W. T. Laremore, William Maxwell, plus other members of the Buchanan, Edwards, and Shannon families.

Several of these families that emigrated from old Crawford to new Washington County already owned slaves in 1821: William Bradford, four; Alex Buchanan, four; James Buchanan, three; and Thomas Wagnon, six.

It will come as a surprise to modern readers that these early pioneers owned relatively few horses and mules—the draft animal of choice was "neat cattle"—oxen. Mark Bean owned 35 of them and only two horses/mules. Others owned many oxen—James Billingsley owned 20 and William Maxwell, 40. Oxen were a familiar sight in the early days. Rather than the now familiar horseshoe, the distinctive ox shoe is a relic that is found around the old pioneer places.

And finally, single men in 1821 paid a tax of $1.00 (roughly five-10 times the tax paid for owning an ox) for not being married!

Ghost Story

The ghostly lore of Ghost Hollow, a rocky ravine which originates on the south side of Mt. Sequoyah in Fayetteville, is related in an article by Ron Foldvary that appeared in the May, 1979 issue of Flashback.

According to a story told to Foldvary, the incident which inspired the legend of Ghost Hollow is said ". . .to have taken place in the winter of 1853 when a young married couple from Fort Smith moved into the log house built by Mathew Leeper" a quarter of a mile southeast of the Walker and Confederate Cemeteries, atop the south side of Mt. Sequoyah, and just behind the present site of the historical Walker-Knerr house.

"One evening the young woman stood too near the fireplace and her dress was ignited. In a frenzy of fear she ran from the house and into the deep ravine some distance east of the house. Her screams were heard by her husband and some of the Negro slaves, but they were unable to reach her until she had been so severely burned that she died.

"Due to the impassable condition of the road to Fort Smith, the young woman was temporarily buried near the house in Leeper's walled garden.

confluence of the Poteau and Arkansas Rivers, 25 straight-line miles south of the modern Washington County line.

In the same year that Fort Smith was established, a cession treaty was concluded between the United States and a tiny minority of the eastern Cherokees. Despite the fact that an overwhelming majority of the eastern Cherokees rejected this cession, tribal lands in Tennessee, Alabama, and Georgia were exchanged for a 4.2 million acre reserve between the Arkansas and White Rivers in northwestern Arkansas. The reserve was roughly cornered by Harrison and Batesville in the north, and Fort Smith and Morrilton in the south. Modern day Washington County was outside this formal reserve. However, Washington County was part of the adjoining "Lovely Purchase" lands which agent William Lovely had obtained in an unauthorized purchase from the Osages in 1816. The actual western border of the Cherokee reserve (Washington County and lands further west) was unsurveyed until 1825 and left deliberately vague. The Cherokees were promised that they would have no limits to the west and that they would not be surrounded by white people. The Cherokees had no formal title to this "western outlet," but for the time being whites were not allowed to settle the lands, and the U. S. Army was ordered to evict white squatters.

Cherokee Settlers

Several historians have pointed to the reality that many Cherokees were married to whites, making it difficult to say whether the first settlers in Washington County were "really white" or Indian or mixtures of Indian, black, and white. A recent history of the West Fork community, for example, states that, "As a result of many whites marrying Cherokee wives during this period and remaining in the area, several present day residents are of Cherokee ancestry." Bobbie Byars Lynch, who has written extensively about the poorly documented early history of the county, wrote, "To say that these educated Cherokees stayed confined in an invisible line is closing our minds to history." She believes there were settlers of mixed ancestry here as early as 1808!

These Cherokees were showing themselves to be highly adaptable during this period of upheaval and emigration. When the naturalist Thomas Nuttall encountered Cherokees along the Arkansas River in 1819, he found their houses were "decently furnished," and their farms were "well fenced and stocked with cattle." Furthermore, "their superior industry either as hunters or farmers proves the value of property among them." Some of these Arkansas Cherokees were, in fact, part of the planter aristocracy, using black slaves to work estates.

The Cherokees were making themselves an asset on the new frontier, but they occupied valuable lands by treaty and had use of the Lovely Purchase lands. In short, they stood in the way of full white acquisition of the Arkansas Territory lands. As the clamor rose among whites for total Indian removal from Arkansas Territory, the Cherokees replied as best they could. Nu-Tah-R-Tuh (or No-Killer) addressed a letter to the editor of the Arkansas Gazette. "But what is civilization? Is it a practical knowledge of agriculture? Then I am willing to compare farms and gardens of this Cherokee nation with those of the mass of the white population in the Territory. . .Does it consist of morality and religion? Our people have built, wholly at their own expense, the only meeting-house in the Territory. . ."

In 1820 the Arkansas territorial legislature created Crawford County, taking in much of the western border of modern Arkansas and the

The body was later disinterred and removed to Fort Smith. Shortly thereafter a rumor started circulating among the slaves on the property that both the log house and the ravine were haunted. For years after, numerous black people reported sighting the young woman's ghost running madly through the ravine, which they referred to as 'Ghost Hollow.'"

One of the county's earliest pioneers, the Reverend John Buchanan was influential in the settlement of Cane Hill. He served as the first pastor of the Cane Hill Central Presbyterian Church and was one of the organizers of Cane Hill College.

Creating Washington County

The act creating Washington County was passed at a special session of the Arkansas Territory General Assembly on October 17, 1828. Section one of the act defined the boundries of the new county: ". . .Beginning at a point where the western boundary line of the territory strikes the northern boundary line of town twelve north; thence east with the northern boundary line of town twelve north to the western boundary line or range twenty-five west; thence north with said line to the southern boundary line of the state of Missouri; thence west with said boundary line to the southwest corner of the state of Missouri; thence south with the western boundary line of the Territory of Arkansas to the beginning, be constituted and erected into a new county to be called and known by the name of Washington; and henceforth the county of Lovely shall be extinguished."

If you follow this on a modern map, it is apparent that on October 17, 1828, Washington County embraced much more territory than it does today. It then included all of Benton County, about one-half of Madison County, and about one-forth of the present Carroll County.

eastern border of modern Oklahoma. The county seat was first at Fort Smith, then at Billingsley's Settlement (or Crawford Court House, opposite the mouth of Frog Bayou) and later at Van Buren. In 1824 Congress passed a bill extending the boundary of Arkansas Territory 40 miles to the west (of the modern state boundary), but the treaty of 1817 still prevented white settlers from establishing legal residence. The army was charged with prohibiting white entry. This prohibition was reinforced by the final survey of the western boundary of Cherokee lands in 1825—a boundary which was enforced, at least temporarily, by the U. S. Army.

Agitation by whites for the right to enter the Lovely Purchase continued. According to W. J. Lemke, "The white people of Arkansas and the legislature addressed repeated requests to the President, asking for permission to settle what is now northwest Arkansas and northeast Oklahoma. They were refused, but settlers continued to filter into the region. The Secretary of War finally released the order of inhibition, and by 1827 several hundred families moved into the Cherokee country known as Lovely's Purchase."

On October 13, 1827, the Arkansas territorial legislature acted to create Lovely County, taking in the 40-mile strip of 1824. Modern Washington County was within the Lovely County boundary. The county seat was established at Nicksville, near the present Marble City in Sequoyah County, Oklahoma. Many of the early settlers of Washington County came here after October 13, 1827.

By an 1828 treaty, the Cherokee reserve in northwest Arkansas was abandoned, the Arkansas territorial boundary was moved 40 miles east (to its present location), and the Cherokees moved to what is now northeastern Oklahoma. On October 17, 1828, the Arkansas territorial legislature created Washington County out of Lovely County, which ceased to exist.

First White Families

One of the pioneers of Washington County's old Cane Hill settlement recalled the history of that time for an article published in the Fayetteville Democrat more than a century ago. "The first families came to Washington County in 1826," stated the Reverend John Buchanan, "before the Treaty was made giving white people the right to settle in what is now Washington County. There were six families: John Alexander, two McGarrah families, two Simpsons, and one Shannon. Their settlement being a trespass upon the Indians, a command of U. S. soldiers was sent from Fort Gibson to order them off. This was done in August 1826. The settlers had each a small field of corn growing, all of which the dragoons cut down with their swords. After the soldiers returned to the fort, the families gathered up and shocked the green corn and remained at their new homes. . ."

And now, with treaties made, white settlers poured in to establish claims in the new land. Newspapers of the time reported how people were moving "to the flourishing settlements on the headwaters of the Illinois which embrace one of the finest bodies of land in the western country, watered by springs." Among these settlements were Cane Hill and Washington Court House (soon renamed Fayetteville). The Lattas were scouting the country, too, preparing for their move to Vineyard.

As the Reverend John Buchanan observed, "The line was established between this county and the Indian country, and the county was settled up rapidly."

It is also apparent that the siting of Washington Court House (soon renamed Fayetteville) was no accident. In the days when travel and communication were much more difficult than today, the court house town was logically situated in the geographical center of the original county. Unfortunately for the people living in the western and southern regions of the county, the court house town wound up in the northeastern part of the county as a result of further acts of the General Assembly that created Benton and Madison Counties in 1836 and added to Carroll County, which had been created in 1823.

Pictures of the New Land

The country that "settled up rapidly" looked different from the country of today. Much of the area, especially in the northern half of the county, was an open grassland, with large scattered trees forming oak "barrens." Forests were generally restricted to stream bottoms and some hilltops in this region of prairie and barren. The southern half of the county was more continuously forested, both along the streams as well as on the hills. Prairie Township, created in 1829, was named for the dominant feature of the land where the county seat, Fayetteville, would develop. The cutting of an old black oak tree on Fayetteville's Dickson Street in 1888 called forth from pioneer J. H. Van Hoose some memories of what the country looked like in those early days. "This tree was one of the original land marks on Prairie Hill, which was the Indian name for this locality before Capt. Magarah [McGarrah] built his first log cabin here. Sixty years ago this hill and these surroundings were not covered with timber as we have always been accustomed to see them, but at wide intervals there could be seen only a solitary tree dotting the prairie. This old oak of which I speak was one of the original or first trees that took root and grew upon this hill."

In 1834 another pioneer named David Walker wrote his father a letter and included a map he had drawn of the county, which at that time included all of today's Benton County and parts of Madison and Carroll Counties. "Where I have marked Prairie on the map, you may generally consider it valleys of from two to four miles in width between low mountains or knobs. I would here remark that the knob indicates the quality of the prairie. It is not uncommon to see one half of the knob covered with walnut, large sycamores even on the top, and other rich growth, and limestone—on the other. Post-oak, haw-bushes, sandstone, and you may well conceive how the prairie is that joins them. The Barrens are high and tolerably level. The mountains in the north and northwest are high. The (soil) is rich, particularly near the Osage Springs. The timbered land noted on the map is high and the timbered land growth walnut abundance, large cherry, hackberry, etc."

As was the case with Prairie Township, Cane Hill Township took its name from a dominant natural feature. "Cane Hill, see map, is about four miles square," David Walker explained. "It is a high timbered (up)land once thickly now thinly covered with [cane], soil two or three feet deep, small mulberry, walnut, hackberry, locust, grapevine, etc. etc. On that hill five stores, mills, mechanic's shop, a — population, etc. Southeast part poor broken mountains. Our population will nearly double itself this year."

Natural Features

A recent history of the Summers area in western Washington County reported the early settlers saw "large areas of prairie covered with a luxuriant growth of grasses and the surrounding elevations were largely bare of timber. Most of the valleys and creek bottoms were a tangled mass of wild grape vines, interspersed with walnut, elms, honey locust, green briars, and thorn bushes."

The prairie is also mentioned in Colonel James P. Neal's account of what became Prairie Grove. He told the publishers of Goodspeed's history of Washington County that by 1829, "the buffalo had then receded some 15 or 20 miles to the northwest. Their paths were still numerous, leading mainly from one lick to another. Their heads were scattered all over the prairies one perhaps on every three acres of land. These licks

Post Offices Before the Civil War

Post offices are usually established because of local need. Post offices were established throughout the county prior to the Civil War. Their presence gives some idea of where people lived. Some of these post offices have lasted more than a century, but many others lasted only a few months or years. However long they lasted, their locations and dates of establishment provide information about the early development of the county. Goodspeed's 1889 history of the county included a summary of the early post offices (p. 318-323). Much more information is included in Deane G. Carter's authoritative Washington County Postmasters and Post Offices 1829-1976, which includes other historical notes about the county. In the May 1986 Flashback Russell P. Baker provided an alphabetical listing of Post offices.

The following list is gleaned from all three of these useful sources. In general the list and dates follow Carter. Please note that many post offices were periodically discontinued, and that during the Civil War all government functions ceased. Therefore, the dates given do not imply continuous service. The post offices are listed in order of establishment:

1. Fayetteville, 1829 to present.
2. Evansville, established as Vineyard, 1829 to present.
3. Canehill, 1829 to present; variously named Cane Hill, Steam Mill, Boonsboro, Boonsborough, and Cane Creek.
4. Richland Creek, 1832; after 1849 located in Madison County.
5. Wareagle (War Eagle), 1832; later located in Benton County.
6. Mountain, 1833-1839; located in modern Hog Eye area.
7. Eutaw, 1838; lasted a few months; location???
8. Cincinnati, 1838-1911; earlier called Sylva.

were depressions in the earth, filled with water a little brackish in wet weather. In summer, when dry, they were resorts of buffalo for the salt. . .and were then known as buffalo licks. They afforded salt stock for many years after the country was settled. . ."

Judging from Colonel Neal's description, it should come as no surprise that buffalo figure prominently in the story of one of the early white visitors to what became Washington County. According to the Goodspeed account, "about 1819" Frank Pierce "came up White River trapping and hunting. On reaching the mouth of West Fork, he ascended the stream within two miles of Fayetteville, where he discovered a herd of buffalo. In attempting to kill one of them. . .he saw a band of Indians. He lowered his gun without firing, dropped under the bank and retired for the night under the friendly shelter of a large elm. . ." Goodspeed states that Pierce returned in 1828 and settled near the place where he spent the night. (This Frank Pierce may be the same Francis Pierce recorded in the Sheriff's 1829 Census of Washington County.)

The natural features of the western part of the county were described by the Germans who created the settlement of Hermannsburg (later Dutch Mills) in the early 1850s. "Not only the valley, but the flatlands on the crests of the hills and mountains are made up of very fertile soils, often overgrown with wild cherry and mulberry trees. Canes are tall and abundant; vines are found almost everywhere."

In the late 1850s, the botanist Leo Lesquereux visited Washington County. From him we have this description of the virgin forests which then existed in the southern part of the county. "From the banks of the White River, where the Shellbark Hickory, the Sweet Gum, the Maple, with Red, Black and Spanish Oaks abound, the divide, to the high waters of Lee's Creek is still a broad ridge. . .It supports a very luxuriant growth of timber. The trees grow here at an equal distance from each other, just as though they had been planted by hand, raising their straight, large trunks to a height of sixty to eighty feet, and supporting immense pyramids of branches, forming there an arch of plashing boughs. They are of the same species formerly enumerated with the addition of the thick Shellbark Hickory, and without any underwood but some shrubs of the Chincapin."

The virgin forest, the miles of open prairie grassland, and the fertile, cane-and-vine clothed soils made Washington County a highly attractive country—an open door inviting the settlers who would soon "settle the country up."

Pioneers

In January of 1860, the Arkansas Gazette interviewed an old settler of Washington County, William McGarrah, called "Captain Bill McGarah." This interview was published in the Gazette on February 4, 1860. The McGarrahs (the last name is spelled in various ways in various accounts) were among Fayetteville's first settlers. Bill, or William, was the son of James McGarrah and his wife.

According to the Gazette interview, around 1809 William and three others, "daddy, mammy, and Jack" (Jack was John McGarrah, his brother) arrived in the St. Francis River country of what became northeastern Arkansas, using a pirogue or dugout canoe as their method of travel. Bill McGarrah was about 15 years old at the time. He had been born in South Carolina and had accompanied his family to Tennessee prior to the move to Arkansas. After two years at the mouth of the St.

Justice at Cane Hill, 1839

"Violence is not pleasant to contemplate. . ." wrote W. J. Lemke in the January 1956 Flashback, "Yet Washington County owes its existence to pioneers who had a stern code and carried both a Bible and a gun. . .So, when violence came, and murder, the pioneers took law into their own hands and enforced it even to the end of a rope."

Probably the most noted instance of pioneer justice occurred at Cane Hill. Members of the Wright family had been brutally mutilated and murdered on June 15, 1839. The unbelievable savagery of the crime caused some people to suspect the Indians who lived in the Cherokee Nation only a few miles to the west. A general alarm was raised about an Indian uprising, but when no Indians appeared the minds of the people turned to finding and punishing the guilty parties. The official law enforcement structure was by-passed—Fayetteville was a long journey by horse, and law enforcement was considered too lax. Instead, a committee charged with bringing justice to the affair was formed of 36 reputable men in the western section of the county. A company of 100 "light horse" was sent out to scour the country and arrest any suspicious

Francis River, the McGarrahs floated down the Mississippi to the region where the Arkansas and the White Rivers meet, then went up the White River to Plum Bayou (Batesville). From Plum Bayou the McGarrahs explored the White River country, hunting and trapping their way west as far as the mouth of the War Eagle, where they encountered Osage Indians. Fear of further encounters with Indians seems to have prompted yet another move.

Prior even to the establishment of Fort Smith (1817), the McGarrahs left Poke Bayou and resettled at the junction of the Poteau and Arkansas Rivers, a site which later became Fort Smith. According to the Gazette account, "From the mouth of the Poteau he again beat further on, and made a halt at a place in the present Flint District of the Cherokee Nation. His citizenship there was contrary to public regulations, and he was ejected—he and three or four other settlers—by a military command from Fort Smith. The cattle were all driven to the fort, except the Captain's. He had got wind of the coming of the command, and had securely secreted all his stock in a hollow. But the cornfields were destroyed and the cabins burnt."

The last move was to the site that became Fayetteville. "The Captain can direct the eye to many spots where more than thirty years ago he killed buffalo and made camping places. . ." According to what the Captain told his interviewer, two years passed before anyone else showed up. He told his interviewer that by the time a few people had settled around Fayetteville he had entered into "business" selling "as good an artikel of them ar sperits as was ever fetch down the Massasippy." A long time he sold "them ar."

The McGarrahs settled in the geographical center of the newly created county. Only later—when land was deleted from Washington County and given to Benton, Madison, and Carroll Counties—would the McGarrah land be in the northeastern part of the county. As of February 9, 1829, mail to the new county government was be sent to "Washington Court House" (Washington honored the late President and Revolutionary War general), but the name was soon changed to Fayetteville. Fayetteville was probably chosen for a town in Tennessee that had been the home of several of the county's pioneers.

Cane Hill Settlers

By comparison with the plebian canoe of William, "daddy, mammy, and Jack" McGarrah, the advent of the Cane Hill settlers of 1827 and 1828 seems almost aristocratic. Important details of this early settlement were published by the Washington County Historical Society in two bulletins, "The Pyeatts and the Carnahans of Old Cane Hill" by the Reverend Alfred E. Carnahan and Susan C. Cruse and "Early Settlers of Cane Hill" by Ellen E. Richardson.

Alfred Carnahan traced the trail of Cane Hill all the way back to a time shortly after the Revolutionary War. "Two men," he stated, ". . .went from Charleston, South Carolina, to 'spy out' the Cumberland country, near or on the line between Kentucky and Tennessee. . .On returning they organized an emigrant train, with Charleston as the rendezvous. There were 156 wagons in the train. Among the family names were: Buchanan, Carnahan, Pyeatt, Shannon, Billingsley, White, Blair, Newton, Porter, Preston, Rankin, Marrs, and most likely, Morrow, Tennant, Pylant, Garvin, and Maxwell. . ."

Suspicion finally settled upon a farm laborer and two small farmers. A confession of sorts was obtained, and the three were sentenced to be hung in late July 1839. According t an account written by J. P. Neal, "On the morning of that day abou 1,000 people assembled at the sce of the execution. . .By 10 o'clock. . .the gallows were surrounded by a mass of surging humanity, white, black and red impatient for the exciting even fearful lest it be postponed. . . vent prayer was offered by th Andrew Buchanan. . .and th instant three writhing forms swaying to and fro beneath lows tree. . ." A fourth ma caught and hanged.

Despite the fact the acti widely supported at the t years it was asserted by nocent people had been cording to Neal, "there distinct parties in Was County, the one upho of the committee and demning it, and to th reference to the Car arouses the grey-ha

County, Kentucky, in 1809 and moved to Cherokee lands near the present Huntsville, Alabama. This being a trespass on Indian lands, these families were ordered out by a company of state militia from Georgia. Two Pyeatt families built a large flatboat and in January 1811 moved to Arkansas, following the Tennessee, Ohio, and Mississippi Rivers and arriving at the mouth of the White River in what is now southeastern Arkansas on May 15, 1811. In the spring of 1812 the Pyeatts took keelboats up the Arkansas River. In 1812 they settled at the mouth of Palarm Creek, where they trapped animals. This was the beginning of the Crystal Hill settlement in what is now Pyeatt Township, Pulaski County. At Crystal Hill they were joined by other people they had known in the east.

According to Richardson, "When it became known that the Cherokees were to be moved west from their lands north of the (Arkansas) river these Crystal Hillers. . .sent two young men, James Buchanan and Guilford Pylant (then 19 years old), in the year 1826 to look over the country soon to be opened for settlement by whites. . ." They seem to have traveled up to Batesville and traveled west from that point across the Ozarks. "The report they carried back must have been a beguiling one. . ." That same year James Buchanan returned and built a log house at Cane Hill, and in early 1827 the Crystal Hillers packed up virtually en masse and started for Cane Hill.

"Women carried their babies in their laps and older children 'rode ...ehind,'" Richardson wrote. "Looms were taken apart and packed, with ...avier parts left behind, for there were good cabinet makers in the party could replace missing pieces. The large wheel of a spinning wheel ...sually strapped on the side of a horse. The flax wheels, reels, their ...e, the kitchen utensils, everything must be packed for loading on ...ck horses."

Angeline Cross Berry, mother of Judge Millard F. Berry, on the porch of the Berry-Braun house in Springdale. Spinning wheels, such as the walking or great wheel pictured here, were an important item in pioneer households.

Some of the party came cross country, others on rafts up the Arkansas. From Phillips Landing (Van Buren), everything was loaded on pack horses and the people traveled on horseback. There were no wagons in the first party, and the only "road" was a trail marked by blazes. The first contingent reached the Cane Hill area in February or March 1827, and a second contingent arrived in November of the same year.

The natural wealth that drew the Crystal Hillers was described on March 14, 1836, for readers of the Times, a Little Rock paper. "Cane Hill is a hill 150 to 200 feet above the surrounding country, of about six miles in length and four in breadth—all of which was formerly covered with cane. . .The ascent is generally rugged and steep; but no sooner is the summit gained than the scene changes, and all appears as though it was a creek or river bottom.

"The soil is immensely rich and productive, and the growth is generally such as is found in the low lands, consisting of black and white oak, elm, sassafras, ash, dogwood, black walnut, mulberry, red-bud, lynn, and a variety of undergrowth; while the forests seem bound together with innumerable grape vines. . .Cane Hill is interspersed throughout with a number of clear running springs of cold water, which the greatest droughts and most powerful freshets cannot affect either in quantity or quality."

Shiloh-Springdale

Cane Hill was settling up rapidly, and so were other parts of the county. In the 1820s and 1830s new settlers spread widely in the county. Early settlement in what is today the Shiloh-Springdale area has been detailed by Bobbie Byars Lynch in a booklet prepared for the Springdale by the light of a pine knot or 'tallow dip' to keep the busy wife with spinning material for the next day. Wild honey supplied the place of sugar, and when the first coffee appeared, 'we tried to bite it like ye do beans, ye know, said 'Uncle An.'

"Letters were seldom received, but the advent of a missive was the signal for the neighborhood to gather 'round the 'Squire, whose learning enabled him to read to them news from the hieroglyphics; and when a like document was to be written, the 'Squire sharpened his goose-quill, and dipping into the oak-ball ink, became amanuensis for the neighborhood.

"Card-playing was an amusement, and the settlers knew where Troy Gordon's 'still' was, but 'Uncle An' and his gray-haired compeers affirm that none of the well-known evils of to-day were attached to them then. 'Hoe-downs' and reels —'none o' yer huggin' dances—were tripped lightly, and with jollity, to the tune of 'Roarin' River,' etc., which some deft musicians drew from the gourd 'fiddle' with its horse-hair strings and bow, and the gourd banjo with its squirrel-skin head and horse-hairs.

"'We had debatin' sasieties too—bony-fide (bona fide) debatin'" said 'Uncle An.' 'Pursuit and Possession,' 'Art and Nature,' and 'Which would a man go further fur—money 'er his best gurl?' were passed upon, and when it came time to walk home with some bright-eyed lass, 'we walked a leetle ways off,' said 'Uncle An,' 'we didn't clevis arms uz they do now!'"

Centennial (1878-1978). According to Lynch, "John Fitzgerald, Sr., came to the Lowell, Arkansas, area in 1825 and settled northeast of Springdale." (The Lowell area was originally part of Washington County.) "His land and many other abstracts of the Springdale area were originally Choctaw Land Grants of Dancing Rabbit Creek Treaty of 1830. This treaty gave the Choctaws land from the western border of Arkansas Territory to the 100th meridian. The northwest Arkansas boundary lines were being changed constantly by our government with the incessant demands of the white man in his western migration. With the permanent western Arkansas line established, the Choctaws sold their land to those entitled to own land in our area."

In 1834, when the government surveyed part of what became Springdale Township, "there were six farms and over 100 acres in cultivation. . .Only one family is mentioned in the survey notes and that was James Fitzgerald, the son of John. Records indicate the other families to be the Grahams, the Brandons, Lynches, and the Quinons and Fines by 1840. Patent dates do not indicate the ownership or first settlement of the land, as it was to the settler's advantage not to file until he had to, due to tax levies. Some lived on their lands forty years before filing, while others lost their lands to claim jumpers who filed on their homesteads. These claim jumpers usually sold the land back to the original owner in a few days, but of course there was a fee."

Peter Mankins

The early settlement of the Middle Fork valley of the White River in what became White River Township was celebrated by Donald Harington in his Let Us Build Us a City, which includes a chapter on Sulphur City. The first settler of record seems to have been Peter Mankins, who at the who at the age of 20 had what Harington called, "the moving-on itch that infects all young folk: the pack-up, get-out, keep-going, don't-look-back blues, the relocation yearning, exact opposite of homesickness. . ."—an exact description of what caused so many pioneer trails to converge on Washington County.

Mankins left his family home on the Big Sandy River in Floyd County, Kentucky, where his father, also named Peter Mankins, operated a whiskey distillery. Young Peter traveled west with a man named George Lewis. By 1832 or 1833 young Peter was clearing bottomland on the Buffalo Fork of the White River, which is now called Middle Fork.

Young Peter married Narcissa Mills, who bore 10 children. Of Narcissa, Harington asks, "Where did he find his daffodil, Narcissa? We know so very little of the origins, let alone the appearance and demeanor, of the wives of all our frontiersmen, founding fathers, or settlers. Her tombstone says that she was the daughter of 'Isacc v R Mills,' who was, we gather, an Indianian, but did Peter find her in Indiana or was she waiting for him in Arkansas. . .We can only visualize her, one day, sitting in the broad meadow anent Buffalo Fork, hacking away at slabs of sandstone to square them off into building blocks for a chimney. . ."

Shortly after young Peter's arrival the elder Mankins and family also moved to the Buffalo Fork valley. This new settlement was named New Prospect. (Later it was simply called Mankins, and later yet, Sulphur City.) As a kid, Old Pete had seen George Washington's Revolutionary Army marching through Annapolis, Maryland, on its way to Yorktown, where the Americans with the help of the French fleet won the decisive battle of the war. Likely young Pete was probably the "A. Mankins" listed as having carried chain during the original survey of Fayetteville in 1835.

This lovely indigo and white quilt was made by Polly Gray, who was sewing in the new county in its first year, 1828. This quilt is the earliest known example of needlework from Washington County. (Illustration from Stitches in Time by Michael Luster; reprinted with permission of the Rogers Historical Museum.)

Legacy in Quilts

Pioneer women of Washington County made quilts, just as women in the county do today. The quilters and the quilts made in Washington County and elsewhere in the Ozarks are the subjects of Stitches In Time, A Legacy Of Ozark Quilts by Mike Luster. The book was published by the Rogers Historical Museum in 1986. It includes photographs of the quilts discussed.

In the foreword, Elisabeth Donaghy Garrett wrote, "Housekeeper, gardener, field hand, nurse, doctor, seamstress, wife, mother, teacher, cook, and dairy maid, the frontier wife had a demanding life, at once relentlessly repetitive and disturbingly unpredictable. Loved ones moved away or died without rhyme or reason; life's sentence was inscrutable. The quilt allowed a woman the chance to assemble a lifetime of observation and experience in a tightly organized, sharp-edged arrangement, soul-satisfying in its clear-cut precision and logical predictability. The Ozark housewife would understand what Ellen Spaulding Reed wrote, on March 19, 1856, of 'piecing me a comfortable.' For the quilt was—visually, physically, and Another of the county's lost towns is old Maguiretown or Maguire's Store, once a thriving trade area on what is now Highway 74 near the main branch of the White River, two miles north of Elkins. (The story has been told by several people, including Tom Feathers and Juel B. H. Giles.) Owen and Mary Maguire and their sons, Hosey and Green, came to northwest Arkansas from Bowling Green, Kentucky, probably in the early 1830s. As was universally the case on the Washington County frontier, about the first thing they did was to build a log cabin. "The Maguires then built a little trading post where they dealt in tobacco, as well as buying, selling and trading anything of value," Giles wrote. A log school house was built on the Maguire place by the Maguires and other settlers in the area. The Maguires seem to have prospered, for their son Hosea built a handsome "big house" in 1850, owned slaves, and reared a large family, forming a nucleus for a growing community which, however, declined after Hosea's death in 1888. Much of the community's activity moved to nearby Elkins.

One of the earliest settlers in the West Fork area was Eli Boyd, who was born in Maryland, then passed through Virginia and Kentucky before arriving in Arkansas Territory in 1816 and at West Fork by 1828. According to a school paper written by Bernice Karnes in 1930, "This family brought all that they possessed in a two-wheel cart drawn by oxen. The trail had to be blazed as they went through the forest. The mother said that she walked behind the cart and was careful to pick up every grain of corn that was dropped. While the land was being cleared and a crop grown, the family lived on the flesh of wild animals and honey. . .At the time of this settlement the nearest store was in Missouri, the nearest mill at Natural Dam and the nearest neighbor, Major John Billingsley, lived seven miles west. . ."

Kinship and Land Choice

Many of the early settlers in the county started their lives here, not in isolation, but rather with the support of kinfolk. We can see this in the story of the Crystal Hillers who settled Cane Hill, for example. It is also apparent in the origins of Richland Township, along Richland Creek in the eastern border of the county. Once again we return to the Cherokee treaty of 1828 around which so much of our early history revolves.

According to an article by Wally Waits in the Washington County Historical Society's Flashback, the related families of Holmesleys, Masters, and Austins seemed to have entered Arkansas Territory from Missouri in about 1827, probably settling west of Evansville on lands claimed by the Cherokees. In the 1828 treaty that settled the county's western border, white settlers living west of the line were given 320 acres of land in Washington County as compensation for losing their homesteads. The 1829 Washington County Sheriff's Census showed that eight of the 33 men eligible to vote in Richland Township had been among those living west of Evansville and required to move by the 1828 treaty.

Kinship affected where people settled and the quality of the land they settled upon—just as it does today. A study by University of Arkansas graduate student Mark Hackbarth of the effect of kinship on land choice in Washington County during the 1830-1850 era showed that settling near kin was more important than settling on the very best available land. He looked at the Prairie Grove area, and especially at several extended families including four Billingsleys, 16 Buchanans, three Lawrences, nine Marrs, several Pettigrews and Rutherfords. Families which seemed to have no local kin in the study area included families headed by John P. Click, James W. Comey, Timothy Culp, Anthony Dickey, William Morton, John Onton, and Hugh Trueman.

The earliest work discussed by Luster is a lovely indigo and white quilt with a central medallion featuring a pattern of rooster tail plumes and a border of the Wild Goose Chase style. It was made by Mary G. McBride Gray, called Polly, who was born in 1800. She married John V. Gray in 1819. Around 1826 the Grays joined the restless western tide leaving Tennessee and settled at Evansville. Family tradition says the quilt dates to that year, or perhaps a little later. Luster quotes from a sales receipt that shows Polly Gray purchased "2 oz. indigo, 2 oz. madder, coffee, sugar, and 1 1/2 yards calico" on July 28, 1828, from the store owned by Lewis Evans. Regardless of when her quilt was made, she was sewing in the very first days of the county, making history as she stitched.

Other women were also busy making special quilts. In 1856, Isabella Engels worked with her mother to finish a beautiful quilt that survives to this day. Her parents, James Kinnibrugh and Jane Moore Kinnibrugh, had entered Arkansas Territory in 1828 and settled in what is today Farmington. Isabella was born in 1834. She married William Engels, who had worked for some time in his uncle's grist mill and in 1857 brought the first mechanical reaper to Washington County. Isabella's quilt is in the Democratic Victory style. As in Polly Gray's quilt, it features a pattern of rooster tail plumes, but Isabella used red fabric and did not make a border.

The skills of Polly Gray and Isabella Engels are good examples of the talents of the people who made the first pioneer settlements in Washington County. These quilts were exhibited at the museum in Rogers in 1986, artifacts of high art in the first years of the county.

"Word-of-mouth invitations summoned the sisterhood for actual quilting," wrote Elisabeth Garrett in the preface to Stitches In Time. "Sprightly, productive quilting parties rejuvenated the lonely women in the silent county. . ."

Hackbarth's research suggests that the first family member making a settlement in Washington County might get very high quality lands, but later family members tended to choose land close by, even if it wasn't as high quality. To offset this disadvantage, later settling family members tended to purchase larger amounts of land. Of course there was an excellent reason for settling nearby. Relatives provided an important pool of labor that could be easily drawn upon for jobs, such as construction of homes and barns and harvesting crops, where many hands were needed for a short time. By contrast, the nuclear, unrelated families tended to purchase smaller pieces of land which, however, tended to have higher qualities of soil.

Families with kin tended to stay in the county longer, suggesting that kinship was an important factor in stability—perhaps because related families had economic advantages over nuclear families without kin. In some cases the nuclear families either eventually married into the kindred families or left the area. Common sense also tells us that in a frontier situation the presence of kin could help families overcome tragedies and hardships that would dishearten those without the comfort and support of an extended family.

David Walker

In many cases single family members came ahead of other family members who later joined the original settler. This is what happened in the case of David Walker. Like so many early settlers whose pioneer trails eventually led to Washington County, David Walker was part of a restless family looking for opportunities.

He was born in Todd County, Kentucky, in 1806. In 1819 the family moved to Illinois, where Walker's father was a bank director representing the interests of Kentucky citizens. When David was 16 his family moved to Missouri. In a series of letters written during the Civil War, Walker related how in Missouri, "I built a cabin, hewed the puncheons, and laid the floor, and made the chimney. . .That fall I worked. . .taking the pay in potatoes which I packed home on my back at night, a bushel of potatoes for a day's work." In 1824 the family returned to Kentucky, at which time his mother was given two slaves. "This gift relieved me of much labor. . ." He went to school and later "read law," becoming an attorney.

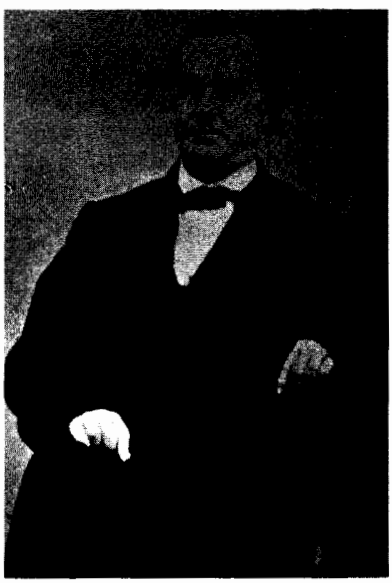
In September of 1830 he left Kentucky, arrived at Little Rock on October 10, 1830, and reached Fayetteville about October 30 of the same year. "The county had not been surveyed," he wrote. "There were only six or eight families at Fayetteville. I had but $2.75 left, and although I was pleased with the country there seemed no prospect for business. . .I took boarding with a Mr. John McGarrah. . .Upon the next day after my arrival there was a house to be raised in the neighborhood. I was invited to go out and assist them, and did so. I was an expert ax-man and carried up a corner, was prompt and always ready for the next log. . .That night there was a dance at Tom Stevens'. . .I declined going to the dance. . .I wished to be sociable, but not familiar. . ."



Judge David Walker.

Two weeks later he commenced his law work in the Crawford County Circuit. The year 1832 marked the first of a string of elective offices: prosecuting attorney in 1832; the territorial legislature in 1835; delegate to the convention which framed Arkansas's 1836 constitution; state senator in 1840; justice of the Arkansas Supreme Court in 1848. The two-story brick house he built in 1847 stands today on West Center Street in Fayetteville. This house was later sold to a prominent Fayetteville merchant, Stephen K. Stone.

This house on the West Fork of the White River belonged to Judge David Walker.

"Uncle Buck" Buchanan

One the emigrants of 1829 was the Reverend Andrew "Uncle Buck" Buchanan, a minister of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church. In the early spring of 1829, Uncle Buck and family and two "man servants" left Warren County, Kentucky, and took passage on a little boat, the "Traveler." At the mouth of the Cumberland River they transferred to the "Daniel Boone," which carried them to the mouth of the White River in southeastern Arkansas Territory. The family then traveled up the Arkansas River to Little Rock on the "James O'Hare," and then on the "Facility" to Frog Bayou, Crawford County. Here the family remained for a short time.

Uncle Buck and his two slaves went to Cane Hill where three of his brothers were living. Here he was told of a good place to settle six to seven miles east where there was a large spring at what would become the center of Prairie Grove. According to the account written by Colonel James P. Neal, Sr., "He was much pleased with the prospect, but another old pioneer named Tom Wagnon, known as a great hunter, had while hunting for elk and bear found this spring and laid claim upon it. He had made some improvements such as cutting down a post-oak tree and burning a hole in the top of the stump in which to pound the corn of which he made his daily bread."

Uncle Buck told Wagnon that "he would like to make his home beside that flowing fountain of clear cold water. The old hunter very generously offered to be neighborly and courteous to strangers, especially to a preacher, and told him that he would take his pony and gun and look over the adjacent hills and valleys and if he could find another spring not claimed by anyone else, he would let him have his improvements. . .He shouldered his old flintlock gun and started out. . .after two days search, [he] returned saying he had found another spring that would answer his purpose and that if Uncle Buck would come to his new home when he got settled down and preach two good sermons, he would let him have the claim on the spring. . .The spring and branch were alive with small fish, and the surrounding country abounded with birds and prairie chickens."

With the site selected, the rest of the family came up from Frog Bayou. The family arrived at Marrs' Creek on September 5, 1829. The Buchanans were accompanied to the new homestead by friends and relatives from Cane Hill. Isaac Marrs, an earlier settler, took the Buchanan newcomers to a place "where there were some ashes, part of a back-log and some chunks, an old face-camp and a dilapidated camp-lamp. 'Here,' he said, 'I kindled the first camp fire and built the first face-camp that was ever made in this valley by a white man.'"

A picnic was spread, and later there was a religious service. "Uncle Buck got out his Bible and hymn book and proceeded to talk to the assembled crowd. . .His talk was mostly about their old friends and neighbors. . .During the singing they all shook hands around; then prayer was offered; blessing were asked. . .and the little group of pioneers was dismissed. . ."

In Flashback for April 1952 Walter Lemke wrote that Andrew Buchanan was "one of the greatest of the pioneer preachers . . .He preached all over northwest Arkansas and southern Missouri as an itinerant circuit rider. In his will he left all of the land that Prairie Grove now occupies to Cane Hill College." The spring around which the Buchanans settled is today located in Mock Park on Prairie Grove's main street, which appropriately is named Buchanan Street.

Mayfield

*The people in this community in northeastern Washington County wanted to name their postoffice Macedonia, but when it was discovered there was already a Macedonia in Arkansas, they settled on Mayfield, in honor of the family which has so many members in the area. This fact and others appeared in "The History of Mayfield" by Bobby Fultz (*Flashback, February 1953).

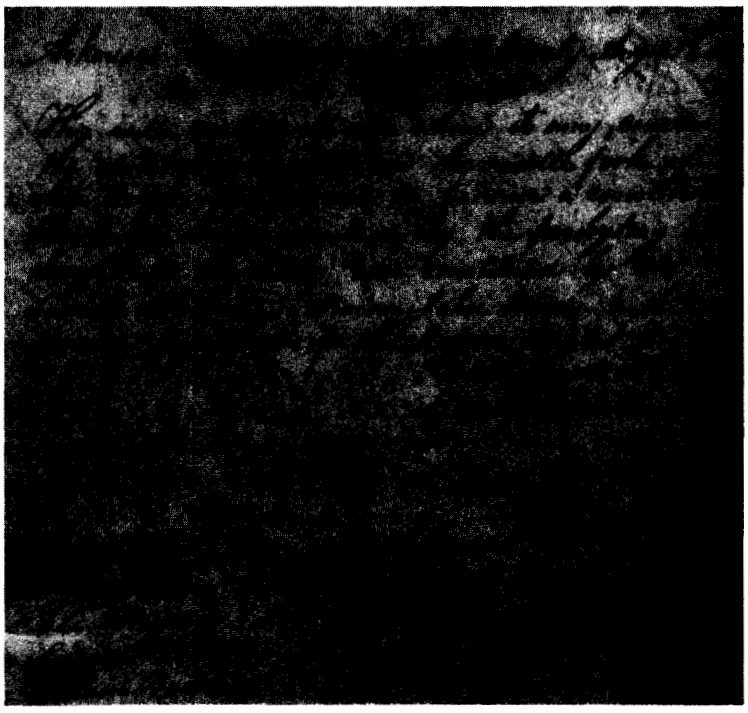
In the early days, Methodist camp meetings were held along Brush Creek in this community. One of the oldest standing houses in the community dates to about 1879, and it is said the wood came from Peter Van Winkle's sawmill. In 1886 a water mill was installed on Brush Creek, which washed it away several times. In 1897 a mill, blacksmith shop, and a store were built in the community. The following year saw the opening of a post office and the construction of a new school. W. H. Shaffer taught 99 students there in 1899.

The Cumberland Presbyterians had tremendous influence in the early days of the county. According to Chris Catalfamo-Serio's study, The Effect of the Civil War on Ozark Culture, the reason the denomination "made so much headway so early, especially in the Cane Hill area, was because the first great clans of settlers that came there, including the Buchanans, were circuit-riding preachers who spread the Cumberland Presbyterian faith throughout the area after establishing it at Cane Hill."

Prior even to the establishment of the county, the Reverend Guilford Pylant and James Buchanan scouted this area ahead of the Cane Hillers of 1827. In 1828 the Cane Hill Cumberland Presbyterian Church was organized with services held in a log school house. Catalfamo-Serio quotes from a description of the Cane Hill church during the 1850s given by Rosetta Cooper: "By rigid custom the women of the congregation sat on one side, the men on the other. I blush to chronicle the fact that our fathers and brothers. . .did not hesitate to chew tobacco during the service, and the filthy accumulation of much spitting seems now a thing incredible. . .The pulpit was a queer round boxed up affair. . .Three ministers could sit with ease inside and only one head and face were visible when seated. When standing, only the breast could be seen above the cushion on which the Bible rested."

Camp Meetings

The Cumberland Presbyterians were firm believers in camp meetings. Many of these revivals were held in brush arbors built in the woods. According to a report written in 1846 by the famous missionary and minister, the Reverend Cephas Washburn, the Cumberland Presbyterians were shouters whose camp meetings aroused "strong excitement of animal passions, shoutings, noise and disorder."



In August 1836 a group of four men and three women met on the Middle Fork of the White River to form the Regular Baptist Church of Christ. The name of the church was later changed to the Regular Baptist Church of Christ on the West Fork. The congregation's records survive today, providing insight into the life of a pioneer church. (Bob Besom)

Their religion, he wrote, subsists "almost entirely on the strong excitement of feeling. . ." They were also "strongly and decidedly sectarian and especially prejudiced against. . .Presbyterians" from whom they had split early in the 19th Century.

According to a Flashback article by the Reverend William Sherman, "Thornsberry, A Famous Old Methodist Camp Ground," there were at least six camp meeting sites in Washington County in the pre-Civil War period that were used year after year: Salem (near Cane Hill), Goshen, Macedonia (now Mayfield), Bethlehem (near Dutch Mills), Greathouse Camp Ground, and Thornsberry. The latter was 12 miles west of modern Springdale near the Washington-Benton County line. Established in 1860, Thornsberry endured as a place for revivals for many years.

At Thornsberry, the Methodists constructed a 40 by 60 foot camp shed, covered the ground with straw, and lighted the building with tallow candles and kerosene lamps. Families constructed one room log cabins for use during the meetings. Others lived in wagons, tents, or brush lean-tos. Meetings, which often lasted 10 days, were at first held during the third and fourth weeks of September, and later the second week of August.

According to Sherman, "The schedule for services was a strenuous one. In the morning, a horn would be blown to awaken the sleepers, who would repair at once to the shed for morning prayer. After breakfast they would visit among themselves, until time for the morning service at 11 o'clock, and then again preaching at 3 p. m. and at early candle-lighting. Before the evening service the men would go to a grove on the hillside southeast of the camp and the women would go to a grove west of the camp, for a 'grove prayer meeting'. Sometimes the power would come

By Oxen to the Camp Meeting

In 1925, when Mrs. M. A. Yates of Clyde was 88 years old, she was interviewed by L. G. Chalmers, and a story appeared in the Enterprise State American, a weekly publication of John Brown College (now University) on March 18, 1925. The article was reprinted in Flashback in May 1971.

"Traveling in an ox-wagon would, no doubt, seem very slow to the people of the present generation, who ride in automobiles and airplanes, but many of the early settlers in Northwest Arkansas drove oxen as far as 50 miles to attend camp meetings. . .

"Mrs. Yates has lived in, or near, Clyde for almost eighty-five years, having come with her parents from Tennessee in 1840, when she was three years old. She is one of the few people yet living who remember the old time camp meetings. . .

"Each year several days before the meeting began, the men loaded wagons with the necessary household goods and drove to the grounds where they worked for several days in making final preparations.

"A large shed stood in the center of the grounds and around this the cabins were grouped, for many of the families built log cabins in which they lived during the meetings. Others camped on the grounds living in covered wagons or tents. . ."

down upon them and they would return to the camp singing and shouting. . .At times they would sing and pray until after midnight. . ."

The camp meetings were much more than religious activities. Camp meeting was a time when people from far away gathered to socialize. It was a time when work on the farm was put aside. As Chris Catalfamo-Serio wrote, "Camp meetings helped to calm the natural disorder of the backwoods, or at least translated its chaos into religious emotionalism."

Methodist Reverend Josiah Trent and a slave boy pitched a tent in what is now Farmington in 1828. He married Sarah Wolsey and had 11 children. According to one of the descendants, "There were only three sons. Each was named for Methodist preachers. . .Their home was the stopping place for preachers. My father laughingly said that he was grown before he knew there were any pieces of chicken but drumsticks."

The Methodists in Fayetteville date to 1832 when a meeting was held at the home of Lodowick Brodie, but a preacher had been assigned to the "Washington Circuit" as early as 1827. According to Deane Carter's history of the Fayetteville Methodists, Brodie "was active in business, part of the time in partnership with his father-in-law, A. B. Anthony. The county court records list Brodie as the owner of eight slaves at one time. He was active in the real estate market, owner of building lots bought at the first auction of city lots in Fayetteville, and donor of the site for the first church building on West Center Street. Mr Brodie was one of the incorporators of. . .Miss Sawyer's School. . ."

According to W. J. Lemke, "The first Baptist churches in Washington County are given on page 125 of the history of Arkansas Baptists as follows: Baptist Ford 1830; White River Church 1830 or earlier. The Spring River Association at its 1830 session arranged for a camp meeting at this White River Church with Elders David Orr and R. Kezee in charge. It was located on Middle Fork of White River." According to the Goodspeed history, the Friendship Baptist Church was organized about three miles southeast of Springdale in 1847. Campbell's Fayetteville history notes that a Missionary Baptist congregation was organized in 1858.

Black Congregations

The black people of Washington County worshipped here in the years before the Civil War, but details are few. Religious meetings were conducted by black people in a locale called Happy Hollow, northeast of Cane Hill, but these seem to date to the post-Civil War era. There were enough black people in the Cane Hill area before the war, however, to suggest there was likely a black congregation there. In 1908 there was a black school, Methodist church, and cemetery on land owned by J. W. Bean on the edge of Lincoln; does this date to Civil War days? Churches were one place black people could exercise freedom during slavery days; it is highly likely that a number of small black congregations existed in those townships where slaves were numerous.

According to Campbell's history of Fayetteville, the congregation that worships at St. James Methodist, corner of Willow and Center, may date to times when slaves worshipped in a small building behind the white Methodist church when it stood on W. Center. The present brick building was constructed in 1907. Campbell states that "The Episcopal church. . .had a gallery for 'colored help' in that church" before the Civil War. "The negro Baptists had an organization since before the (Civil) war, also. 'Squire Jahagen,' personal servant of Mathew Leeper, became a Baptist preacher after freedom came, and spent his life here." Campbell states that their "first house of worship" was torn down about 1922. In

A letter of dismissal given in February 1855 to departing congregation member Joel M. Brown attested to the fact that he was "a member in good standing" of the Middle Fork Regular Baptist Church of Christ. (Bob Besom)

1988 the church moved into a new building adjacent to the old one at the corner of Willow and Mountain. The old building was torn down. A third church serving the black community, the Church of Christ at Willow and Fourth Streets, dates to a more recent time.

History of White Churches is Better Known

According to Goodspeed, "The West Fork Christian Church is probably the oldest organization of the followers of the teachings of Alexander Campbell in Washington County. It was organized in 1837. . ." A Christian congregation was meeting on the Middle Fork of the White River in 1840. The Reverend Robert Graham organized a congregation at Fayetteville in 1848, with about 50 members. (The beautiful old brick building that stands today at 220 N. College was constructed in 1913.)

The county's Episcopal congregation dates to spring 1848, when the Reverend W. C. Stout presided at a meeting in Fayetteville. The fine old brick building in which this church now meets, 224 N. East Street, was constructed in 1888. Catholic congregations in the county can claim lineage back to about 1844, when the Reverend John Cary purchased land near Goshen and said what was, according to William Campbell, "the first Holy Mass in this county."

In short, according to William Campbell, the pioneer ministers "came with their gospel messages, and enthusiasm, and stirred the people to constitute churches. . ." The churches and the numerous educational endeavors associated with them form a vital part of the county's early history.

Prepared for the Wilderness

The people who pioneered Washington County were in many cases well-prepared for their undertaking. David Walker, for example, was already skilled at building as well as practicing law. The Cane Hillers brought their looms and apple tree seedlings with them. Many people had pioneered elsewhere and were therefore pre-adapted to life on the edge of civilization.

The Cane Hillers of 1827 came as groups of families that already had considerable experience in creating settlements (Crystal Hill in Pulaski County, for example) prior to their arrival here. As related families, they combined the many skills needed for success in a raw country—blacksmithing, gristmilling, hide tanning, house raising, not to mention education and religion.

In South Carolina the Lattas had a business in which they employed journeymen wheelwrights, or wagon and plow makers. "They did the woodwork," a Latta relative wrote, "and Father and Brother Thomas and Andy the ironwork of wagons and plows and all kinds of farm implements. . ." In the final move to Vineyard, near Evansville in Washington County, the Lattas brought with them milled pine lumber to use on the floors, plus premade doors, windows, and casings. This preparedness seems to be the key to understanding how Washington County so quickly developed into the leading county in the state.

Jerry Hilliard of the Arkansas Archaeological Survey analyzed this rapid early development in his study of Fayetteville during the territorial period. According to Hilliard, "As a result of Federal appointments, several families came to Fayetteville from 1828 through 1832. Archibald Yell, later the second governor of the state of Arkansas, came as a Federal judge, appointed by President Andrew Jackson. Matthew Leeper came from Tennessee after being appointed Receiver of the Land Office by Jackson. Others, notably David Walker, came to practice law in Arkansas Territory.

"A large percentage of the town's population was relatively well-educated, and many families were economically well-to-do. The 1840 census shows that only four of the 157 whites could not read or write. The Fayetteville area became an early leader in the state's higher education. . .

"In the 1830s Fayetteville became a regional service center for the greater agricultural hinterland. The Circuit Court, U. S. Post Office, and Fayetteville Land Office District, which served all of northwest Arkansas Territory, brought people and business to the town from the surrounding area."

Archibald Yell

A marker set on a native stone pillar at the corner of Seventh Street and South College Avenue, Fayetteville, is inscribed:

"1833, Waxhaws, Home of Archibald Yell, Governor, Congressman, Soldier, Killed at Buena Vista 1847, U. S. W. V. 1928."

Archibald Yell was perhaps the most celebrated person of Washington County (and Arkansas) of the 1830s and 1840s. According to a biographical sketch prepared by Michael B. Dougan for The Governors of Arkansas, he was probably born in Tennessee, in either 1797 or 1799, in a slave-holding family. His military career began with the War of 1812, when he was barely a teenager. "Yell took part in the Battle of New Orleans," Dougan wrote, "where he attracted the favorable notice of the victorious commander, General Andrew Jackson."

Waxhaws, Fayetteville home of Archibald Yell. Unfortunately, efforts to save this historic home failed.

In 1818 he served in the Seminole War, then returned to Tennessee and studied law. In 1827 he was elected to the Tennessee legislature. During the campaign of 1830 he was part of a political brawl that caused him to leave Tennessee for Arkansas Territory, where he received an appointment from President Andrew Jackson.

His fate became entwined with that of Washington County as a result of his appointment by Jackson as a circuit judge. At Fayetteville he built Waxhaws, a colonial style one-story structure with fireplaces at either end, and painted white in a time when most structures in the county were unpainted or made of logs. According to Dougan, "Although Yell did not demonstrate extraordinary legal talent, his personal qualities made him a success throughout his wide circuit."

Yell was an active member of the Masons, serving as state grand master in Tennessee and later helping to organize a chapter at Fayetteville. (His career as a Mason in Washington County is commemorated by a marker in front of the Washington County Courthouse.) In 1836 he was elected as Arkansas's first Congressman, and in 1840 as Arkansas's second governor. As a politician, Yell seems to have been unmatched in his time. In 1844 he again ran for Congress, this time against a prominent fellow Washington County resident, David Walker. In his sketch of Yell, Dougan quotes the following campaign story that shows Yell as a "man of the people," as well as being a man of his times:

"When on the way to Yellville to fill an appointment they stopped on the wayside at a shooting match in progress for beef. Judge Walker's conscientious convictions cut him off from either shooting for beef or indulging in a drink. Yell after shaking the hands of every man and boy on the ground, bought a chance in the match for beef, and fortuitously made the best shot and won first choice. The crowd yelled and hazzaed for Yell, whilst Judge Walker looked on in calm and cold stoicism and some degree of disgust. Governor Yell inquired for the most necissitous [sic] widow in the vicinity, and sent his beef to her. Next he sent for a jug of whiskey and tipped glasses with the voters. These attainments and achievements filled the estimate of congressional qualifications in the opinion of the sovereign electors (Hallum, Biographical and Pictorial History of Arkansas, p. 117)."

Yell's "Mounted Devils"

Yell won the election, but with the coming of the Mexican War, he left Washington and returned to Arkansas. He enlisted as a private and was then elected colonel in the Arkansas Mounted Volunteers. It seems to have been a "popular war" since Washington County itself raised a company with Stephen B. Enyart elected captain. Of approximately 100 men in this company, most were enrolled at Fayetteville on June 9, 1847, according to a roster published in Flashback in June 1955. These were young men, mostly in their late teens or early twenties, living in what was then the far west, full of adventure, wild and wooly and unused to military discipline. According to Dougan, Yell ". . .had plenty of problems as a military commander," not the least of the problems being attempts to control the Arkansas volunteers, who came to be called "Colonel Yell's Mounted Devils."

As United States forces were invading Mexico, the Mexicans struck back with guerrilla tactics. According to a history of the war by Robert Johannsen, To the Halls of the Montezumas (p. 37), the Arkansas volunteers were "employed as scouts and occupying outposts (and) had suffered more than others from guerilla attacks. At the same time, they had the reputation of being a particularly undisciplined lot, 'wild and reckless fellows, with the. . .firm belief that their state could whip the world and Mexico in particular.'" During the approach to what became the Battle of Buena Vista in February of 1847, one of the Arkansas volunteers was found murdered. "Swearing revenge, they overtook a group of Mexican peasants who had sought safety in the mountains and began an 'indiscriminate and bloody massacre of the poor creatures.' As many as thirty men, women, and children were murdered before a company of Illinois volunteers arrived on the scene and restrained the Arkansans."

Yell's reputation as a commander was tarnished, but Johannsen points out that while roundly condemned, this brutality on the part of the Arkansas volunteers was apparently mild compared to that of the Texas Rangers.

Yell died on February 23, 1847, "with his boots on" while attempting to rally his regiment, which had been routed during an attack by Mexican lancers in the Battle of Buena Vista. A measure of the esteem in which this pioneer soldier and politician was held can be seen in what must have been one of the largest assemblies in northwest Arkansas up to that time. According to Melinda Meek's "The Life of Archibald Yell," published in the Arkansas Historial Quarterly, a crowd of 4,000 gathered at Waxhaws when Yell's remains were returned to Arkansas in August. [An excellent biography of Yell written by William Hughes was published too recently for inclusion in this account—Author.]

Albert Pike, a political opponent of Yell's, had this to say about him in later years. "Archibald Yell was a worthy and honorable man; an officer of the government, of unblemished integrity; a sincere devotee of the interests of his country; a man of a kindly nature, amiable and obliging, and of heroic bravery. Frank, open, free-spoken, he harbored no secret malice." Walter J. Lemke considered Yell one of the greatest figures in the county's history. In a review of Charles Morrow Wilson's novel about Yell, Road to Glory, Lemke wrote, "Arch Yell was a romantic and heroic figure. . .From the day the untutored country lad joined a wagon train in Tennessee as a drover until the day he galloped against Santa Ana's veterans at Buena Vista he had his eye on the 'road to glory.'"

Black People

There is no particular monument to the black men, women, and children who helped pioneer Washington County, but slavery came right along with the initial wave of settlers, and slaves performed a great deal of back-breaking "grunt" labor in those early days. They helped in the basic "building" of the county.

In the first census of the county, conducted by Sheriff "Colonel" Lewis Evans in 1829, there were 744 free whites and 84 black slaves—10 percent of the population. By age, these slaves were young: 26 were in the age range of 16 to 44, and 56 in the 15 years or younger category. They were owned by 20 leading families.

A look at the returns from the 1830 census of the county gives some idea of how slavery and slave labor contributed to early times here. The Cane Hill settlers owned many slaves. Jacob Pyeatt, who arrived in 1827, owned five slaves, as did Samuel Carnahan. Andrew Pyeatt owned four slaves. Robert Buchanan, who helped organize the first church at Cane Hill, owned three slaves. Andrew Buchanan, who was linked with the Cane Hill group but went on to what became Prairie Grove, owned three slaves.

Lewis Evans, who settled what became Evansville and served as the first county sheriff, owned eight slaves in 1830. Did they run the horse-mill that ground corn in the first days of the county? John Wilson, the county's first surveyor, owned four slaves. Solomon Tuttle, an early settler at Mt. Comfort, owned four slaves. John Holt, an early settler at Walnut Grove, owned six slaves. William Weddington, who served on the county's first grand jury, owned seven slaves. The Sweeney listed in the census as owning four slaves is presumably of the same family who kept one of the county's first hotels, at Fayetteville.

The family history of the Lattas includes numerous references to the slaves who helped build and sustain the pioneer settlement at Vineyard. The following story concerns two slaves, Ben and Dan: "They were great, powerful, shining black negroes of a tribe not like the rest of grandfather's slaves. My mother used to say that they were each more than six feet, three inches in height and resembled Nubians. . .They had been trained by Grandfather John Latta and were the finest mechanics ever to come into the country, excellent blacksmiths, wheelwrights, wagon makers, cabinet makers, carpenters and stone masons. . .Grandfather used to hire Ben and Dan out to surrounding settlers. They were required to save a portion of their pay to purchase their freedom so that when they were of a certain age they would be free. (This money was used to buy land, stock and farming tools and to build a cabin when they were freed. They were given their freedom. . .)". According to James Doolin's article on slavery in Washington County, one of the Lattas who died in 1834 emancipated his slaves and left them a bequest.

Doolin points out, "In Washington County, slavery was out of its natural element. There were no large plantations, no fields of sugar cane or rice paddies, no precious ores to be mined. . .What effect did these

Aunt Adeline

"I was born a slave about 1848 in Hickman County, Tennessee," said Aunt Adeline, then living at 101 Rock Street, Fayetteville. The year was 1937 and Adeline was 89 years old. She was telling her story to Mrs. Zillah Cross Peel, who had a strong interest in the history of the county. The story was collected as part of a plan by the Federal Writer's Project to preserve the oral history of black people who had once been slaves. These "slave narratives" are available on microfilm in the University of Arkansas Mullins Library.

According to Mrs. Peel, "Aunt Adeline has been a slave and a servant in five generations of the Parks family. Her mother, Liza, with a group of five Negroes, was sold into slavery to John P. A. Parks, in Tennessee, about 1840."

Adeline told Mrs. Peel the following: "When my mother's master came to Arkansas about 1849, looking for a country residence, he bought what was known as the old Kidd place on Old Wire Road, which was one of the Stage Coach stops. . .We had a big house and many times passengers would stay several days and wait for the next stage to come by. It was then I earned my first money. I must have been about six or seven years old.

Peter Van Winkle was a Northwest Arkansas pioneer who was important in the area's development. He owned a great deal of timber land and other property and operated several thriving lumber mills in the area. He supplied the lumber for Old Main at the University of Arkansas, Fayetteville. The Van Winkle Hotel in Fayetteville, which later burned, was said to have been the largest wooden structure in Arkansas.

One of Mr. Parks' daughters was about one and a half years older than I was. We had a play house back of the fireplace chimney. We didn't have many toys; maybe a doll or two made from a corn cob, with a dress made from scraps and a head made from a roll of scraps. We were playing church. Miss Fannie was the preacher and I was the audience. We were singing 'Jesus my all to Heaven is gone.' When we were half way through with our song we discovered that the passengers from the stage coach had stopped to listen. We were so frightened at our audience that we both ran. But we were coaxed to come back for a dime and sing our song over. I remember that Miss Fannie used a big leaf for a book.

"I had always been told from the time I was a small child that I was Negro of African stock. That it was no disgrace to be a Negro and had it not been for the white folks who brought us over here from Africa as slaves, we would never have been here and would have been much better off.

"We colored folks were not allowed to be taught to read or write. It was against the law. My master's folks always treated me well. I had good clothes. Sometimes I was

Slave Holdings

W. J. Lemke's analysis of the county's 1836 tax lists showed that "The Bean brothers of Cane Hill were the county's largest slave holders. Richard Bean assessed 15 slaves and Mark Bean 14 slaves. Leonard and Willis Wallace jointly paid tax on 13 slaves. M. J., Joseph, and Wm. Ake paid taxes on nine slaves. The Reverend Andrew Buchanan assessed eight slaves. John Tilly assessed his eight slaves at $3,000. Ludovic Brodie paid taxes on 10 slaves in 1836. Judge Seborn G. Sneed assessed three slaves in 1836 but four years later (1840) he paid taxes on nine slaves assessed at $5,900. . ."

The numbers of slaves in Washington County grew throughout the pre-Civil War period: 883 in 1840, 1,199 in 1850, and 1,493 in 1860, ranging from about 10 to 12 percent of the total population. As shown by Gordon Morgan in Black Hillbillies of the Arkansas Ozarks, by 1850 and 1860 the slave population was heavily concentrated in Illinois, Cane Hill, Prairie, and Richland Townships (or in modern day locations, the Cincinnati-Summers area, Cane Hill area, Fayetteville area, and the Elkins area).

By 1850 several large slave holdings had developed in the county. Mark Bean and Richard Bean were recorded as owning 34 slaves each in that census. As early as about 1819, they had owned slaves and operated a salt works on the Illinois River near its junction with the Arkansas River, 50 miles west of Ft. Smith. This was on Lovely Purchase lands that were subsequently granted to the Cherokees in the treaty of 1828. Mark Bean received 320 acres as compensation for lands lost in the 1828 treaty. In later years in Washington County, Mark Bean owned a cotton gin and a mill and lived at Fayetteville.

The consensus of writers on the subject of slavery in the county is that, in the main, slaves were better off here than further south—better food, better working conditions, and better health. However, there were definite exceptions. Stories about early days in old Maguiretown, for example, include reports about slave chains and rings found in the basement of the fine two-story house built by Hosea Maguire. The Maguires owned slaves, and according to a family history, "Hosey bought, sold, and traded everything under the sun; no doubt he trafficked in slavery some, too."

James Doolin recounted a court case involving outright brutality. A man named Pyeatt sold a man named Spencer a female slave in 1839 for $650. The woman was supposedly "mentally unsound." According to the court record, ". . .a few days after Spencer bought the slave, he was found whipping her. He had her stripped, and staked down on the ground; her feet and hands extended, and fastened to stakes; her face upwards. He appeared calm. . .and was whipping her at intervals, using a cowhide, with a plaited lash about fifteen inches long. He asked her what made her do so (run away?), and she said that Bedford and Buchanan told her, that if she stayed there, she would be whipped to death. . .Spencer had drawn some blood, but not a great deal. He took salt and a cob, and salted her back."

whipped for things I should not have done just as the white children were.

"When a young girl was married, her parents would always give her a slave. I was given by my master to his daughter, Miss Elizabeth, who married Mr. Blakely. I was just five years old. She moved into a new home at Fayetteville and I was taken along but she soon sent me back home to my master telling him that I was too little and not enough help to her." During the Civil War she and the Blakely family lived in a house near the Masonic Hall (built around 1840) which once stood at 119 S. Block Street near the Fayetteville square. Her mother's family was carried south by Mr. Parks in order to obtain protection from the Confederate Army.

"My mother seemed to have a gift of telling fortunes. She had a brass ring about the size of a dollar with a handwoven knotted string that she used. I remember that she told many of the young people in the neighborhood many strange things. They would come to her with their premonitions."

From the Old Court Records

Lloyd McConnell has had direct access to many old county government records during his approximately 50 years of employment in county government. He has, for example, published numerous lists of marriages as well as summaries of the proceedings in county courts.

From the year 1841, for example, McConnell harvested the following bits of county history: In November John Work was charged with murder, and the jury convicted him of excusable homicide and he was held on an assault and battery charge; at the next term of court he was acquitted.

Young Bird, a Cherokee, was charged with horse stealing. He was found guilty and sent to the Arkansas Penitentiary for five years. Sam, a slave owned by John Ballard, was tried for rape but the jury was "hung"; the case was transferred to Madison County "because of prejudice among the citizens of Washington Co." Tannah, an Indian charged with murder was convicted in a first trial, but found innocent upon retrial.

In 1842, Battease, charged with larceny, was acquitted. Nelson H. Hackett, charged with grand larceny, was sentenced to 20 lashes and

Search for Freedom

While the Spencer case seems to have been an exception to the rule, bondage was bondage, and the victims of the system occasionally took great risks in search of freedom. Consider the life of a slave here two years after the torture described above. In June of 1840 a black slave named Nelson Hacket was obtained by Alfred Wallace, who had settled near Fayetteville in 1829. Hacket was then said to be about 30 years old, a real "dandy" who was handsome, well-dressed, and of a "prepossessing manner." He served as a valet and butler to Wallace, who had developed a plantation near Fayetteville, and with his brother Willis opened a store in 1833 on the west side of what became the Fayetteville square.

In July 1841 Nelson Hacket escaped. On his way out of town Hacket helped himself to a saddle belonging to Washington L. Wilson (another store keeper), a gold watch that belonged to August Ward, plus an overcoat and a horse from Wallace.

According to research published in the Arkansas Historical Quarterly by former University of Arkansas history professor Roman Zorn, Hacket traveled at night through north Arkansas and Kentucky, successfully crossed the Mississippi and Ohio Rivers, then journeyed through Illinois, Indiana, Ohio and Michigan. In six weeks he reached a refugee settlement in Canada, 50 miles from Detroit. However, Wallace and another man, George Grigg, had followed Hacket and attempted to extradite him back to Fayetteville. "After a severe beating 'with the butt of a whip, and a large stick' the unfortunate refugee yielded the stolen property and submitted to arrest," Zorn wrote. The implication of the Hacket case—that slaves could not even escape to freedom when reaching a non-slave country like Canada—aroused national and international anti-slavery organizations.

Arkansas Governor Archibald Yell demanded Hacket's extradition after Hacket was indicted for theft by a Washington County court. Because he had been indicted for theft, the extradition was allowed by authorities in Canada. In May 1842 Hacket lost his bid for freedom and was returned from Canada by Onesimus Evans and Lewis Davenport.

According to Zorn, "This was the first instance in which criminal extradition had retrieved a fugitive slave from Canada, and abolitionists soon perceived the menace of the precedent. . .Since Southerners could now exploit indictment for theft as a device to recover runaway slaves, the abolitionists warned that the security of all refugees in Canada had now been jeopardized." There were 12,000 runaway slaves in Canada at the time Hacket made his bid for freedom.

to stand in front of the pillory for one hour. (This Nelson Hackett is presumably the same slave whose name is spelled "Hacket" who in 1841 had made an attempted escape to freedom on a stolen horse, but was returned from Canada to Arkansas.)

Borderland

Slavery was not the only issue agitating the pioneer citizens of northwestern Arkansas Territory. Washington County was then a borderland, sparsely populated and right on the political boundary where the United States of America ended and the Indian Nation began. Unlike the white pioneers, their Indian neighbors had come under duress, and their unhappiness had considerable impact on Washington County.

In 1819 when Frank Pierce was preparing to shoot bison in a place where Fayetteville stands today, there were Indian hunters in the same place. This land we call Washington County was a borderland, and those Indian hunters may have been Osages, Cherokees, Shawnees, Delawares, or for that matter bits and pieces of other decimated tribes that had been forced west. The borderland conditions fostered intermarriages. William Vaughan, for example, was married to a Cherokee, Fair-A-Bee. Accompanying the Vaughans was Philip Harp, who also had a Cherokee wife. These couples were living near Evansville prior to 1825, and after the 1828 treaty, the Vaughans remained in what became Washington County. William helped lay out Washington Court House (later, Fayetteville). The Harps went on to Indian Healing Springs (later, Eureka Springs in Carroll County). These are just a few examples of how the borderland affected the early development of the county. Writing on the early history of the county, Elsa Vaught has noted that many last names associated with Cherokees appear in census lists, marriage records, and on the tombstones of old cemeteries.

Violence sometimes spilled over the border. The 1817 treaty that had created a Cherokee reservation in northwestern Arkansas had caused the tribe to split into factions with different ideas about how to meet white pressure for Indian lands. Eastern and western groups of Cherokees formed, with the small western group emigrating to Arkansas and the much larger eastern group hanging on to tribal lands. In 1830 the U. S. Congress passed the Indian Removal Act, which required all Indians living east of the Mississippi River to give up their lands and move west. Some Cherokees emigrated at this time, and it seems that groups of various sizes passed through northwest Arkansas Territory, well before the infamous Trail of Tears of 1838-1839. In 1835 the United States government forced on the eastern group a treaty that was opposed by all but 300-500 of the 16,000 Cherokees.

Members of the minority "treaty party" Cherokees began moving west. John Ridge, for example, left Georgia in March 1837, traveled by boat in relative comfort, and arrived near Fort Smith late in the month. Not everyone was so comfortable. In October 1837, 365 members of the Cannon party of Cherokees traveled overland from the east and did not

The Ritter Cabin

The Ritter cabin was moved in 1980 from Elm Springs onto the grounds of Shiloh Museum in Springdale. Donated to the museum by Dewie and Jean McDonald, the cabin had been a stagecoach stop and later was the home of the James Ritter and William J. Bradley families. David Stahle, with the Department of Geography at the University of Arkansas, used a tree-ring dating process in order to show that the cabin was likely built in 1854.

In his book Ozark Log Cabin Folks, Paul Faris provides numerous details about "the way they were" in the old days. The basic materials for cabins were easily available in the county—big trees. And the tools needed were easily brought in a wagon. "Tools for the job were simple enough—a chopping axe to fell the trees and trim them, iron wedges and wooden wedges ('gluts') to split the larger logs, a broad axe to hew the logs square, a froe and a maul to split blocks into boards and shingles, a draw knife to smooth down the boards for floor and trim, an auger or two, a saw, a hammer and some nails."

Most logs were hewed square. The logs fit better this way, and removing the bark also meant removing insects that could later damage the cabin. Nevertheless, as Faris points out, some pioneers were so eager to "get out of the wagon" they build the cabin with round logs and left the bark on. When nails were available, poles were laid across the roof boards to hold them on. With no metal flashing for the ridge line, boards on one side were extended over the top for protection against rain. Windows were few; they were hard to cut and glass wasn't available.

Some primitive cabins had dirt floors, but puncheon floors, made from split logs, were the rule. Of course these floors were likely to have splinters, so rugs were made to lay over them. Chimneys were sometimes made from sticks and mud, but in Washington County stone was usually available. Flat stones were collected and fitted together. Mud, or perhaps lime from nearby limestone cliffs, was used to hold them together. It took a careful search to find the big rock that could serve as the fireplace lintel.

In the process of restoring the Ritter cabin, a new split cedar shake roof was built, and the gables were filled with specially-cut yellow pine boards. Rocks from the chimney of the McGarrah-Reed log house south of Elkins were moved to the museum to build a chimney. Log structures still exist in the county, but many are either covered by boards or are in such deteriorated condition that few can actually visit them. The restoration of the Ritter cabin on the grounds of the museum permits modern people to see firsthand the labor-intensive architecture that dominated Washington County's pioneer skyline.

arrive at Cane Hill (just prior to entering what is now Oklahoma) until December 26. By that time 15 members of the original party were dead, including 11 children.

Trail of Tears

All of the forced movements of the Indians can be called "Trails of Tears," but the central tragedies did not begin until 1838. In the spring of that year President Andrew Jackson sent 7,000 state and Federal soldiers into Georgia to force the eastern Cherokees to abide by the fraudulent treaty of 1835. By June, 15,000 Cherokees were confined in stockades prior to forced marches to the west. Eventually, the Cherokees were organized into caravans and marched west. Several caravans of about 1,000 Cherokees each passed through northwest Arkansas. One of these caravans was involved in the "Fayetteville Riot" of 1838. According to an account by Ted Worley published in the Arkansas Historical Quarterly, it was a Sunday when the Cherokees arrived in Fayetteville, population around 400 including 100 slaves. Presumably saloons were normally closed on the Sabbath, but one enterprising saloon keeper accommodated the Cherokees. At some point a white man, Willis Wallace, insulted a Cherokee woman. In the fight that followed, Wallace killed Nelson Orr, an Indian. According to Worley, "Wallace escaped the angry Cherokees and fortified himself in his home. Indians crowded him and threats were heard of burning the town if Wallace did not surrender. Wallace was persuaded by his friends to leave town. He was acquitted of a murder charge in the May term of court, 1839."

Walter Lemke reported the discovery of the diary of a doctor who accompanied Cherokees through this area in late March of 1839. These Indians passed through Benton County in the Pea Ridge area, turned south through what became Springdale, and reached Fayetteville on March 21. From Fayetteville they turned west, passed through Sylva (now Cincinnati), then into Oklahoma. The travels of this group during winter and early spring must have been difficult.

The Trail of Tears, or more accurately Trails of Tears, cost the Cherokees approximately one-fourth of their numbers, or about 4,000 lives. This horror deepened the antagonisms already existing among the Cherokees as a result of the pressures for removal. The removal policy and the deep antagonisms created among the Cherokees also had direct effects on the lives of Washington County citizens of the time.

The reality of life on the borderland is reflected in the letters of Stuart Walter Case, whose brief career in this area, 1838 and 1839, includes a series of letters he wrote which were edited by Pat Donat and published in the Washington County Historical Society's journal, Flashback. Case, who worked as a store clerk, noted that a business boom was created when the Cherokees were passing through. His comments on a store in Benton County are probably also descriptive of business in Washington County as well. There was what he termed "an immense amount of travel. . .wagons passing constantly going down to the Nation, among the Indians to trade, loaded generally with meal, bacon and flour and most other kinds of provisions. . ."

The customers Case met were mostly "Indians or Mixed Bloods. . .some of them are very fine people, a great many white people here are mixing with the Indians. A white man with a Black wife is an occurrence not at all uncommon here and vice versa." At the same time, the Goodspeed history of Washington County notes, "a flood of merchants came in. . ." to the Evansville area, "bringing large stocks of goods to sell to the immigrant Cherokees, to whom large sums of money were due from the government. . ."

This economic boom brought with it some worries. It is obvious in Case's letters that the bitter strife among the Cherokees was taken seriously by the white settlers. On March 31, 1839, Case wrote, "the Nation, at present, is divided into two factions or parties, one of which is called the Ross party, which is by far the most numerous and is principally composed of full-blooded Cherokees—they were opposed to removal of themselves west. The treaty was made by the other party without their consent. The other party is called the Ridge party and is principally composed of half-breeds and mixed blood'd Indians, together with a great many white men who have married into the Nation. They being principally all well off. These small factions cannot bear the sight of each other and if they happen to meet anywhere there is sure to be a fight."

On June 22, 1839, Washington County and the entire borderland region was thrown into an uproar when members of the Ross faction avenged themselves on the Treaty group, murdering Major Ridge, his son John Ridge, and Elias Boudinot. Major Ridge was killed in western Washington County, just two miles north of modern Dutch Mills. At the time of his murder he was on his way to Vineyard to see about a slave he had hired out to John Latta.

In a letter written from Fayetteville and dated August 4, 1839, Case wrote, "the state of the Cherokee Nation at this time is dreadful, a civil war is on the point of commencing. . .Much alarm has been felt by the people of this country. Some families have left and are leaving. Volunteer companies have been formed throughout this and adjoining counties. The arms, ammunition, etc. in the arsenal at this place have been distributed to the different volunteer companies so that almost every man is completely armed and altogether our town and country has taken on a very warlike and savage appearance." Refugees poured across the border into Washington County.

Sophia Sawyer

Ironically, from this "warlike and savage" business, including the deep sufferings of the Cherokees, there unpredictably emerged something good. Among those who took refuge across the border was Sarah Bird Northrum Ridge, widow of the slain John Ridge. Mrs. Ridge apparently arrived in Fayetteville on July 1, 1839.

She made her residence in a two-pen dog-trot log house at the corner of Locust and Center Streets in Fayetteville, where it stands today. It was built in 1836 by a doctor, M. H. Clark. Mrs. Ridge occupied the house from 1839 to 1859. Thereafter it had several owners, including Sheriff Zebulon Pettigrew. It was modified and enlarged several times, attaining its present salt-box form by 1877. According to architect Cyrus Sutherland, "When threatened with demolition in 1973 the house was purchased by the Washington County Historical Society, aided greatly by public subscription." The Ridge House is on the National Register of Historic Buildings.

The Ridge House is an important historical legacy for Washington County, but of even greater importance is a legacy left by a school teacher, Sophia Sawyer, who accompanied Mrs. Ridge to Fayetteville in 1839. On October 11, 1839, Sawyer wrote the Reverend David Green, secretary of the American Board of Missions. "I left the Nation with Mrs. Ridge, the children & a part of the servants a few days after the murder of her husband. . .when I saw her sinking under the weight of sorrow—fearful apprehensions & undecided anxieties—I consented to leave for this town as the nearest place of safety & accommodation."

Sawyer was born in Fitchburg, Massachusetts, in 1792, and had been sent by the American Board of Missions to serve as a missionary among the Cherokees, who desired education for their children. It was in this way that she became on good terms with chief Major Ridge and his son John Ridge. She accompanied the Ridges when they emigrated in response to the 1835 treaty which required all the Cherokees to move west. After the murders of June 22, 1839, and the flight from Cherokee Nation with Mrs. Ridge, Sawyer opened the doors of a new school at Fayetteville, starting with 14 Cherokee girls. This was the beginning of what was long known as "the Indian school," and officially as the Fayetteville Female Seminary.

In its first days the school met on the second floor of a building on the Fayetteville square above the quarters of a Thespian Society. "In the spring a company of players gave performances in this 'theatre' where they rehearsed during the day. 'Miss Sawyer's girls', alas! were under strict orders, when passing by the open doors of the clubroom on their way to and from classes, to pay no heed to those 'sinful' actors," wrote Rowena Gallaway. The headmistress of this growing school "was of medium height and slight build. She wore her dark brown hair parted in the middle and combed well down over her ears. Her pupils liked best to see her wear the plain silk frock that she donned for 'dress up' in the winter."

David and Jane Walker gave the school land on West Mountain Street near the square, which was described by Sawyer as "overlooking a

Influence of Sawyer's School

The early days of the school are captured in a series of letters edited by Pat Donat and published in Flashback. On December 7, 1839, 13 year old John Rollin Ridge wrote that Miss Sawyer had "about thirty scholars, the most of whom are boys. . .My sister, brothers & myself are going to her school. . .I have gone through Ancient Geography & the Ancient History of Greece. I am now going over Modern Geography again, & I am studying Arithmetic & definitions. . .

"In this town there are three groceries & the people sometimes fight with knives and pistols & men have been killed here, but the people do not seem to mind it much. . .there are two saddler shops, two tailor shops, three blacksmith shops, one silversmith, one gunsmith, eight stores & two taverns & a good many other houses. . .There are also several lawyers & they have a good deal of business. . ."

A letter written by Enis Combs Trimble dated January 18, 1840, states, "There are thirteen scholars in the grammar class and twenty three in the definition class and seven in geography class and twenty four writers, eight who read in Natural History, all boys, eleven young ladies who read in the first book of history."

"The school saw its heyday in the early 1850's," wrote Rowena Gallaway. "At that time the campus comprised an entire block. The four buildings, facing on West Mountain street, were of New England rather than Southern architecture. These white houses, set on a neatly kept lawn with shade trees, shrubs and evergreens, presented a pleasing picture. Indeed, the seminary was a showplace of the countryside. Its plant no less than its faculty compared favorably with those of older schools in the east. Miss Sawyer's seminary with its 100 to 150 students per year—in a town of scarcely 600 persons—was a noteworthy institution."

The effects of this school reached far beyond its one block campus and its less than three decades of life. According to William Campbell's history of Fayetteville, in 1842 a writer for the Van Buren Intelligencer praised Sophia Sawyer, stating that, "By her exertion, a degree of intelligence and refinement is spread over this county, unseen and unfelt in other new countries. . ." J. H. Van Hoose, the premier historian of Washington County in the 19th century, stated in 1852 that, "Many beautiful young ladies from Missouri, the Indian country, and south Arkansas attended this school. . ."

"The location of the University at Fayetteville is largely due to the influence of three individuals who long years ago labored here and instilled in the minds and the hearts of the young men and women a desire for knowledge: Miss Sawyer, Robert W. Mecklin and Rev. Robert Graham," Van Hoose wrote in 1890. Miss Ann James (later Mrs. A. J. Marshall) wrote in her autobiography that Sawyer ". . .created an educational interest, to which the locating the Industrial University there is largely indebted. She is dead, but her work follows her. . ."

Modern day citizens of Washington County who annually derive countless social benefits and hundreds of millions of dollars in economic benefits from the location of the University of Arkansas here will no doubt share historian Pat Donat's opinion that "the benefits brought by the Cherokees to their new home [have] never been measured."

Other Colleges and Academies

Sophia Sawyer's "Indian school" was not the only school in the county; there were others, both before and after. Many articles dealing with the history of education in the county have appeared in Flashback as well as in the Washington County Historical Society's Bulletin Series, including W. J. Lemke's Early Colleges and Academies of Washington County, Arkansas. More recently the Washington County Retired Teachers Association has published School Days, School Days: The History of Education in Washington County, 1830-1950. The scope of educational activity is readily apparent in the summaries furnished by Walter Lemke in his Early Colleges bulletin.

Cane Hill School was established in 1835 after a meeting on October 28, 1834. The school provided instruction for boys who desired to enter the ministry. The school, which first met in a log house, had by 1850 evolved into Cane Hill College. The Fayetteville Female Academy was chartered in 1836 by prominent Fayetteville residents. Its guiding spirit was the Reverend Robert W. Mecklin, who was assisted by his wife, the former Louisa Ann Anderson. He founded the Ozark Institute at Mt. Comfort in 1845. Bethesda Academy, in the Cane Hill area, was chartered in 1843, but little is known about it.

The Far West Seminary was chartered at Mt. Comfort in late 1844. The school seems to have existed prior to this date. The famous educator

A Cane Hill College diploma issued to Mary Clem Carnahan.

Cephas Washburn was its leading light. Washburn had originally come west as a missionary to the Cherokees and founded Dwight Mission in what is now Pope County, Arkansas. Despite the fact that numerous leading citizens helped charter the school, it doesn't seem to have remained long in operation. Mecklin's name appears on the charter of Far West Seminary. The functions of the school were taken over by Mecklin's Ozark Institute around 1845. The site of the Far West Seminary is commemorated at Mt. Comfort with a plaque that credits the seminary, the Ozark Institute, and James's school with giving "our county its educational reputation that resulted in the establishment of the State University in 1871."

During the life of the Ozark Institute, 1845 to 1857, there were sometimes as many as 60 to 100 students in a two-story brick building with four rooms, as well as a frame dormitory and a residence for the president. According to Lemke, all that remains of the old Institute building is a pile of foundation rocks (one mile east of Mt. Comfort) that is surmounted by a chiseled stone inscribed: "1845-1871 — Ozark Institute — Founder, Robert W. Mecklin — Marked by Thomas Fox of Concord Chapter D. A. C. — Washington County, Ark. — 1934."

The Mt. Comfort Female Academy, usually called "Miss James's School," was organized in 1849 as a female companion to Mecklin's school for boys. The school lasted only a year or two, and James married the Reverend Lewis Marshall and left Washington County. In the same year, two schools were organized at Elm Springs, serving boys and girls. The male academy under the Reverend Jesse McAllister had about 60 boys, while 40 girls studied under Mrs. McAllister. The school was supported by William Barrington, but it perished during the Civil War. An academy was established on the same site after the war.

Chickasaws at Arkansas College

"A large delegation of young gentlemen from the Chickasaw Nation arrived in town on Monday last for the purpose of entering Arkansas College," reported Fayetteville's Southwest Independent newspaper dated September 30, 1854. "We notice among them several who were students at the last term.

"There are but few of our readers abroad who are aware of the amount of intelligence, refinement and wealth contained in this nation. It is true they have good Schools among them, but many are sending their children abroad to the best Schools and Colleges in the States, that nothing may be omitted to render their daughters accomplished and elegant ladies, and their sons well educated gentlemen.

"We welcome with pride to our town such delegations as these. And it must be gratifying to any philanthropist to see our neighbors of the West entering with so much ardor and zeal into that spirit of progress and improvement which marks the age we live in.

"The students in Arkansas College, from the Chickasaw Nation, at the last session were noted for their orderly and gentlemanly deportment."

Cane Hill College (for boys) was established in 1850 at Cane Hill under the name Cane Hill Collegiate Institute, and as Cane Hill College in 1852. Cane Hill Female Seminary was established in 1852 at the south end of Cane Hill (present day Clyde). Both were degree granting institutions. James B. Russell erected a building for the female seminary and supplied it with a library. Later a two-story building with a belfry was added. The Reverend Robert M. King, the first president of Cane Hill College, taught ancient languages and literature. During the 1850s Cane Hill College met in substantial brick buildings that symbolized the importance of this early school. School work was suspended in 1861 when many teachers and students joined the Confederate Army. Most of the college buildings were burned in 1864. The two-story brick building standing in Cane Hill today was completed in 1886. The site of the female seminary is marked at Clyde.

Arkansas College, which gave its name to College Avenue in Fayetteville, was chartered in 1852 and was the outgrowth of an academy started by Robert Graham in 1850. Graham was a native of Liverpool, England, who came to Fayetteville in 1848. He was the first resident minister of the First Christian Church. He had worked with Robert Mecklin at Ozark Institute, but left with 20 students to found Arkansas College. There were annual graduations until 1861. According to Lemke, "The attractive building was erected in 1852, with a library and two wings added later. The building stood on a 10-acre campus that had been deeded to Graham by William McGarrah on December 1, 1851." A bronze marker in front of the First Christian Church at 218 N. College Avenue in Fayetteville marks the college site. "The first college degree conferred in Arkansas was awarded here," it reads. "The University of Arkansas was the outgrowth of this College." Arkansas College was burned on March 4, 1862, a few days before the battle of Pea Ridge.

This drawing of Arkansas College in Fayetteville shows the state's premier institution of higher learning as it existed just prior to the Civil War. Like many other wooden structures in the county, the college burned down during the war.

A native of England, Robert Graham came to Fayetteville in 1848. In 1852 he established Arkansas College on land donated by William McGarrah.

The last of the pre-Civil War schools in the county was the Fayetteville Female Institute, established in 1858. According to Lemke, "T. B. Van Horne, the head of the school, had built a two-story frame building with a tall spire, but he was a Unionist and went north in 1861. . ." The school, which stood at the corner of College and Dickson (now the site of the First Baptist Church), was destroyed after the battle of Pea Ridge.

Corn

Many people familiar with the history of the county justifiably remember the community of Rhea's Mill where a then novel steam-powered mill was constructed in the 1850s. This fine mill featured an impressive stone chimney that stood 54 feet in height, a skyscraper in its time. The mill and its stack were symbolic in terms of notions of progress in business, just as the county's numerous pre-Civil War educational institutions were symbolic of cultural achievement. In later years the stone chimney was moved and now serves as a monument in Prairie Grove Battlefield Park. Like other early settlements, Rhea began midst humble pursuits.

The Reverend J. H. Rhea, son of the Pleasant V. Rhea family that settled in the county in 1829, has written about these early days there. "Our first settlements were made with reference not so much to the richness of the soil as convenience for fishing, hunting, etc., agriculture was not the leading pursuit for many years. We had no mills but beat our Indian corn into meal in wooden mortars made by burning out a cavity, tunnel-shaped, in the end of a stump or block near the cabin. The corn placed in this was broken with a kind of pestle or club made of hickory wood with one end left enlarged to give it weight enough. Our cabin walls were usually lined inside and out with deer, bear, coon, or wolf skins. . ."

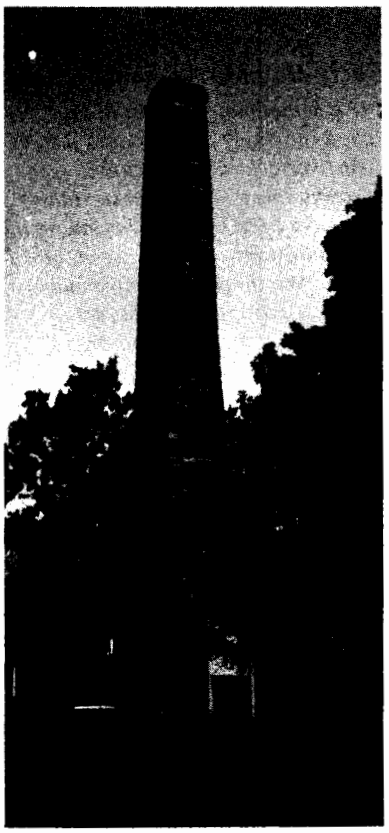
As was the case with the prehistoric Indians who lived in what is now

Washington County, corn was a vital crop to the pioneer farmers, preferred because it could be eaten directly, turned into meal, fed to livestock—including hogs, the number one animal here in those days—or turned into whiskey, a favorite and widely used medicine, a handy trade item, the elixir of pioneer social intercourse. Corn cobs could be burned as fuel or turned into pipes and dolls, and the shucks could be stuffed into mattresses or turned into mats, brooms, and the like.

In 1934 Marjorie Moore, then a student at Meadow Valley School (Mt. Comfort-University Farm area) wrote about processing and using corn. "In the autumn, after the corn had ripened, but before it was fully hard, the grater was a popular method of converting it into meal. The grater was made by punching holes through a sheet of tin and then nailing the sheet rough-side out, to a board somewhat narrower so that the tin would slightly curve. Then an ear of corn was rubbed back and forth. . ."

Mush was made from grated meal and eaten with milk in a bowl. "Cornpone and johnnycake were also made of grated meal. Pone was baked in the iron skillet, which was set over a bed of hot coals and more coals piled on the lid so that the top would bake evenly with the bottom. Johnnycake was made by placing a stiff dough on a smooth board, then propping the board nearly upright in front of the fire. . ."

Food eaten by Washington County's early settlers didn't come from the supermarket, and tractors powered by refined petroleum products were still several generations in the future. Instead, the first gardens where corn was raised were usually made by girdling trees in a small plot. The girdling killed the trees, and when the leaves dropped, the garden could be planted immediately, without bothering to cut the trees. The dead trees could be removed later.



The 55-foot high natural stone chimney at Rhea's Mill was an important landmark in pre-Civil War Washington County. The chimney was later moved to Prairie Grove Battlefield Park, where it serves as a monument to those who fought there.

Early-Day Marks and Brands

It is sometimes said that in the "good ole days" people could just let their livestock run free without fear of losing them. To some extent this may have been true, but beginning in 1840 an owner of cattle, sheep, or hogs in Washington County could register marks—cuts in the ears of livestock—in the mark and brand register of the County Clerk. This register was analyzed by W. J. Lemke, who published the results in a 1961 issue of Flashback.

According to Lemke, "On each registration blank there are two drawings, showing the left and the right side of the animal. . .on which the Clerk has indicated the 'mark'—crop, underbit, swallow fork, hole." On January 9, 1840, for example, George Taylor registered a mark described as "Half crop off right ear and underbit in the left." On the same day, J. W. Johnson registered "A crop and underbit in the right ear and a swallow fork in the left ear."

By 1847, 150 marks had been registered. Registration of brands began in the 1880s.

In the early days hunting existed alongside livestock that was allowed to freely range in the woods. Therefore, good places for settlements included good springs especially at the entrances to hollows or valleys whose encircling hills reduced the problem of straying associated with cows, hogs, and other animals—and provided good hunting. As researchers from the Arkansas Archaeological Survey have pointed out, these activities had a seasonal basis. "During the summer season the men looked after livestock while the women tended gardens. After the cattle were driven to market at the end of the summer, hunting became increasingly important during the fall and winter months. A few head of livestock were kept through the winter in the protection of thick canebreaks along the river bottoms, and in spring they were turned out to graze in the uplands while new garden crops were put in and the cycle began anew."

The compendium of the 6th Census of the United States, published in 1840, tells us some of what the farmers and their slaves were doing when the county population was just over 7,000 people. By far, the largest single crop was Indian corn, amounting to about 380,000 bushels, followed by oats at 47,000 bushels, potatoes at 24,000 bushels, and wheat at 16,000 bushels.

Livestock

Then, as now, Washington County was Hog Country, but for different reasons. In modern times, the University of Arkansas's Razorbacks have made the state famous, but in 1840 the hogs were important because everyone owned at least a few—36,000 counted in the census of 1840. There were likely many thousands uncounted, running loose in the oak woods. The census reported a grand total of 10,000 chickens—a respectable total for a young county, but a mere glimmer of what poultry would mean here less than a century later. The 8,000 sheep counted produced 12,000 pounds of wool that quickly found its way into clothing and other domestic articles.

In 1840 Washington County was a land of what the census-takers called "neat cattle." Strictly speaking, neat cattle are oxen, but in fact the term includes both oxen as well as horned, four-footed cattle. There were 12,000 "neat cattle" in the county in 1840. The oxen were durable beasts able to stand the heavy work of plowing rocky land and hauling carts and wagons over rough trails. Some of the "neat cattle" were milked, but the commercial value of the dairy industry in the county that year was zero—dairying lay in the future. The heavy farm work performed by the oxen was shared by the 4,500 horses and mules in the county in 1840.

Farmers had apple trees from the first days, having brought seedlings with them in saddle bags. However, orchard production as yet amounted to very little. In 1840 there was little indication that within half a century Washington County would be the heartland of what would be called "The Ozark Fruit Empire" and the "Land of the Big Red Apple."

There is little tobacco or cotton grown in Washington County today. However, in 1840 farmers reported harvesting 6,000 pounds of tobacco and 18,700 pounds of cotton.

Cotton raised in pioneer Washington County was for home use. While the men were out "killin' bars," the women were home with the tedious jobs necessary for making clothing. According to Bonita Musgrave's 1929 study of pioneer crafts in the county, "At first, the fibers were picked from the seeds by hand. This process was known as 'finger picking' and was a very slow one." Musgrave interviewed Mrs. Will Houston of Clyde who had lived in the county since 1861 and Mrs. Margaret H. Patterson of Lincoln, who lived there since 1854. According to these women, "We usually finger picked the cotton (separating the lint from the seeds) after supper was over and the younger children had been put to bed. The older members of the family helped and, as a rule, enough cotton was separated in one night to keep the mother busy carding and spinning the next day; or else enough to pad a quilt, depending upon which of these articles was most needed."

This tedious operation was made simpler with a hand-powered gin. Musgrave saw one that Mrs. Will Houston still owned in 1929. According to Musgrave's description, "The process is carried on by two persons operating the simple, hand-made device which consists of two smooth, round steel rods fastened very close together with a crank on the opposite end of each. In operating this gin two persons sit facing each other, each turning a crank. One feeds cotton; the other removes lint. The seeds drop down."

Growing and processing cotton was a basic industry. Another one involved tanning leather. County tax lists for 1836-1837 showed that seven tanyard owners assessed their property—James Boone, Dennis Callahan, James Campbell, Lewis Evans, William McAdams, James Mitchell, and Robert Parks. These tanyards, no doubt, would offend modern sensibilities. The smells were horrifying even to early citizens, at least until they realized that the smell was a tannery. A recent history of the Cincinnati area compiled by Jaunita Wilson contains the following description of a tannery:

"The vats were dug into the ground as much as 8 feet deep, depending on how many hides were to be tanned. . .In making leather it was necessary to locate on a stream where there was plenty of water. A dam was necessary to back the water into the vats when it was needed for replacement. Tanic acid was the most important ingredient. . .It was made by stripping bark from Red Oak trees. . .the bark was fed into a bark mill. . .and was ground into a powder. . .The hides to be tanned were mostly cattle, sometimes deer and other small animals. . .To get the hair from the hides, it was necessary to have one vat for that purpose. . .After this, the hide was placed on a flat rock and thoroughly scraped. . .After thoroughly cleaning the hides, they were placed in a regular tanning vat. . .After several months and maintaining a water level in the vat, some times as much as 8 months, depending on the class of leather wanted, the hides were removed and properly worked. . .If to be used for shoes or fine grain leather, it was worked longer than for harness. . .The tanner made his own neats foot oil by boiling the feet of the animal. . ."

Mills

Tax records also show that six sawmill owners paid taxes on their operations in 1837: Barnett Brixey, George Freyschlag, Joshua Onstott, Warren Philpot (two mills in the present day Goshen area), David Walker and Samuel Wilson. W. J. Lemke, who examined these tax lists and published the results in the September 1956 Flashback, stated, "There were other sawmills in the county but they do not appear on the tax list. . .State and county property taxes were in effect in 1836, but few citizens assessed their real estate."

Mills thrived in the county as soon as there was corn or wheat to be milled and boards to be sawed. The success of many mills was associated with one of the county's greatest natural resources, springs. Big springs could turn the wheels, small springs could be dammed, and the water carried by flumes or raceways to the wheels. Mill wheels placed directly on large streams were destroyed by flooding.

According to researchers at the Arkansas Archaeological Survey, "The most common type of water mill had a large 'overshot' wheel with several buckets attached around its circumference. The water spilled out of a chute at the top of the wheel, and as it was caught by the buckets, the weight of the water turned the wheel around. . .However, this type of mill required a high waterfall, and where this could not be arranged an 'undershot' wheel was used which was turned by water rushing beneath the wheel and pushing against the paddles. . .Another type of mill was powered by a water turbine rather than a wheel. These various water mills also usually incorporated log dams with adjacent raceways, or flumes. Where adequate water sources to power these types of mills was unavailable, treadmills were constructed which were powered by horses or oxen."

Bobbie Byars Lynch of Springdale has studied the original township survey maps and field notes for Washington County, dated 1831-1834, which are on file in the County Clerk's Office. According to her 1975 Flashback articles, the surveyors found eight mills and mentioned two more in their notes.

According to this data, the earliest known mill in the county was constructed near Clear Creek in the area of modern Johnson. In 1834 it was called the Truesdale Mill. The site is the same one where the restored Johnson Mill is standing in 1989. The old mill was burned during the Civil War, and the restored mill dates to after the war. In discussing this mill site, Lynch was intrigued with the survey notes which in 1834 referred to the "old mill house." John Truesdale was apparently not in the county in 1830. From whom did he purchase it? How old was "old" in 1834? Lynch notes that people who left no legal records behind almost certainly lived here and constructed a mill before there was even a Washington County!

Another early mill was constructed on Clear Creek in the general area of the present day site of Lake Fayetteville. It was listed on the early maps as Banner's Mill, but Lynch's research indicates it was actually owned by Wilson N. Dameron (also spelled Damern, Damson, etc.). The mill was allowed to deteriorate sometime after 1900.

Edwards Mill, northeast of present day Tuttle, was on the bank of Richland Creek. The survey of 1832 showed the Thomas Smith horse mill a mile south of Edwards Mill. Nearby was Wilburn's Tanyard, as well as a number of families—Philpot, Shoal, Titworth, Stanley, and Smith. "So in Tuttle, very early, we had a mill, a horse mill, and a tanyard. Sounds almost as busy as early Cane Hill," writes Lynch.

The 1832 survey shows that southwest of the modern Prairie Grove area was Blair's Mill on Blair's Mill Creek. Thomas Blair was counted in the 1830 county census. His wife was Sarah Carnahan.

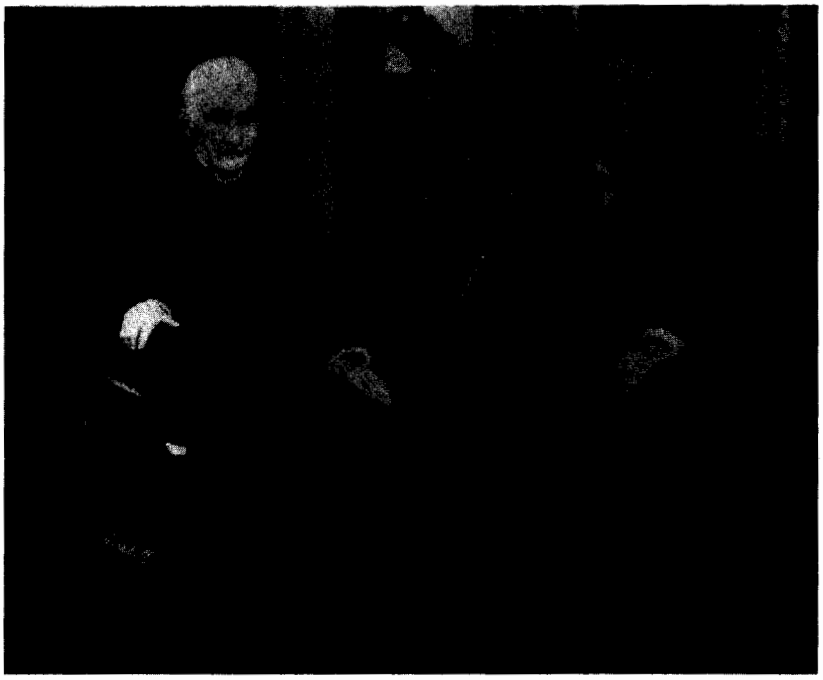
On the right branch of the Illinois River, north of the Jordan Creek branch, there was an unnamed mill shown in the survey. Lynch believes this may have been the mill built by Thomas Garvin and later owned by John Truesdale. "This mill was one-quarter mile south and west of Cane Hill, as the survey maps show Cane Hill Settlement approximately a mile and a quarter north of its present site."

Cane Hill Mill

The original site of Billingsley Mill, which is commonly remembered as the Cane Hill Mill, is marked with an overshot wheel that is 36 feet in diameter and can still be seen on Jordan Creek along Highway 45 between Cane Hill and Clyde. The survey notes from 1832 calls "Mr. Billingsley's mill. . .one of the best in the country." According to W. J. Lemke in his November 1961 Flashback article, "The Old Mill at Cane Hill," before the Civil War John R. Pyeatt built a mill north of Cane Hill. Later Pyeatt was joined by William S. Moore. Moore traveled to Cincinnati to purchase new machinery. After Pyeatt's death in 1895, Moore was joined by Walter Buchanan. Around 1902 the mill was moved to a site one mile south of Cane Hill where it continued operations until about the 1930s. This is the site marked today by the old mill wheel. At various times the mill made flour and cornmeal, sawed logs, and carded wool. The numerous photographs of this mill date to when it was the Moore-Buchanan Mill.

Lynch mentions other mills in her article. Indeed, mills were built early and widely in the county. Often they formed the center of growing communities. Such was the case at Elm Springs. According to Goodspeed, "This name is derived from probably the largest of Washington County springs. . .of such great power that, not far from their openings, John Ingram, in 1844, found them strong enough to run a water-mill. . ."

Research by W. J. Lemke and Tom Feathers produced facts about a mill intimately connected to early construction in the county seat. John Stelle, who was born in Ohio in 1816, came to Washington County in 1836 and erected a grist and saw mill on the West Fork of the White



Mr. and Mrs. Stephen K. Stone in later years as photographed by Burch Grabill. In 1840 Stone came to Fayetteville and established himself as a general merchant. At one time he owned the entire east side of the Fayetteville square.

River, four miles south of Fayetteville, in the Greenland area. Account books for the mill covering the years from 1838-1840 contain the names of 122 citizens. Lemke and Feathers wrote that he manufactured lumber that "went into David Walker's house on Center Street, the Female Academy, and the buildings of such early residents as Onesimus Evans, the Suttons, Leeper, Throckmorton, the Putmans and others."

Mills powered by steam came into the county by the early 1850s. The famous mill at Rhea seems to date from this period. The steam mill built by Joe L. Dickson and J. H. Stirman in the 1850s was located southeast of the Fayetteville square on what was later called Mill Street.

A mill of a different sort went up in Fayetteville in 1848. According to William Campbell's history of Fayetteville, Addison Crouch utilized a treadmill powered by horses and mules to card about 100 pounds of wool per day at a factory located on S. East Street. Later he purchased a seven horsepower steam engine at Cincinnati. He also installed a cotton gin, then said to be the only one north of Van Buren.

Busy Washington County

Mills served as important centers in the early years of the county, just as did churches, schools, tanyards, etc. The first mercantile establishments served a similar function. Commercial activity was brisk as early as the 1830s.

A visitor to Cane Hill in 1836 wrote, "So inviting a place is settling up rapidly. It is even now among one of the most densely settled neighborhoods in the west. There are four dry-goods stores, one grocery, two wagon-makers and four blacksmith's shops, a post office, one church, an excellent school, one saw mill, and three grist mills. . ."

At the Store

Stephen K. Stone, whose fine two-story red brick home still stands in Fayetteville today, opened a store on the Fayetteville square in 1840. His account books provide a look at the prices paid by customers in the 1850s and 1860s, as well as showing the value of credit earned by customers who made articles at home. A summary of these accounts appeared in Bonita Musgrave's Master of Science thesis (1929) titled, A Study Of The Home And Local Crafts Of The Pioneers Of Washington County, Arkansas. According to Musgrave, ". . .many articles necessary to comfort in life were considered high in price during the period of this study, and. . .the producer received little for those things produced at home."

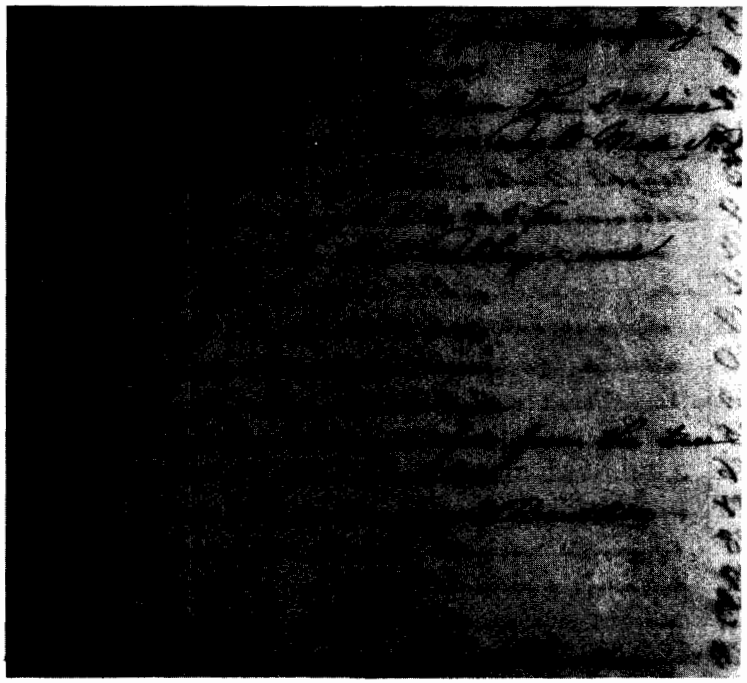
A ledger book for 1837-1839 from a store operated at Cane Hill provides detailed information about how people shopped 150 years ago here. According to W. J. Lemke's summary of the 1837 ledger, 125 customers had charge accounts with the store in 1837. "Most of these customers lived in or near Cane Hill, although there are names from as far away as Viney Grove, Wedington, Billingsley, and West Fork. By 1839, 285 names are on the books," wrote Lemke.

"There was a great deal of barter. . .we find Campbell & Pittman accepting such things on account as 'by labor done', 'by use of wagon', 'by butter', 'by socks', 'by one heifer', 'by fodder', 'by leather', 'by one sheep', etc."

Among numerous interesting details the ledgers show that Andrew Buchanan paid his $40.61 account entirely "by butter" and "by socks." James Coulter earned $6 credit by "hauling from Van Buren." The store sold a variety of items that appeared in the registers: calico, eight yards for $3; a Bible, $8; a silk hat, $1.50; 12 pounds of nails, $1.54, etc.

Busy Washington County was attracting immigrants from many places, including other countries. Jacob M. J. Smith, who was born in Denmark in 1799, and two other Danes, Asmus Outzen and John Kneudson, left Pennsylvania for Arkansas in 1836. Subsequently all three ran businesses at Fayetteville. Outzen made wagons, Kneudson was a farmer as well as running a confectionery shop, and Smith was a professional gardener.

In the fall of 1836, Jacob Smith purchased the original log cabin and 160 acres that had been settled by William Skelton. This site is near the corner of Township and Gregg Streets in north Fayetteville, along Scull Creek near where the Coca-Cola bottling plant stands in 1989. A Flashback article by C. Allan Brown states, "During the subsequent 42



Journal entries made by Jacob Smith in the spring of 1847 record the arrival in his Fayetteville garden of whip-poor-wills and hummingbirds. The two volumes of Smith's 34-year journal were donated to the library of the Arkansas Industrial University in December of 1895. (Jacob Smith Journals, Special Collections, University of Arkansas, Fayetteville) years that Jacob resided there, he transformed the old log cabin and its brushy surroundings into a neat, weather-boarded cottage set amidst vines, fruit trees, and flower gardens. The Fayetteville Democrat reported that Jacob immediately "went to work to beautify and adorn the grounds, which were afterwards known as Smith's Flower Garden. He planted the choicest fruit, ornamental shrubs, rarest flowers, and very soon it became to Fayetteville what Shaw's garden is to St. Louis—a place of resort for those who admire the beautiful." William Campbell's history of Fayetteville relates that people "use to ride out there in parties to buy flowers for weddings, parties, and funerals. . ."

Jacob Smith contributed to the premier horticultural publication of its time, The Horticulturalist. In his correspondence we see an educated man devoted not only to his adopted Ozarks, but also to the bigger world beyond. Beginning around 1844 he kept careful records on the spring arrivals of hummingbirds, whip-poor-wills, and other birds, making him one of the county's first "bird watchers." He also noted the first blooming dates of his flowers and shrubs. As a gardener he had a special interest in hummingbirds. His journal entries for a 23-year period showed the average arrival date for ruby-throated hummingbird was April 20, but sometimes he saw them as early as April 10 and as late as April 28. These two journals are now in the Special Collections Department of the University of Arkansas.

William Quesenbury (Bill Cush) drew this grotesque cyclops on the fly-leaf of an old book.

Bill Cush

Another newcomer to Washington County in the 1840s was William Quesenbury, also known as Bill Cush. A marker that is today located at 15 S. Duncan Street, Fayetteville, reads in part: "This was the home of William Quesenbury Editor, Humorist, Cartoonist, Artist, Musician, Poet.

Quartermaster of Yell's Regiment in Mexican War. Quartermaster under General Albert Pike in War Between the States." The house, which was later the home of D. H. Hill, a Confederate General and University of Arkansas President from 1877-1884, is no longer standing.

Quesenbury was born near Fort Smith in 1822 and moved to Fayetteville in 1847. In 1854 he established The Southwest Independent newspaper at Fayetteville, serving as both editor and publisher. According to Thomas Rothrock, "He was a racy and vigorous writer, an accomplished editor, a poet, a humorist, and a fiddler of note." He is credited with having painted the only known pictures of the Fayetteville Female Seminary and of Arkansas College.

Fayetteville writer Ethel C. Simpson has collected examples of his humor. In 1851, for example, he was in the California gold fields: "I took a shovel, pick and pan. . .through the gulches prospecting. I suppose I mined. . .a dollar or so, which when I returned to the city some gentleman stole. . .When I left home an idea prevailed that in the mining country a man might dig anywhere he pleased and find gold, but they might as well go a-duck hunting in the uplands as to endeavor getting the dust away from the streams in the dry season."

In 1860 he was back in Washington County, working as a newspaperman. He attended the commencement exercises at Cane Hill College and had this to say about the band: "As soon as a tune was announced, they went at it. . .One of the young men had a couple of large brass dishes, another a thundering big drum. . .and several had horns about the size of ordinary gum-logs. Indeed, at the end of each tune they laid them down and crawled into them and rested. . ."

He was an instructor of painting from 1876-1878 at Cane Hill College.

The News

According to research by Thomas Rothrock, the only newspapers in Washington County prior to the Civil War were located at Fayetteville, the county seat. According to Rothrock, the first paper was The Fayetteville Witness, published in 1840 by C. F. Town, but it was in business only a short time. The Western Pioneer appeared on May 8, 1852, under William E. Smith, who had previously published at Huntsville in Madison County. The paper ceased operation in 1858. The Southwest Independent hit the streets in 1854, with William E. Quesenbury ("Bill Cush") as editor and publisher. He sold out in 1858.

The Fayetteville Arkansian was established by J. R. Pettigrew and E. C. Boudinot on March 6, 1859. According to Rothrock, "Boudinot was a noted Indian educator, artist and statesman and an early resident of Fayetteville. The paper was a six-column folio, and was conducted with sufficient ability to make it one of the most influential papers in the S. .te outside of Little Rock, and the weekly circulation soon reached 2,000. Such writers as Quesenbury and Washbourne made frequent contributions. The stated objectives of the paper were as follows: 'To ad-

Unfortunately, very little of his artistic production has survived. A few drawings of strange, exaggerated figures are reproduced in Simpson's article. It has been reported that ". . .it was his custom to paste. . .pictures about the walls of his room and even on the ceiling, until both wall and ceiling would be hidden by the accumulation of sketches."

Details from the U. S. Census of 1850 show just how much development had occurred in the county in slightly over two decades. The population had increased from the 7,148 of 1840 to 9,970 in 1850. The livelihood of most of the 9,970 came directly from the farm, but some combined farming with special occupations. According to a summary written by W. J. Lemke, these special occupations included:

blacksmith	49	tanner	6
tailor	10	merchant	18
clergyman	35	stone mason	5
miller	8	shoemaker	16
school teacher	31	cooper	5
cabinet maker	7	lawyer	12
carpenter	29	public offical	5
saddler	6	physician	12
wagon maker	26	gunsmith	3

All of the 35 ministers listed were from four denominations: Methodist, Cumberland Presbyterian, Baptist, and one Episcopalian.

The 1850 census also provides a fascinating look at the previous homes of the settlers. Origins of the heads of families in the census were:

born in Tennessee	533	born in South Carolina	50
born in Kentucky	194	born in Alabama	48
born in North Carolina	184	born in Georgia	40
born in Virginia	134	born in Missouri	36

vocate the principles of the Democratic Party, and to stay the onrushing tide of abolitionism, which threatens to overwhelm the South; to advocate the building of a railroad from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and to secure its location on or near the 35th parallel, and to promote the cause of education.'" The Arkansian went under with the start of the Civil War.

What is today the Northwest Arkansas Times began publication as the Fayetteville Democrat, apparently in late July 1860. The first publisher and editor was W. W. Moore. According to Rothrock, "His press was destroyed when the Confederates evacuated Fayetteville, and W. W. Moore joined the Confederate Army to serve until the close of the Civil War."

Those desiring more details can consult "A History of the Washington County Press," Flashback, February 1966.

A few residents of the county in 1850 were born in northern states, especially Illinois and Ohio.

An interesting sidelight to the Census of 1850 is that at the time the census was taken a number of men from the county had gone west in the gold rush. During the spring of 1849, for example, 87 men from Washington County enrolled in the Fayetteville Gold Company headed by Captain Lewis Evans. Evans' lieutenant was Peter Mankins, the pioneer from Middle Fork valley. The Fayetteville '49ers left town on April 16. Half of the original company reached the California gold fields by early November.

A few, like Mankins, seemed to have returned home with a small fortune. Isaac Murphy, who came to the county in 1834, didn't do so well. Prior to the gold rush he had served in a number of local public offices, operated a school, and had been sent to the General Assembly in 1846 and 1848. According to one account, "At the age of fifty he set out for the newly discovered gold fields. Like many other forty-niners, he failed to strike it rich and returned home two or three years later in considerably reduced circumstances."

Some remained in the west, and others died during the adventure. Gold fever was still rampant in the spring of 1850. On April 9 a group that left Cane Hill included William Quesenbury. A second group of 24 left Cane Hill in the same month.

During the early 1850s, the population of the county was enriched by a colony of well-educated immigrants led by John and Karl Hermann. Possibly as many as one hundred people or more left Germany because of political strife and resettled in Washington County. Besides the Hermanns, the family names included Wilhelmi, Dieterich, Ganter, Schmidt, Dannenberg, Weber, Eberle, Kraft, and others. They settled on the Barren Fork River on the western border of the county in an area that became Hermannsburg, now called Dutch Mills.

The settlement received a post office in 1853. They established mills for lumber, flour and wool. Being on the border of the Indian country, they carried on a profitable cross-border trade until the time of the Civil War.

Jonas M. Tebbetts

Another newcomer to the county was Jonas M. Tebbetts, whose home at 118 E. Dickson Street, Fayetteville, was constructed in 1853. It has been called Headquarters House since 1967. The house serves as a museum, and one wing provides offices for the Washington County Historical Society. Tebbetts came to Arkansas in 1839. He practiced law at Van Buren as an attorney for the Cherokees, Choctaws, and Creek Indians in what is now Oklahoma. In 1847 he was married to Matilda Winlock. The Tebbetts built their home on four acres purchased from William and Elizabeth McGarrah in 1852. The house may have been designed by the Reverend William Baxter, president of Arkansas College, whose own home (and the college) stood across the street from the Tebbett's house. The house served as headquarters for both sides at various times during the Civil War.

After he moved to Fayetteville, Tebbetts was elected to the Arkansas legislature and was appointed attorney for the Fayetteville branch of the State Bank. His support for education included serving as one of the incorporators of Arkansas College. He also aided in establishing the Fayetteville Female Institute in 1858. Tebbetts was a friend of the Marian Tebbetts Banes remembered a circus that came to Fayetteville in the 1850s—a memorable event in a small frontier town. According to research by Harold Tedford, published in the Arkansas Historical Quarterly in 1967, several circuses seemed to have played to crowds in northwest Arkansas during the period before the Civil War.

The Circus is Coming!!!

Banes' memory probably involves 1859, for in that year several circuses appeared in Washington County. Mabrie's Menagerie and Circus played Fort Smith on May 16, 1859, Evansville May 19, Boonsboro (Cane Hill), and Fayetteville May 21. According to Tedford, "The circus featured an elephant, the first to be advertised in this region. Up to this time the circuses had been composed mainly of equestrian acts. The performers included I. Huyck and Garry Demott, clowns. One of the announced events was 'a grand procession of the forenoon of the day of exhibition preceded by the Musical Chariot drawn by elephants!'"

The Mabrie show was quickly followed by The Caribow and the Great Southern Menagerie and Varieties, which appeared in Fayetteville during the week of May 23. Caribow featured Miss Vic Aken, a sentimental singer and "danseuse," M'elle Nanna, suspensionist and "danseuse," a magician called Mago Del Oriente, and the Motly Brothers, advertised as "the greatest tumblers of the age." According to the May 28, 1859, Fayetteville Arkansian, *"We are humbugged too much—Last week we had Mabie's Circus exhibiting to crowded houses, from city and country and as a people were lessened in value five or six hundred dollars; and this week the air we have breathed, has at times, made vocal by the soul-stirring music, the offspring of the "Variety Band" attached to the 'One-Horse' exhibition called 'Caribow.' This concern is in every sense 'one horse' commanding the services of but one 'unfortunate' pony, and came near losing that, for Constable Taylor unceremoniously laid an attachment upon the back of the afore said pony; but to preserve the horse of the institution, the demand was liquidated. Marian Tebbetts Banes, daughter of Jonas M. and Matilda Winlock Tebbetts. Her journal is an important source for early Fayetteville history.

Reverend Robert Graham, founder of Arkansas College and of the Reverend William Baxter, who was president of the college when the Civil War broke out.

Jonas and Matilda had four boys and three girls. The girls were born in Headquarters House. One of the daughters was Marian Tebbetts Banes. In her old age she wrote a biography of her family, including the Washington County years. Installments were published in Flashback, and the entire manuscript was reprinted in 1977 by the Washington County Historical Society in one book with William Campbell's One Hundred Years of Fayetteville. The Banes manuscript provides intimate details about Washington County in the pre-Civil War days of the 1850s.

"Father and Mr. McGarrah were near neighbors," she wrote, "and had many a fishing trip together down on the White River, where they got many pike, red snappers, catfish and goggle-eye perch of which Father insisted Mr. McGarrah should take all but some perch. . .In the winter the quail man came with buckets of dressed quail—dozens and dozens of them, which sold for 25 cents per dozen. . .In the fall when the passenger pigeons were going south, many persons lived on pigeon pie. The beautiful creatures came in such numbers that as they flew over town, it seemed as if a great, black cloud was passing—thousands and thousands of them on their way to a roost south of town. . .Men and boys went out and beat them down with poles. . ."

She described a circus that came to Fayetteville in 1853 or 1854. "Whether it was a good or a bad circus is not reported, but it seemed to be well equipped with gaily caparisoned horses, on which beautiful short-skirted ladies rode and danced; and a clown and animals and a strong man, named Mr. Tubbs. Also, there was a lone white horse on which a man in white clothes all spangly and shiny stood erect."

Canning, which later became such an important part of Washington County's agricultural industry, was in Banes' day just at its beginning. "A load of fine peaches were provided," she wrote, "and everyone fell to work peeling and paring the fruit for tin cans, then the tinner came with his soldering iron and finished the job."

James Stevenson opened Fayetteville's first drugstore in 1854. Of this store Banes wrote, "No one supposed that it would live, but the druggist added a soda-fount and provided plenty of 'ju-ju' paste, a sweet jellied concoction of some kind that set the young people crazy. Besides, everybody both young and old had to taste the unheard of soda-water, and so the drugstore lived."

The modern generation that is used to electric lights may wonder how anyone could see at night here 130 years ago. "The main dependence for lighting a house was candles, sperm candles, wax candles, tallow candles and star candles. . .In the late fifties, or maybe early sixties, a new illuminating device was introduced, a bad smelling oil, that showed dark and muddy through the bowl of a glass lamp. It was called 'burning fluid' and was the first fruits of the oil field—petroleum."

County Poor Farm

The life of society's educated upper crust so apparent in Marian Tebbetts Banes's journal was, of course, not shared by all the citizens of Washington County. Adaline Quesenbury, wife of the famous Bill Cush, kept a journal. Her entry for January 24, 1853, includes this: "Saw an old scamp in the street, one shoe off. Beggar, I suppose."

Attempts were made to alleviate the poverty of the time. According to Tom Feathers, "In January 1852, Judge Jonathan Newman, who served ing feature, however, was the 'learned' dogs, displaying almost as much sagacity as the big 'dog' who exhibited them. It is but just to remark, that this Caribow was patronized—indeed an 'organ-grinder' seldom fails to have a respectable hearing; and if he has a monkey, his success is rendered doubly sure."

In August 1859, the Arkansian announced The Rivers and Derious Equestrian Dramatic Co. would appear in the county in September, with a "Thrilling Equestrian Dramatic Spectacle of Mazeppa; or The Wild Horse of Tartary." Tedford, however, found no evidence this circus actually appeared in the county.

as county judge from 1844 until 1860, appointed a committee to select and purchase for the county a poor farm. . ." This committee, composed of James P. Neal, A. W. Brownlee, and William Bowers, purchased 80 acres of the farm of Elias Muncey. (Today this site is across Highway 45 from Son's Chapel, northeast of Fayetteville.) The Muncey home served as the caretaker's residence. The county court ordered the erection of two log buildings for inmates near a large spring.

"One of the first log buildings to be erected was to be used to accommodate paupers of 'good and sound mind.' The State of Arkansas had no hospital for nervous diseases, so the second building erected. . .was to house the 'weak and feeble-minded,'" Feathers wrote. Some people in this latter group ". . .were better controlled by the use of a 'ball and chain', which was attached to the ankle. Later the 'ball' part was removed and the chains were attached to the wall, either inside for the colder weather or outside during the summer."

All that remains of this first county poorhouse site is a pauper's graveyard, with sandstone markers "tilted in all directions. And these grave markers have neither names nor dates." This site was used until 1896.

The fact that Washington County could make provision for the destitute by the 1850s suggests how well off the county was in other ways, especially when compared with the rest of Arkansas. Washington County's economy could support specialists like doctors, lawyers, blacksmiths, etc., but farming provided the basis for the general prosperity evident in the decade before the Civil War. Details from the Census of 1850 show that in production of wheat, Indian corn, oats, wool, beeswax and honey, orchard products, and hay, Washington County ranked first among the counties of Arkansas. Washington County was first in the state in the overall value of its livestock, leading all counties in the number of horses, milk cows, working oxen, other cattle, and sheep:

unimproved land	108,130 acres
swine	33,257
sheep	10,917
other cattle	6,628

wheat	34,472 bushels

value of orchard products	$9,299

Use of the Land

Two decades of farming had changed the face of the land. Shortly after settlements began forests began to extend into the old prairie areas. According to the Goodspeed history of the county, "the supply of this young timber has grown in the last century and is so abundant that there is much more wood now than there was when settlement began." Henry Miller, a University of Arkansas graduate student who studied the history of vegetational change in northwest Arkansas, believes this change resulted from the control of fire by the settlers. He believes that in the past the prairie grasslands had been maintained by periodical fires; the same explanation may account for the presence of oak barrens largely free of underbrush.

According to Miller, "If fire can be accepted as a determining variable, a suitable explanation is possible for the expansion of forest during historic times. As European settlers came into the area, they exerted a great influence upon the vegetation. Cattle and horses grazed the prairie and gradually reduced the grass cover. . .and the plow removed much of the fire's potential fuel. Thus the fires were reduced in extent and frequency and then completely eliminated. With nothing to remove the invading plants, the prairies and barrens were gradually covered with underbrush and young timber and the forestation, which was reported, occurred."

It was not only the face of land that was changing. Washington County was continuing to grow at a rapid pace before the Civil War. Between 1850 and 1860 the population leaped from 9,970 to 14,673. From 1850 to 1860, 21,000 acres of improved land and 65,000 acres of unimproved land were added to the county's farmlands. During the decade cattle had become more important and oxen were disappearing from the farms.

Important increases in production of wheat and tobacco were recorded. Wheat production increased from 34,472 bushels in 1850 to 122,644 bushels in 1860—a four-fold increase that added to Washington County's reputation as the state's breadbasket. Tobacco production more than doubled, from 19,987 pounds to 43,123 pounds.

The general prosperity of the decade was such that a county fair was planned. According to the Goodspeed history (page 181), "The organization of an agricultural and mechanical association early engaged the attention of some of the most progressive citizens of the county. Such a society was organized in 1856, and the first fair was held that year" on the public square at Fayetteville. "The agricultural and mechanical productions were exhibited in the court-house" which was then located in the center of the square. "A track was around the outer edge of the yard, and here several races were run. Capt. S. P. Pittman rode the winning horse, which belonged to Maj. W. D. Reagan.

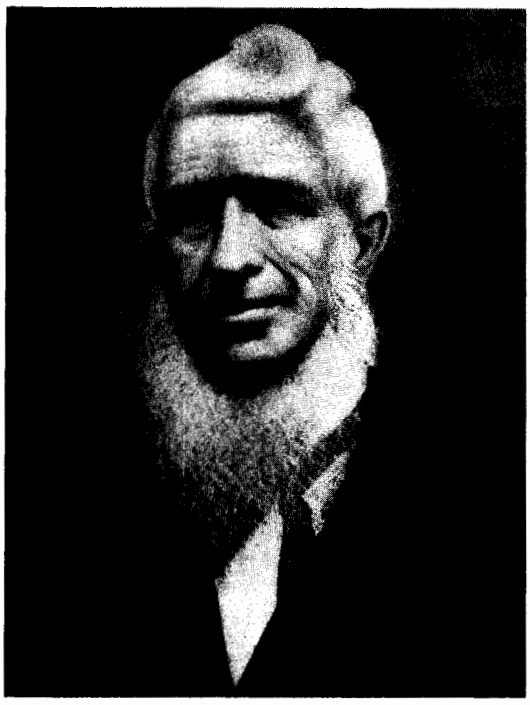
"This fair was declared a success, and the next Legislature granted a charter to the association. Five acres of land was donated by Judge David Walker, and grounds, several acres in extent, were enclosed and improved. These grounds lay south of town, and there in October, 1857, the second fair was held. . ." The last fair hosted by this association occurred in September 1859.

In 1860 Washington County boosters could point proudly at 13 flour and grist mills, 25 blacksmith shops, and not less than six carriage and wagon factories. There were doctors, lawyers, and numerous stores with a wide array of goods. People came to do business in the county from the Indian Nation, Crawford County, and the lands to the east.

Overland Mail Company

As in the case of lawyers, doctors had practiced in the county since the earliest days, and they were as active in the various affairs of public life as in their professional lives. One of the famous early day doctors was T. J. Pollard, who moved into the county from Kentucky in the 1830s. He did considerably more than travel the county on horseback with his black bag. Back in those days oxen were the only dependable means of hauling anything into Washington County. Horses couldn't take the strain, and mules weren't in wide use for this purpose. According to William Campbell in his history of Fayetteville, the ". . .clangor of ox-bow rings became common on the streets of this old town in the thirties, forties, fifties." In the 1840s, Dr. T. J. Pollard and his brother Dr. Wade Pollard opened a line of stage coaches that connected with a railroad in Missouri and boats on the Arkansas River. In 1853 Dr. T. J. Pollard was one of the incorporators of the Arkansas Western Railroad whose purpose was to "build and operate a railroad from Fort Smith by way of Van Buren thence to such point on the Missouri line by way of Fayetteville and Bentonville." (It would be almost 30 years, however, before such a line was completed.)

The Pollards sold their business to John Butterfield's stage line, the Overland Mail Company. Beginning in 1858, Butterfield's stages carried the U. S. Mail, freight, and passengers from the Mississippi River to the Pacific Coast along a route that totaled 2,800 miles. Springdale historian Phillip W. Steele's Butterfield Run states that mail and passengers from St. Louis took the train to Tipton, Missouri (in the central part of the state), met the stage, then traveled south through Springfield, Missouri, before entering Arkansas for a stop at Elkhorn Tavern near modern Pea Ridge.



T. J. Pollard, pioneer doctor in Washington County.

In the vicinity of Shiloh (now Springdale) one scheduled stop was at the station kept by John and Mary Fitzgerald. The stable, made from native stone, was still standing in 1987 in the northeastern section of Springdale on the "old wire" or "old Missouri" road. The stage passed just east of the community of Shiloh, on a road that Butterfield cut to shorten the route into Fayetteville. The first post office established in the Shiloh area was at Lynch's Prairie in 1859. (The Lynch family had moved there shortly after 1830). Thereafter, the Butterfield stage stopped at Fitzgerald's or the log cabin post office.

Next, the stage rolled on to Fayetteville. There, Butterfield built a hotel, barns, and a station on land that is today occupied by the Washington County Courthouse and the now abandoned Ozark Theatre. According to the journal written by Marian Tebbetts Banes, "The big 'Overland Stables,' accommodating eighteen horses, were built at Fayetteville, and Mr. Charlie Butterfield who, with his father, owned the enterprise, brought his wife and sister and made a home there until the advent of the Civil War. The ladies of the family, fresh from eastern fashions, especially with sure enough up-to-date riding habits with close-fitting hats sporting plumes, were a matter of much interest. The ordinary riding outfit of the Ozark woman was a single long skirt to protect the garments beneath. My friend, Mary Graham, and I had many a ride on the arms of an old colonial sofa that sat on the back porch with feathers from the rooster's tail for an improvised hat and Mother's gingham work-apron doing duty for riding habit. The only question to jar being which should impersonate Miss Butterfield."

According to William Campbell's history, a branch line from Fayetteville went through Prairie Grove, Cane Hill, Newtown (now called Clyde), Hermannsburg (now Dutch Mills), and finally to Evansville. The main stage traveled south from Fayetteville along the route of modern Highway 265, passing through Cato Springs and Hog Eye. According to Steele, "A tavern along the route in Hog Eye operated by a widow who was well known for her high quality corn whiskey also became a popular nonscheduled stop. There passengers often bought the widow's brew in earthenware jugs to help them better endure the rough trip ahead over the rugged Boston Mountains." The Hog Eye stop was at Park's Station. At Strickler the coach stopped at Brodie's Station.

Lynch's Prairie Post Office on the Butterfield stage route provided mail service to the community of Shiloh (Springdale) from 1859 to 1866. The cabin stood at what is now the northwest corner of Highway 265 and East Caudle Street.

Near Winslow the stage stopped at the Woolsey home. This station was known as Signal Hill, because of the loud blast of the stage horn. South of Signal Hill the road traversed what was known as the roughest section of the entire 2,800 mile route. According to New York Herald reporter W. L. Ormsby, who traveled in the first coach, "I might say our road was steep, rugged, jagged, rough, and mountainous—and then wish for more expressive words in the language."

Washington County - an "Uptown" Place

In this decade prior to the Civil War, Washington County was the fairest and wealthiest land in all of Arkansas. It had its churches and schools, bustling farms, a successful county fair, a railroad in the works, and now even a fashionable elite.

The famous Rhea mill, mentioned earlier, dates to this time. Its curious origins—in shrewd poker rather than hard farm labor—are told in the history of Cincinnati compiled by Jaunita Wilson. William H. Rhea, a son of the pioneer Rhea family, had opened a store in Cincinnati in 1851. The town had a certain attraction to outlaws who escaped justice by hiding in the Indian Nation, but who came into Cincinnati for supplies (like those available in the Rhea store) and to gamble at a hotel called the Cincinnati House. The gambling seems to have attracted a sufficient number of the get-rich-quick crowd, for one winter night in 1856 William H. Rhea was enticed into gambling. After playing all night he had won a pot worth thousands of dollars. It is said he decided not to gamble anymore and instead to go into the milling business. The big winnings from the Cincinnati House were invested in what was called the finest mill ever built east of the Mississippi.

The origins of the stocks of goods in Rhea stores at Cincinnati and Rheas Mill were recorded in ledger books. According to an analysis by W. J. Lemke, many of Rhea's goods were obtained from agents in Van Buren. These goods were hauled by wagon from the steam boat landing at Van Buren over the Boston Mountains to Washington County. St. Louis companies shipped goods via rail to Tipton, Missouri, which were then hauled overland into Washington County. Other goods were purchased directly from companies in New York and Philadelphia.

The goods shipped to Rhea suggest that Washington County was not isolated in the decade before the Civil War. Goods from far away places were not the only evidences that Washington County was becoming an "uptown" place. It had degree- granting institutions that attracted students from a wide area beyond the boundaries of the county. Regular outside communication was guaranteed by scheduled stagecoaches, including the famous Butterfield line. There had been several newspapers in the county (starting with the short-lived Fayetteville Witness of 1840) and in about July 1860 came the first issue of the Fayetteville Democrat (renamed Northwest Arkansas Times in 1937). Also in 1860 telegraph wires were strung into the county by the Stebbins Telegraph Company.

According to William Campbell's history, "In 1860 a gang of linemen strung a wire from Jefferson City, the Capital of Missouri, along the old Military road cut through here in 1835, to Fort Smith on the Arkansas. This was strung on trees where forests and low poles cross prairies. It was the first thrust of the miraculous through our very own dooryards. . .Colonel J. R. Pettigrew sent greetings to the mayor of St. Louis and received reply." J. H. Van Hoose recalled Fayetteville in this time before the war as "a pretty little village of about 600 inhabitants, all of whom were prosperous and happy."

Indeed, Van Hoose recalled a bright, moonlit night in July 1853, when he and some friends went out to serenade newlyweds James L. Carlile and the daughter of Nathan Wilcox, a cobbler. "Clint Yell was with us playing the flute, John McKisick with his violin playing an accompaniment to the 'Old Pine Tree,' which was well sung by such vocalists as myself, Jack Smith, Jack McIlroy, T. W. Pollard, W. R. Quarles, William A. Watson and others.

"We wound up the evening's entertainment by shivareeing James Ballard and his wife, who had only that day agreed to kiss and make up, and I remember too how unceremoniously the boys left the yard when Ballard fired one shot through the window. We had cake and custard at Wilcox's, and were offered birdshot at Ballard's, but begged to be excused as they 'didn't want any in theirn.'"

Foreshadows of Civil War

The fetching innocence of Van Hoose's story stands in contrast to other events that, in retrospect, seem to have been a foreshadowing of the tremendous destruction inflicted upon Washington County during the Civil War. One event that stands out is the death of Dr. Boone, the pioneer doctor and wealthy farmer of what is today the Elkins area.

Dr. James Boone, a veteran of the War of 1812, was one of the first medical doctors in Washington County. He came here in 1830, bringing with him his wife Sophronia Smith and two sons. The Boones settled near modern day Elkins. One of the doctor's relatives opened a store, and soon the community was called Boone's Grove and had a post office. Boone was a popular figure in the county, serving as a delegate to the Constitutional Convention of 1836 that resulted in Arkansas statehood.

The county was shocked in 1856 when Dr. Boone was beaten in his home and died without regaining consciousness. At the time Boone had no family at home. His wife was dead and his three sons had left. He was then a wealthy man with a huge farm that required a number of slaves. In 1928 Nora Carlisle, a granddaughter of Dr. Boone, told Stephen Cisler, then a University of Arkansas journalism student, what she knew about the incident. According to her, in his old age Dr. Boone had offered to share the profits of his farm with his slaves. "In organizing his farm anew, he appointed one of his most trusted retainers as an overseer and gave the negro a horse on which to make the rounds of the fields." It was this appointment, Mrs. Carlisle believed, that caused jealousy to spring up among the other hands who believed that the overseer was obtaining more than his share of the earnings.

Facts as to the reason for the beating seem few. The general motive was said to have been robbery. Suspicion fell upon three slaves—two that belonged to Boone, and one to a neighbor. An overheard conversation concerning the beating "was taken as sufficient evidence" and sealed the fate of the accused slaves. "Fayetteville the next day was the scene of a milling mob which congregated on the dirt streets and clustered in little knots about the jail steps." A lynch mob led by one of the Boone sons swarmed into the jail and took out the three blacks. One slave was returned to the cell because "he was the property of a neighbor." (He was hung later, after a trial). The other two were hung without delay of a trial from one of the big trees next to Waxhalls, the home of the late Archibald Yell.

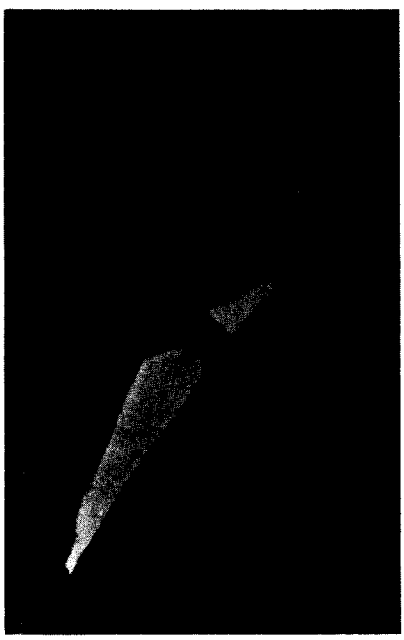
These hangings ended what was at the time apparently considered a local version of the "slave rebellion" so feared throughout the South. While it is true that Washington County (and the Arkansas Ozarks in general) was not as deeply involved as southern Arkansas and much of the South in the social and economic network of slavery, the institution nevertheless had roots here. Slaves, after all, had come right along with the settlers of the late 1820s. Many leading figures in the county had owned at least a few slaves. Slavery was part of the economic foundation upon which Fayetteville's early flowering was based. Slaves made the county's large farms prosper, and slaves did much heavy construction work in the pioneer period. Some families, like the Lattas of Vineyard, owned slaves but also provided ways (short of personal financial ruin) for black people to buy their freedom. This is not to say, however, that slavery was dying out in the county.

States' Rights

Increasingly the issue of slavery was entwined and in some respects supplanted in importance by the issue of states' rights. In 1850, for example, the Arkansas General Assembly was embroiled in the raging national controversy over whether slavery would be allowed in states newly admitted to the Union. In this, as in other cases, the moral issues associated with slavery were considered less important than whether or not the national government had the right to compel states to follow Federal law.

As a delegate to the Assembly that year, Judge Jonas Tebbetts of Fayetteville, who was a slaveowner, spoke strongly for the Union, calling on his fellow delegates to guard "the portals of the temples of the Union and Constitution, cemented by the best beloved of our ancestors. . ." To do less, he stated, would allow the stars and stripes to "trail and draggle in the dust and be trodden upon by the feet of infuriated millions. . .a shout of derision, scorn and contempt will go up from the tyrants of every downtrodden nation of the earth." In 1861, when the issue at last was focused narrowly on states' rights and the preservation of unfettered expansion of slavery versus the power of the Federal government and preservation of the Union, Judge Tebbetts would go with the Union.

One of Tebbett's contemporaries, Alfred McIlroy Wilson, studied law books borrowed from Archibald Yell and was sent to the Arkansas General Assembly in 1848 by Washington County voters. He was appointed U. S. District Attorney for the Western District of Arkansas in 1852. He too was in the Arkansas Assembly when the 1850 Compromise Bill was debated, and like Tebbetts he opposed arguments that the South should secede from the Union if necessary. In a letter thought to have been written to relatives in 1852 or 1853, he said, ". . .secession is certainly a poor remedy—such a one as no one in his senses ought ever think of resorting to, for the purposes of remedy." Later he changed his mind. In a letter dated February 14, 1861, this prominent lawyer wrote, "I believed that the safety of the south depended upon its united action, and that the south would unite in a demand upon the north to recede from their hellish doctrine and respect the federal constitution, and in default thereof, the south would unite in a Southern Republic."



Colonel A. M. Wilson.

Washington County was of a divided mind on the eve of the Civil War; debates raged in every community. War clouds were gathering, and the violent deluge was soon to drench everyone, regardless of his political views. From this time there comes the story of an eagle, as told by J. H. Van Hoose and published in The Arkansas Sentinel long after the war.

Proud Bird of Liberty

An eagle was found by a farmer near Elk Horn Tavern in Benton County. The eagle had engaged in an aerial combat with an owl, after which the owl died, and the great bird was captured by the farmer as it lay exhausted in a field. The bird was eventually given to Judge Tebbetts (whom Van Hoose refers to as "Col. Tibbetts").

"Col. Tibbetts was a strong union man (as were many other of Fayetteville's good citizens at that time, believing it unwise in the Southern States to secede as South Carolina had already done) and he and his many friends here felt proud of the 'the old bird of liberty' and sympathized with it in its captivity. Col. Tibbetts provided a good roomy cage for it and it was fed on the best the market afforded, while it received many calls from gentlemen and ladies of Fayetteville. It was indeed a drawing card, and although Col. Tibbetts and his accomplished wife and daughter were very popular in Fayetteville society, they received many calls from those who came out of curiosity to see the once proud bird whose strong wings had so often fanned the clouds aside and borne him upward above the raging storm, where he could gaze undismayed upon the brightness of the sun, but who by misfortune was now a captive and a slave, confined in a prison.

"The old eagle seemed to learn that although deprived of his liberty, he had yet a friend in Col. Tibbetts and the sympathy of all who called to see him. This proud captive bird was kept and well cared for until the 7th of May, 1861, on which day news was received here by wire that the State Convention, then in session at Little Rock, had on the day previous passed the ordinance of secession. . .

"I think it was on the afternoon of that day. . .that Col. Tibbetts opened the prison door and addressing his captive said, 'Go proud bird of liberty, thou art free.' The old eagle stepped out and spreading its wings rose up over the housetop and made his way to the Female Institute building. . .and alighted on top of its cupola. . ." The bird remained there, Van Hoose wrote, "for a half hour or more before taking his final leave of the pretty little village of Fayetteville.

"After satisfying himself that his wings had strength for his aerial voyage, he spread his pinions and circling round and round, each circle rising higher and higher, until he had attained a lofty height, he sailed off toward the northwest, just as the setting sun was dipping down behind the western horizon, and soon was lost to view in the evening twilight."

Washington County, left behind by this "old bird of liberty," was soon at war.

Civil War in Washington County, 1861-1865

> "The land is steeped in blood—innocent blood—and defiled with crime. Let us wash it out with tears of sorrow and repentance, works of love, kindness and charity, that peace, goodwill and confidence may return and dwell among us. Let our last conquest be the conquest of the hearts of our enemies by kindness—then peace will be lasting."

Washington County was 33 years old in 1861. The original pioneer generation of "Twenty-eighters" was being replaced by their children and assorted newcomers. The children of the old settlers of 1828 who had trudged through the mountain forests in oxcarts were coming into their own.

The great topic of the late 1850s and now in 1861 was secession from the Union. In Washington County talk of war and secession occurred in families whose relatives, husbands, fathers, and sons had fought under the stars and stripes in every American war including the Revolution of 1776 down through the War of 1812, the Seminole War that began in 1835, and Mexican War that in 1847 had cost Archibald Yell his life. The tradition of patriotism was a powerful one.

These same settlers or their immediate families, however, had by and large immigrated from southern states in which slavery had tenacious roots, and hence where opposition to the election of Abraham Lincoln—whom some branded an abolitionist committed to destroying the institution of slavery and placing the South under the heel of the North—was strongest. It was for this reason that patriotism to family and former family roots in the deep South had the power to overcome what had formerly been a strong allegiance to a Federal Union of the states.

Despite these deep conflicts in loyalty, the Federal Union was not dissolved quickly or easily in Washington County. There was considerable public opposition to secession. Nevertheless, many people in the county placed loyalty to their state and the South above loyalty to a far away national government. After the outbreak of the war on April 12, 1861, Washington County sent several thousands of its sons and fathers to the Confederacy. In 1862, proponents on the other side raised from Washington County the first Union regiment composed of citizens from a seceded state. Beneath this formal war, the bitterness engendered by deeply divided loyalties fueled a horrendous civil conflict in Washington County whose victims were women, children, and the elderly.

During the period 1861-1865, the brilliant achievements of the county in education, economics, and religion collapsed. At the conclusion of the war in 1865, Washington County's farms and public institutions lay in ruins. In 1896, three decades after the close of the war, Confederate Captain S. P. Pittman of Fayetteville wrote, "Today may be seen upon our streets a few grizzled veterans who fought in opposing ranks. . .and many sleep in the cemeteries adjoining our city. Let us hope those beautiful hills and valleys will never be trodden by hostile armies again."

Washington County neither willingly nor gladly embarked upon the sea of rebellion and civil war. South Carolina—a state which had been the birthplace or family origin of many residents of Washington County—seceded from the Federal Union in December 1860 and was soon followed by other Southern states. In Arkansas, the concept of secession did not enjoy majority support, and the state did not at first secede. Northwest Arkansas in particular was not hospitable to the idea of rebellion.

Question of Secession

On January 24, 1861, the Arkansas legislature passed a bill calling for a vote on whether to hold a state convention to consider the question of secession. A mass meeting at Fayetteville on February 2, 1861, was attended by an estimated 500 people. On January 26 a meeting at Boonsboro (Cane Hill) had adopted a resolution whose substance was that if the efforts to find some compromise between secession and Northern dominance failed, then Arkansas should "take such action as those of the older and more powerful states shall indicate for themselves." The Boonsboro meeting had also suggested delegates to the state convention. The resolution was read and suggested delegates announced at the February 2 meeting in Fayetteville. Unionists charged that secessionists had, in effect, "fixed" the outcome of the meeting, which collapsed into confusion.

The only vote involving the issue of secession occurred on February 18, 1861. The citizens were asked to vote for or against a state convention that would consider secession. By a nearly three to one margin, the Washington County voters rejected the convention. Nevertheless, a state convention was approved by voters elsewhere in the state. Washington County voters gave huge majorities to delegates pledged to moderation, which at this time meant support for maintaining the Union. The Fayetteville Arkansian noted that Benton, Madison, Crawford, and Sebastian counties had also defeated "Southern Rights men" by large majorities.

Songs of the Times

In her study entitled The Effect of the Civil War on Ozark Culture, Chris Catalfamo-Serio has provided several lists of music popular in the decades before the Civil War as well as during the war. Some of these are still popular more than a century later! Popular religious music included Daughter of Zion, Weep Not For Him That Dieth, Amazing Grace, The Christian's Death Song, That Blissful Land, Pennsylvania, Rock of Ages, Ebenezer, Old Hundred, Jordan, The Old Church Yard, New Albany, America, and Italian Hymn.

Of course churches weren't the only places where people heard or played music. "One must remember that a weekly top ten that people grew tired of. . .simply did not exist a century ago" writes Catalfamo-Serio. "Thus, the popularity of a song was much longer lasting, and a favorite melody was given new words at every opportunity. 'Rosin the Beau'. . .went through many political versions for everything from the Campaign of 1840s 'Old Tippecanoe' to 'Lincoln and Liberty Too'." Popular tunes in the 1850s included Camptown Races, Lorena, Dixie, Wait For The Wagon, and Polly, Wolly, Doodle. In the 1860s there was Goober Peas, Aura Lea, Kingdom Coming, The Bonnie Blue Flag, as well as others.

Some of the following songs, which were part of the culture of the pre-Civil War and Civil War periods, are still being sung: Nelly Was A Lady, Nelly Bly, Old Kentucky Home, The Arkansas Traveler, The Shining Shore, When I Saw Sweet Nellie Home (The Quilting Party), Listen To The Mocking Bird, Blest Be The Tie That Binds, The Blue Tail Fly, Lubly Fan (Buffalo Gals), Old Folks At Home, Jingle Bells, Pop Goes The Weasel, Skip To My Lou, The Three Bells, Down In Alabam', The Yellow Rose of Texas, Tenting On The Old Camp Ground, Frog Went Courting, Jenny Get Your Hoe Cake Done, and Root, Hog or Die.

By the time Abraham Lincoln took office in early 1861, seven states had left the Union. Lincoln announced his determination to hold Fort Sumter in South Carolina. On March 5, 1861, yet another mass meeting was held at the Washington County Courthouse to "take the sense of the people on the inauguration of A. Lincoln."

From March 4-21, 1861, the state convention was held at Little Rock. David Walker of Fayetteville was elected president of the convention. According to the "UNION ADDRESS TO THE PEOPLE OF ARKANSAS" issued at the conclusion of the convention, "we found that a clear majority of Union delegates had been elected. . .The path of duty to us was clear, and the ordinance of secession was voted down. . .While Arkansas is not committed to the doctrine of secession, she condemns coercion by the Federal Government, and recommends the removal of causes that might lead to a collision. . ."

The convention adjourned after calling for a statewide vote on secession during the first week of August, 1861, which "will seal the fate of the State, and in all probability determine whether the Union will cease to exist and shed its blessings upon millions of people, or cease to occupy a place upon the map of nations: whether our national greatness is perpetual, affording a bright example and living evidence that man is capable of self-government, or be destroyed in the morning of its existence. . .Your verdict we shall await with confidence that you will not determine to destroy that government. . ."

The convention appealed to "patriotism, love of country and reverence for the memory of your fathers, who handed it down to you to be transmitted as a sacred inheritance to your children. . .What the future will develop, once the work of disintegration passes to a point beyond control, which it surely will, if Arkansas secedes, is beyond the wisdom of man. . ." Finally, the address called upon Arkansas citizens to ignore the "mad ravings" of the "ultras" in both the North and South and to listen to the "appeals of patriotism and justice" for both sections.

In his book Pea Ridge and Prairie Grove, the Reverend William Baxter, Fayetteville minister and president of the famous Arkansas College, told how the crisis initially affected local college students:

"Although I had long been engaged in teaching, I had never had a class to which I was so much attached, and of which I felt so proud, as that under my charge during the session of '60-'61. . .Up to the month of March, 1861, the studies had suffered but little interruption; at the close of the first term in January, and on the 22d of February, several addresses were made, mostly in a loyal tone, and some of them in a spirit warmly patriotic; only one or two inclining to the Southern view of affairs. In the Literary Society, too, political matters began to engross considerable attention; sides were taken, with but little bitterness of feeling. . ."

Black Republicans

Agitation for war got boosts from the "ultras" on both sides. War fever in the North was stirred by images depicting every Southerner as a brutal slave holder. Secession got a boost from fears of the Northern "ultras" whom Southern "ultras" called "Black Republicans." Southern "ultras" claimed Northerners fervently desired the abolition of slavery, social and political equality for blacks, and the triumph of the North over the South in national affairs.

In its statement of purpose the influential Fayetteville Arkansian, es-

A Park for Prairie Grove

The men who had fought there would remember the place, but who else would? Would the death and suffering now called the Battle of Prairie Grove, December 7, 1862, pass from human memory when the battle's survivors all died?

Beginning in 1886 the Confederate survivors had held reunions on the old battlefield. Union survivors also visited the site, but their reunions were held in Iowa, Wisconsin, and elsewhere in the Northern states that furnished troops for the battle (see Flashback, February 1961, for information on these reunions). In 1906 a chapter of the United Daughters of the Confederacy was formed at Prairie Grove with the determination to purchase property on the battlefield. In 1908 a parcel of just over nine acres was secured for about $1,000. The park provided the stage for great pageantry at some of these reunions, including "distinguished speakers. . .parades with beautiful horses and elaborately decorated vehicles. Always, of course, belles of the city were asked to ride in the parade."

But of course soldiers, even those who survive hot fights like that of December 7, 1862, eventually pass away. The last official meeting of Samuel Crawford Camp No. 384 of the United Confederate Veterans was held on the battlefield in 1924. The United Daughters of the Confederacy kept the reunions alive until World War II. Now what would happen? Was it time now to forget?

In 1953 the Prairie Grove Lions Club got involved with the park, making numerous improvements. The involvement of the Lions set the stage for what has become the modern park, for on December 7, 1956, the Battle Monument—a 54 feet high chimney of native stone from nearby Rhea's Mill that was moved into the park—was dedicated. Plans were also in the works for moving into the park several historic structures, like the Morrow house, that figured in the battle. (For numerous details on the history of the park in this period, see Robert Logan's compilation in the Arkansas Historical Quarterly, Autumn 1957,

Confederate (and Union) reunions on the battlefield at Prairie Grove kept alive the comradery of the war years and lead to the eventual establishment of a park on the site.

The park has continued to grow. A visitor's center dedicated to the memory of Confederate General Thomas C. Hindman also houses the park's offices. Every year on Labor Day weekend a popular arts and crafts fair brings thousands of visitors to the same ground where Americans fought one another so bitterly. In the late 1970s the Arkansas Legislature approved funding that added 74 acres to the east side of the existing park and provided for renovation of the Borden house, which is on the National Register of Historic Places. And for those with nostalgia for the central fact of the park, there are periodic reenactments of the battle itself.

tablished on March 6, 1859, included a determination "to stay the on-rushing tide of abolitionism, which threatens to overwhelm the South. . ." Alfred M. Wilson of Fayetteville, United States Attorney for the Western District of Arkansas and a leading pro-South advocate, made reference to the hated "Black Republicans" in his letters. Prior to the February 1861 vote, Wilson predicted that "spunky" southern Arkansas would resist Federal coercion, but that the "northern parts" of the state, which of course included Washington County, "are very inclined to Black Republicanism, and I expect will vote to fold their arms and tamely submit."

After months of tension, the Southern "ultras" finally triumphed. On the national scene, the war of words ended and the shooting commenced on April 12, 1861, when the Federal garrison at Fort Sumter in Charleston Harbor was attacked by Southern "ultras." President Lincoln called on the states to furnish troops, asking that Arkansas furnish a regiment for the purpose of putting down the rebellion.

The March 1861 state convention had ended with a decision to await events, with a new vote scheduled for August. As convention president, David Walker had discretionary power to reassemble the convention if events dictated the need. In this respect—his power to call into session a convention that could overturn civil law and take the state out of the Federal Union—the future of Washington County and the state as a whole rested in his hands. He called the convention to reassemble at Little Rock on May 6.

In his book Loyalty on the Frontier, A. W. Bishop wrote that on about April 27, prior to leaving for Little Rock, David Walker issued an address "TO THE PEOPLE OF WASHINGTON COUNTY" in which he stated,

"Your delegates were elected under a pledge to cooperate with the Border Slave States, in an effort to settle our difficulties with the Northern States upon honorable and just terms, and under no circumstances to vote for an ordinance of secession, unless the same was referred back to you for your rejection or approval. The majority received by myself and colleague was very large, so great as to leave no doubt that you heartily approved our position. . ."

Now that the fighting had begun, Walker thought it was time to go back to the people, or at least to the convention. "The question presented for your consideration is, under existing circumstances, what will you have your delegates do? Shall they still adhere to the position taken by them before the election, and which you so unanimously endorsed, or will you expect of them to vote for an unconditional ordinance of secession, which is not to be referred back to you for approval?"

Washington County's citizenry had little time to instruct the delegates. A. W. Bishop, a strong Union partisan, wrote that the people of Washington County "had been lulled into security by the ordinance of the 20th of March" in which secession had been defeated. "They sought, nevertheless, to meet the emergency," Bishop wrote, "and immediately steps were taken to instruct David Walker in accordance with his request. Union men rode night and day about the county, urging the people to assemble with all possible dispatch in their township capacities. . ." Bishop states that the convention opened in Little Rock on May 6 before these meetings could have effect.

On April 27 voters in West Fork Township held a mass meeting and issued a four-part statement strongly opposed to secession. ". . .We utterly oppose any action in the State Convention that will sever the State of Arkansas from the Federal Government, without a full and fair expression of the loyal voters of the state."

The convention of May 6 took Arkansas out of the Union and into what Walker had called the "calamity that is now upon us." At first five delegates opposed secession, but under pressure from the convention, four changed their votes. The lone remaining "no" belonged to Isaac Murphy, formerly an attorney and educator in Washington County. "My principles are all Southern," he stated. "If necessary, I would lay down my life for the benefit of the Southern States, but I would rather lose a thousand lives than aid in bringing about the untold evils that would assuredly follow in the train of secession. Again I say, to the passage of this ordinance, 'No!'"

The War Begins

On the campus of Arkansas College in Fayetteville, the Reverend William Baxter watched his school disintegrating. "Recruiting and volunteering began," he wrote. "The feeling among the students on both sides grew warmer; those who were in favor of enlisting began to accuse those who were loyally disposed with a want of courage; the pressure of public sentiment in favor of all young men going into the army began to have influence, til at length, in early May, a young man, who had ever advocated the Union side, stung, doubtless, by the taunts of cowardice. . .closed an address to the students assembled in the college hall for religious and literary exercises, with the words, 'Let us die like men!' He was cheered tumultuously. . ."

At the corner of East and Center Streets in Fayetteville (in 1987 the site of the First National Bank), there is a bronze tablet commemorating a day in May 1861 when a company of boys, mustered into Confederate service from the Walnut Grove Church area, received from the hands of Miss Mary M. Stone what Fayetteville's historian William S. Campbell called "the first Confederate flag unfurled in this county." They became Company E, Second Cavalry Regiment of Arkansas Volunteers.

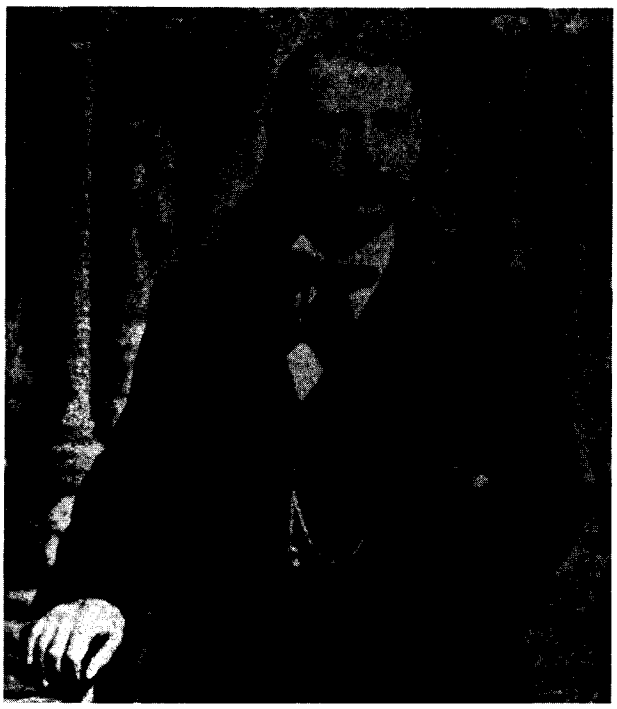
Washington County was a coveted prize. A day's ride to the north was Missouri, a state that remained in the Union but which had strong sympathies with the South. The two great battles fought in northwest Arkansas—Pea Ridge on March 6-8, 1862, and Prairie Grove on December 7, 1862—both involved attempts by the Confederates to consolidate control over northwest Arkansas and to wrest control of southern Missouri from the Union.

The Indian country with its productive farms and growing population was immediately west of Washington County. Alfred M. Wilson of Fayetteville sought an alliance between the Confederacy and the Cherokees. Elias C. Boudinot, who had helped to establish the pro-South Fayetteville Arkansian in 1859, was the son of a Cherokee leader slain during the 1839 murders that brought Sophia Sawyer and her future school to Fayetteville. Boudinot had been elected secretary of the Arkansas secession convention of March 4, 1861. Writing on the subject of Arkansas and the Cherokees, E. E. Dale stated, "While he was of sufficient prominence to make him a logical choice, it is probable that his selection was meant, in part at least, as a friendly gesture toward the Cherokee neighbors. . ." Eventually, Indian soldiers fought on both sides in the battles affecting Washington County.

Washington County was a rich resource for whoever managed to maintain control. The U. S. Census for 1860 showed the county ranked first



Elias C. Boudinot was a Cherokee whose father was killed in 1839. Elias later studied law in Fayetteville and became an associate editor of the Fayetteville Arkansian. He became a lieutenant-colonel in the Confederate Army. According to William Campbell, "He was the soul of honor and chivalry, and knew nothing about fear. An accomplished musician, vocalist, orator. . .he was the cynosure of any occasion." Boudinot later represented the Cherokee nation before the U. S. Congress. (Phillip Steele) in Arkansas in wheat production (123,000 bushels), sheep (11,000 head), wool (23,000 pounds), corn (664,000 bushels), oats (85,000 bushels), Irish potatoes (18,000 bushels), hay (1,800 tons), and grass seed (1,000 bushels). The county ranked second in the state in numbers of horses (5,000), swine (34,000), rye (6,400 bushels), value of garden products ($7,000), sorghum (13,000 gallons), and was in the top five counties in value of livestock, production of butter, pounds of honey, and value of animals slaughtered.

In short, the army that controlled Washington County held keys to the future of southwestern Missouri and northwestern Arkansas, had an inside track on an alliance with the Indians, and could draw upon the rich harvests of the county to support military operations.

Military Activity

In that spring of the war Confederate military companies were organized in the county. Peter Mankins, Jr., a pioneer in the Middle Fork valley, raised a company of 84 men and personally paid to clothe 64. Campbell's history of Fayetteville mentions the organization of Company C, First Regiment, Arkansas Confederates and on October 9, 1861, Company E, First Regiment, Arkansas Confederate Cavalry. According to Goodspeed's history of northwest Arkansas, around the first of July 1861 General Ben McCulloch of Texas, in charge of Confederate troops in Arkansas and Indian Territory, issued a call to arms which resulted in several hundred enlistments at Fayetteville.

Fontaine Richard Earle, the young president of Cane Hill College, closed the college in 1861 and enlisted as a private in a company of Arkansas militia. The college's professor of mathematics was elected captain of the company, which was composed primarily of Cane Hill College students. This unit would soon see battle at Wilson's Creek in Missouri. The Reverend William Baxter states, "enlistments went on rapidly, and as the secessionists had taken time by the forelock in this matter, by the consolidation of companies which, for months before hostilities broke out, had been on drill. . .The ladies, too, caught the war spirit; uniforms, sashes, and banners grew under their active hands."

With the advance in military activity, came repression of public sentiment which could be thought of as abolitionist, or at least not pro-Southern. A. M. Wilson of Fayetteville wrote as early as May 7, 1861, that "the Southern people may look out for emissaries to stir up insurrection among the Negroes, and would therefore suggest that a police be established in every neighborhood whose business is to hang such cattle wherever found. . ."

Joseph Sanders, who lived in Brush Creek Township in the northeastern section of the county, was a popular figure who served as justice of the peace, constable, school teacher, and postmaster. He also kept a diary. Though he had come to Washington County from Indiana, he was not an abolitionist, and he tried to remain neutral during the war. In his diary he mentioned attending a meeting in Fort Smith during a time when two "abolitionists" there were hung. According to Sanders, this event "scared the boys so bad that we drove all night and got across the mountain 40 miles and landed in Fayetteville at sunrise."

At first Washington County might have seemed a safe haven, but "finally, through false reports, it got to be dangerous for any man to advocate the Union. Some few still ventured to say to each other what they thought. Finally the country was called out as home guards, some intending to shoot any person that spoke for the Union. . .Finally the churches were prevented from meeting for fear someone would pray for the Dutch. . ." (Dutch is probably a reference to the recent German immigrants who were serving in the Union Army units that fought in northwest Arkansas—Dutch being used incorrectly. The German settlement at Hermannsburg that was eventually renamed Dutch Mills is also an incorrect reference to the nationality of these pioneers.)

Confederate Territory

The first outside military units to reach the county were the Hempstead Rifles, from Hempstead County, Arkansas. "Most of them were fine-looking fellows," Baxter wrote, "some of them men of wealth, position, and influence; some of them former students of Arkansas College." Shots had not yet been fired, but the arrival of regular troops made it clear that this was now Confederate territory. "The mails stopped," Baxter wrote, "newspapers ceased to be seen. . ." Basic articles like hardware, medicines, pins and needles, matches, "nay, everything, one might say, were now foreign articles. . ."

On August 10, 1861, some of the Washington County boys who had enlisted enthusiastically in the spring and summer—including the students and professors from Cane Hill College—got their baptism of fire at the battle of Wilson's Creek or Oak Hills near Springfield, Missouri. The Confederates gained a partial victory, forcing the Union Army into retreat. The losses in the fight were severe, estimated by historian Elmo Ingenthron at about 2,300 killed, wounded, and missing, or 11 percent of the Confederates and 20 percent of the Unionists engaged! Confederates under Sterling Price occupied Springfield.

The Confederate units from Arkansas were mainly home guards, enlisted only for the defense of the state. These troops under General Nicholas B. Pearce (commander of the Northwest Arkansas state troops) and General Ben McCulloch began to return to Arkansas. Washington County had become the Confederate commissary, and Fayetteville was a huge storage depot in the Confederate rear. After Wilson's Creek, McCulloch's Texans and Colonel Louis Herbert's Third Louisiana Brigade (including the Pelican Rifles and the Iberville Grays) spent the fall and winter in the Fayetteville and Van Buren areas. The Louisiana troops were quartered on the campus of William Baxter's Arkansas College.

The Fayetteville Female Institute, called Van Horne's Academy for its founder Thomas B. Van Horne, occupied a two story frame building with a tall spire at the corner of College and Dickson. Van Horne, a Unionist, went north in 1861. His building became an arsenal. The stables of the old Butterfield Overland Mail Company became the seat of Confederate government. According to Baxter, "Depots for beef and pork were established, and were rapidly filling; food for a large army was collected, mills were pressed for the military service."

The war came to Washington County in both humorous and grim ways. A paper published at Fayetteville called The War Bulletin dated February 4, 1862, tells about a snowstorm on January 28 that covered Fayetteville with a foot of snow. The Southern boys from Louisiana and Texas went wild, rolling officers and civilians in the snow, with sometimes as many as 50 soldiers whooping and yelling as was "never heard this side of the masterly Yankee advance upon Manasseh" (as reprinted from Flashback, February 1977, p. 10). But it wasn't all fun. The same issue of the paper contained a list of 62 Confederate soldiers who had died of disease in hospitals at Mt. Comfort, at Ozark hospital (near Mt. Comfort), and at Fayetteville.

This fine residence was built in Fayetteville for the Tebbetts family in the 1850s. It survived the fires of the Civil War. Strenuous efforts by the Washington County Historical Society resulted in its preservation and restoration.

In February 1862, the regrouped Federal Army in Missouri under General Samuel R. Curtis began to move against the Confederate units in Missouri, forcing them into retreat. On February 20, Confederate units from Missouri began moving south through Fayetteville. On February 21 the main units arrived. "The roads were bad, their clothing scanty, their looks dispirited. . ." wrote Baxter. "The officers of the commissary and quartermaster's department, unable to remove their stores, threw open the various depots to the soldiers and citizens; the permission thus granted was construed into a general license to plunder, and pillage soon became the order of the day. . .Private stores were broken open, and everyone helped himself to whatever suited him; and as regiment after regiment poured in to swell the tide of waste and robbery, the scene became one of riot and unrestrained plunder."

Confederate Retreat

On the following day, February 22, 1862, Baxter and other citizens of Fayetteville watched as cavalry units under orders from General Ben McCulloch "dashed into town and began firing the buildings which had been used for military purposes; some of them contained large quantities of beef and bacon, which soon added violence to the flames. Then the large stables, once the property of the Overland Mail Company, were destroyed; the steam mill, which had been furnishing the rebel army ten thousand pounds of flour per day, was consumed. . ." Next Van Horne's school, lately a storage depot for artillery shells, was torched. Great explosions spread the fire and destruction.

The plan was to leave nothing of use for the Federal Army. This certainly made sense from a purely military standpoint, but it can't have made much sense to citizens of the county who were sympathetic to the Southern cause and considered their town to be a part of the Confederate States of America. On the Fayetteville square, the Louisianans under Colonel Herbert ordered the merchants to stand back as all the businesses were burned, apparently starting with the general store of William McIlroy and James H. Van Hoose. By midnight everything on the square was in ashes except the rock building owned by Stephen K. Stone. According to Peter Harkins' biography of McIlroy (which includes Van Hoose), Van Hoose had as early as 1860—when the secession crisis was starting to boil—joined a militia unit called the Washington Rifle Guards, and members of the Van Hoose family served in the Confederate Army. "It was small damned consolation to the merchants to know that they had contributed to McCulloch's scorched earth strategy which called for luring the Yankees south into the Boston Mountain passes where the Rebels could cut 'em off and cut 'em to bits," wrote Harkins.

"The few citizens who remained could do little toward arresting the progress of fires in so many different places at the same time; and when night fell a great portion of our town was a smoldering ruin," Baxter wrote. And what made it even worse was that the burning served no military purpose. The Federals refused to be drawn into the Boston Mountains and did little except scout toward Fayetteville. The real battle wouldn't come until two weeks later, at Pea Ridge.

Headquarters House, current home of the Washington County Historical Society, was once the home of Judge Jonas Tebbetts and his family. In the summer of 1861, when secession was at fever pitch, Tebbetts gathered his family. "Children, this is the fourth of July, 1861," he said. "I want you to remember that you heard your father read the Declaration of Independence on this day; and it is my wish that you either read aloud or hear aloud this great paper every fourth of July that comes into your life. Also, I want you to remember that during this stress of war and danger, your father and mother are still loyal to this flag before you and to the government for which it stands."

In late February, after the departure of the Confederates and the arrival of the Yankees, the stars and stripes were hoisted on the courthouse flagpole. It was a brief interlude, however, for now the Yankees again fell back toward Missouri, and during the first week of March the Confederates were again passing through the county on their way north, hoping to wrest Missouri from the Yankees. The flag business, and perhaps other incidents of Unionist sentiment, had not been missed by certain Confederate authorities.

According to the account by Baxter, Tebbetts—who had been one of the leading figures of northwest Arkansas before the war—was arrested on the order of General McCulloch. Upon hearing of Tebbetts' arrest, Baxter—also a Unionist and president of Arkansas Colleges—scurried to a mountain top (present day Mt. Sequoyah in Fayetteville?), "among the cliffs and caverns of the rocks, hiding like a criminal, hourly in danger of being hunted like a wild beast. . ."

Baxter states that Tebbetts "was hurried off in the direction of the Boston Mountains where the Southern army was encamped. About twelve miles from Fayetteville, the party reached the lines, and there the prisoner was met by some officers of the Arkansas troops, by whom he was well known." They attempted to obtain his release, but McCulloch refused to see them, directing the guard to conduct Tebbetts to Colonel Hebert with the order to "keep the d—d scoundrel under double guard, safe for hanging." Tebbetts was sent on to Fort Smith and held in a cell. However, blind fate rather than politics, was to dictate the outcome.

Arkansas College had escaped the conflagrations of February, but now as the Confederate Army passed through Fayetteville on March 3-4, 1862, the beautiful college building went down. "The night was clear and cloudless, not a breath of air was stirring, and, as the smoke curled skyward in the calm of midnight, this shrine of learning, the abode of peace, fell a sacrifice to the fierce spirit of war and destruction," Baxter wrote.

Battle of Pea Ridge

The Confederate units that sent Baxter into hiding and Tebbetts to Fort Smith for hanging were on their way to the battlefield called Pea Ridge or Elkhorn Tavern, in Benton County. Fought on March 6-8, 1862, the battle was a Union victory and gave Unionists a firmer grip on Missouri. Rebuffed, the Confederates retreated through the Boston Mountains. The Union lost 1,400 killed, wounded, and missing, and the Confederates approximately 1,300.

During the Confederate retreat the old Truesdale Mill on Clear Creek near modern day Johnson was burned, along with two other mills on Clear Creek, in order to keep them from falling into the hands of the Federal Army. The Truesdale Mill had dated to the earliest days of the county. According to Confederate General Ben McCulloch, "Every man who is a patriot and sound southern man will be the first to put the torch to his own grain or mill rather than have them left to aid the enemy," (quoted from Arkansas Historical Quarterly, Summer 1987).

The Confederate Army and the Confederate cause in Washington County were in grim condition after the battle. Joseph Sanders saw the Confederate Army during its retreat through the northeastern corner of Washington County. "They come about 20 miles through the rain and mud. Lots of them had throwed away their shoes and socks and was wading barefoot. Every house in three or four miles was full all day and all night getting something to eat and they killed every fowl of any kind, all the cattle, hogs and sheep, and took all the bacon and corn they could find for several miles around. For you see they had eat nothing for four days, nor their horses. . .They had no blankets nor tents, and it rained all nite on them. . ." Baxter also saw remnants of the Confederate Army as it passed through Fayetteville. "They were thoroughly dispirited," he wrote, "a human tide swept by a broken, drifting, disorganized mass. . ."

One of the Confederate dead at Pea Ridge was General Ben McCulloch. The Reverend Baxter states McCulloch's body was moved to Fort Smith. There, the fatal bullet was shown to Judge Tebbetts, in his cell. (An article by Thomas Galey about Judge Tebbetts in the May 1953 Flashback states Tebbetts kept the bullet and still had it in his old age!) Tebbetts was soon released and returned to Fayetteville, but his return was brief. The dangers to Union sympathizers in the war had become too clear. Three people who had played a tremendous part in making Fayetteville and Washington County into a widely admired center for education—Tebbetts, Baxter, and the Reverend Robert Graham (founder of Arkansas College)—all left Fayetteville in the middle of the war, never to return.

Soldiers for the North and South

In Flashback (July 1964), Walter J. Lemke noted, "There is a scattering of 1850 residents of Washington County who were born in northern states, especially Illinois and Ohio. But the preponderance of southern natives raises another question: How was it possible for Washington and neighboring counties to raise two cavalry regiments, two infantry regiments, and one artillery corps for service on the Northern side in the Civil War? . . .Why would men who were natives of Tennessee, Kentucky, and North Carolina fight on opposite sides in the Great Rebellion?"

Estimates vary considerably about the number of men from Washington County (and neighboring counties) who served on the two sides during the war. The Goodspeed History of Northwest Arkansas, published in 1889, included an estimate by Colonel Thomas J. Hunt, a native of the county who helped organize the first Federal unit, that 500 to 800 men served under the stars and stripes (p. 227). Confederate officer Colonel T. M. Gunter (and others) estimated about 2,000 served under the stars and bars (p. 232).

Citizens of Washington County had enlisted with enthusiasm in the Confederate Army from the beginning of the war. There seems to have been a major increase in Confederate enlistments when, in June 1862, in the wake of the defeat at Pea Ridge, Arkansas Confederate commander Thomas C. Hindman sent recruiters into northwest Arkansas with the requirement that draft-age men either volunteer or be conscripted. At Cane Hill, for example, Cane Hill College President Fontaine R. Earle raised a company among his friends and neighbors. This unit became Company B of the 34th Arkansas Infantry. This regiment, composed almost entirely of men from Washington County, was formally organized at Prairie Grove and Mount Comfort in September 1862, with William H. Brooks of Fayetteville as its colonel.

Jesse James in Washington County

In 1862, when he was 15 years old, a Missouri farm boy named Jesse James—later famous as an outlaw—joined an irregular detachment of Confederate cavalrymen commanded by Lieutenant William H. Gregg. Gregg's unit was part of Quantrill's guerrilla company nominally under command of Confederate cavalryman Jo Shelby. In December, James—along with his brother Frank and Cole Younger—apparently took part in the attack that opened the battle of Prairie Grove.

According to "The Battle of Prairie Grove," a booklet distributed at the Prairie Grove Battlefield Historic Park (no author or date is listed), the Union cavalry, including the northwest Arkansas men in the First Arkansas, saw what they thought was a company of Union cavalry approaching them, but instead it turned out to be Gregg's guerrillas in captured Federal uniforms! "The guerrillas pounced on the unsuspecting

Bushwhackers

Troops of another kind were also being raised. In the same month, Hindman issued General Orders 17 (June 17, 1862) permitting the formation of "independent companies of mounted men or infantry. . .arming and equipping themselves, and to serve in that part of the district to which they belong. . ." Naturally, partisans were also organized on the other side.

These irregular groups came to be called "bushwhackers" by the people whom they victimized. The appearance of these fighters was, as Elmo Ingenthron stated in his Civil War history, Borderland Rebellion, an intensification of "internecine warfare in northern Arkansas and southern Missouri. . .Many local defense organizations on both sides of the conflict went on the offensive and declared war on their neighbors. By mid-summer and early autumn an ever increasing number of skirmishes, hangings, murders, robberies, home burnings and minor military engagements marked the tempo of the war. . .The whole region was seething with hostilities. . .Enraged by atrocities, fanaticism and revenge, many still uncommitted were driven into the services of one side or the other."

Some partisan units may actually have been trying to conduct their activities as outlined in the "rules of war"—that is, treating noncombatants as noncombatants. But as Chris Catalfamo-Serio stated in her study entitled, The Effect of the Civil War on Ozark Culture, "The Civil War gave the opportunity to every villain and scoundrel within reaching distance of Northwest Arkansas to prey upon the rich farmland of the Ozarks, and to compound the terror already so much a part of everyday life in a countryside torn apart by advancing and retreating armies. Where war engendered scarcity and privation, the bushwhackers made starvation a certainty. While hungry armies picked the countryside clean of food and provisions, the bushwhackers tortured people to make them reveal the hiding place of gold that was not there. For sure, many bushwhackers were desperados, parasites that took advantage of war to plunder and rob and kill innocent and helpless people. But there seems at this late date to be several gradations of the term 'bushwhacker.'"

According to historian Robert G. Winn, whose book Civil War in the Ozarks brings together many stories about the horrors that bushwhackers brought to home life in war torn southern Washington County, "All foraged and ransacked the countryside in much the same manner. All relied upon the local populace for rations. . .Local people were the losers, regardless of which side pillaged." Winn points out that the historical record includes numerous cases of shooting, hanging, starvation, but none of rape—the special crime of violence against women. "We surmise that the subject of rape was so taboo that when it occurred victims were so ashamed and/or embarrassed they kept silent. The subject was not one to mention, much less weave stories around, when grandmothers spun yarns for young listeners" in the years after the close of the war.

In a county where many families had sided with the South, it was often thought that bushwhacking was primarily an offense of the Unionists. It is true that Unionists and neutrals had been outraged by their treatment during the time when the Confederates held sway in Washington County, and that now, after Pea Ridge and the Confederate retreat, the difficulties could be revenged. "Union men who had been driven from their homes, and hunted like wild beasts, and even some who had been deemed dead, suddenly made their appearance among us, dressed in National uniform. . .and bitter was the vengeance they inflicted upon the authors cavalrymen, scattering before they could fire a shot. . ."

By 1864, when he was 17 years old, Jesse James and his guerrillas had been forced out of Missouri. At Cane Hill on November 22, 1864, James and his guerrillas fought a skirmish with Federal forces. Later he entered the Cherokee nation, then went south into Texas when the war ended.

The Hanging and Revival of Maston Gregg

One post-Civil War postmaster in Washington County almost didn't make it. His name was Maston Gregg. His story is told in Flashback, July 1965, by M. H. Hudson. In 1864, when he was 50 years old, Maston Gregg became a marked man because of the rumor he had some money. Maston lived in the northeastern part of the county on the White River. He was fairly prosperous so the bushwhackers rode out to steal his money.

Hudson states that bushwhackers were more feared than any other aspect of the war, including big battles. "These human vultures ran in packs, robbing, murdering, maiming, abusing, and there was no authority to stop them. . .The people were defenseless against the marauding bands of deserters and slackers. . ."

When Maston didn't produce the money demanded by the bushwhackers, they hanged him from one of his own apple trees. Maston's 12 year old son had seen the whole sorry affair from a hiding place. When the bushwhackers rode away, doubtlessly assuming Maston was dead, the boy ran out and cut him down. The family members worked to revive Maston, and by-and-by he came of their wrongs. . .I am no apologist for the fierce and unsparing law so fearfully and rigidly enforced as it was in many instances. . .I am well assured, on both sides, [that the guerrillas] did not incumber themselves with prisoners. . ." wrote the Reverend William Baxter about the outbreak of guerrilla warfare.

First Arkansas Cavalry Volunteers

On June 16, 1862—about the same time of the order from Major-General Hindman authorizing Confederate guerrilla units—the Federal War Department approved the organization of the First Arkansas Cavalry Volunteers. This unit, the first of its kind raised in a seceded state, included many Unionists from Washington County. Unionists had been placed under tremendous pressures by several Confederate laws. A law passed in March 1862 had made it a jailable offense to discourage enlistment in the Confederate Army, and the Confederate Conscription Act of April 1862 forced men to get an exemption or head North. According to the account by Union officer A. W. Bishop, in mid-May 1862, a band of 30 men led by Thomas Wilhite of Washington County crossed the Missouri line desiring to serve in the Union Army. In June, 115 men under Thomas J. Hunt, also of Washington County, joined Wilhite's group. The regiment formally entered service on August 7, 1862.

Wilhite, son of a pioneer and a native of the Fall Creek area of southern Washington County, was a staunch opponent of secession. He had been part of what A. W. Bishop termed a "score of well-armed men" who "were determined that [a pro-Union man] should speak without molestation" at a stormy public meeting in Fayetteville prior to the secession convention in 1861. When Arkansas went out of the Union, Wilhite returned to his farm. Most of his neighbors favored the Confederacy. He kept himself well-armed. Several unsuccessful attempts were made to arrest him, and he was threatened with hanging. His Regular Baptist preacher denounced him from the pulpit. By November 1861 things were so hot for him and other Unionists that he and another man, William Zinnamon, were required to "lay out"—live in a cave and only go home clandestinely.

In spring 1862, Wilhite went to Springfield, Missouri, and there learned of plans for an Arkansas Yankee military unit. He returned, organizing among the Unionists of southern Washington County and conducting them to Missouri. Presumably, he was also busy terrorizing Confederates and their sympathizers. Upon his return to the county, he was the subject of intense hunt by Confederate guerrillas, among them the famous band led by Peter Mankins, another Washington County resident.

According to the A. W. Bishop account, the local Confederate Home Guards obtained a warrant for Wilhite's arrest and execution. Major-General Hindman sweetened the warrant by offering a "reward of seven thousand dollars (Confederate money, presumably) and three honorable discharges from the Confederate service" for Wilhite, "living or dead." Notices were posted along Cove, Fall, and Lee Creeks, and the West Fork of the White River—to no effect. In the fall of 1862 Wilhite joined the First Arkansas Cavalry Volunteers, where he served as lieutenant of the company he had helped organize.

Indian Participation

In this momentous year, 1862, Confederate Indians had fought at Pea Ridge. This force, lead by the famous Albert Pike, consisted of Cherokees, Chickasaws, Choctaws, and Creeks. One of the two Cherokee around. The next day they moved closer to Fayetteville where the Federal Army was busy discouraging the presence of bushwhackers. It will come as no surprise that, like others who had been victimized, Maston Gregg then joined the Federal Army (probably Home Guards).

Later, the family went home. In 1866 Maston Gregg became postmaster at Evergreen and died two years later of natural causes.

regiments was commanded by Stand Watie. Union organizing among the Indians had been unsuccessful until the Confederate loss at Pea Ridge, after which several Union Indian regiments were formed. Indians on both sides would fight on several occasions in Washington County.

Confederate Indians at Pea Ridge had been accused of scalping. These, and other horrible stories, did nothing to calm the nerves of people in the western part of Washington County who became familiar with another kind of guerrilla—Pin Indians. Stories handed down since the Civil War paint a picture of the Pins as a lawless band that preyed along the border between northwest Arkansas and the Indian Territory, apparently making little distinction between Union and Confederate during their raids.

The name Pins was derived from the Keetoowah Society of full-blood Cherokees, whose badge was crossed pins worn on a hunting shirt. A Baptist missionary, the Reverend Evan Jones and his son John, were active in helping organize this society and preached the necessity for abolition of slavery to its members.

Many Keetoowah Society members served—presumably with honor—in regular Union Indian units, others in the infamous outlaw gangs called Pins. These gangs certainly committed many crimes. Diaries kept by Lina and Nani Hermann of old Hermannsburg (now Dutch Mills) record numerous depredations committed by the Pins, or at least by Indians and "half-breeds" as well as others associated with both sides. Typical of happenings was this one, on December 8, 1862, the day after the battle of Prairie Grove: "I had just set the table for the noonday meal when five rowdy halfbreeds came in and boldly took our places at the table and with much loud laughing ate our meal," wrote Nani Hermann. "They kept their guns with them while they ate. The children were greatly frightened. At first they talked in Cherokee and laughed wickedly. Then they asked in English where our men folks were. . ."

Union troops commanded by General James G. Blunt, shown here, made a successful junction with Union troops under Francis J. Herron, thus foiling the plan of Confederate Thomas C. Hindman and resulting in the bloody fight at Prairie Grove, December 7, 1862. Hindman's bold plan was to invade Missouri. Stalemated at Prairie Grove, his army retreated through the Boston Mountains.

It seems likely that the Pin Indians were also blamed for things done by others. An article published in the Arkansas Democrat Magazine (January 4, 1970) even states, "Many times white bushwhackers painted their faces and masqueraded as Indians. . ."

Washington County was a barren place, indeed. In the whirlwind of secession, the county was now beset with the march of armies, sudden terror of guerrillas, and the brigandage of outlaw gangs. A report from the Union Army of the Frontier that appeared in the New York Herald on November 7, 1862 (reprinted in Flashback May 1953) stated that Fayetteville was dominated by "naked chimneys and blackened ruins. . .there is not a solitary place of business in operation. . .Provisions are so scarce here that the few inhabitants who are left are subsisting on sweet potatoes. . .Vegetables and country produce cannot be purchased at all, as the country people refuse steadfastly to sell for individual shinplasters, and there is no other small currency. . ."

And this was not the end of the suffering, either. The report also stated that in their retreat from Pea Ridge the Confederates had left about 300 sick and wounded. "They were glad to fall into the hands of Uncle Samuel, as secesh is out of medicine and everything essential for the sick. . ."

Despite the Confederate loss at Pea Ridge, the maneuvering for control of northwest Arkansas and Missouri continued. Now the strategy of the Federal forces also involved wresting Arkansas away from Confederate control. This set the stage for the climactic battle of the Civil War in Washington County.

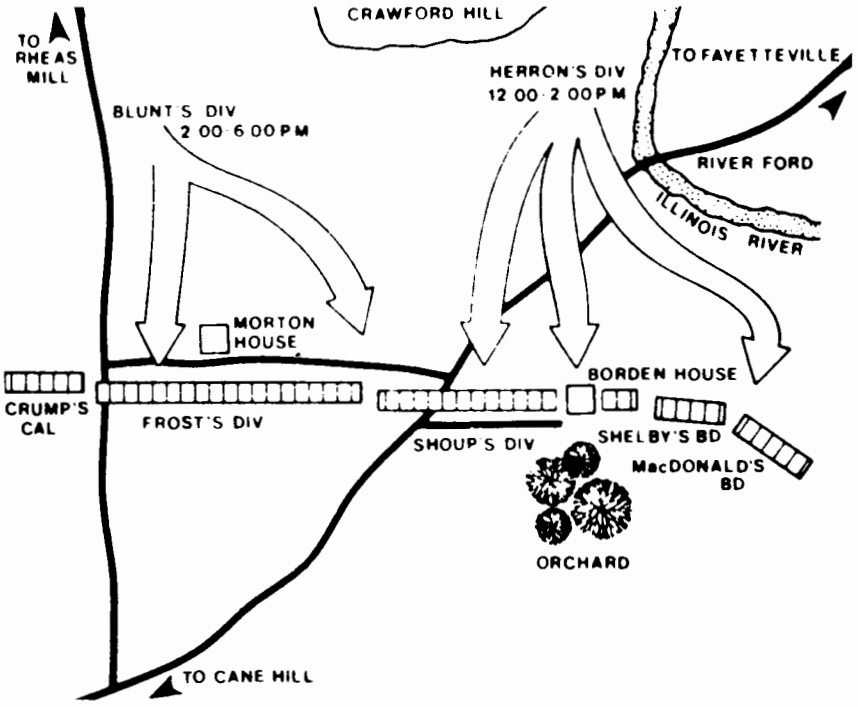
In August 1862, the Confederates had been busy regrouping their forces, slowly reoccupying border areas left behind after Pea Ridge. Confederate units, for example, were again stationed at the old Elkhorn Tavern battlefield site. At Elm Springs in Washington County, there were 4,000 unarmed Missouri and Arkansas state troops in training.

Out of the fall maneuvering came a small battle, fought at Newtonia, Missouri, (near Neosho) on September 30, 1862, that was a clear victory for the Confederates. However, short of both supplies and manpower—and in the face of a rapid Federal build-up—the Confederates again withdrew south through the Boston Mountains to Fort Smith.

In late November that year, the 2,000 horsemen of Confederate General John S. Marmaduke's cavalry division—part of Major-General Thomas C. Hindman's army of 11,000—moved north. At Cane Hill on November 28, a day-long battle erupted between Federal units under General James G. Blunt and Marmaduke's cavalry. On December 3, Hindman's entire army had crossed the Arkansas River and was heading north. Blunt wired for reinforcements from Springfield, Missouri, and Federal units under General Francis J. Herron began a 100 mile march toward Washington County.

Battle of Prairie Grove

On December 5 fighting occurred around Reed's Mountain in the Morrow community. On the following day, Hindman's army reached the Morrow area and planned an attack designed to destroy Blunt's army before Herron could arrive to reinforce him. (The John Morrow farmhouse, where Confederate officers spent the night of December 6, 1862, prior to the battle of Prairie Grove, was moved to the Prairie Grove Battlefield Park, where it has been restored.)



Plan of the Battle of Prairie Grove, December 7, 1862. (Arkansas Department of Parks and Tourism)

Herron's army, exhausted from its 100 mile forced march from Springfield, reached Fayetteville late in the night of December 6-7, 1862. The success of Herron's march came as a shock to the Confederate commanders. Now, instead of attacking Blunt first, Hindman made a bold decision. By placing the bulk of his 11,000 men between the two Union forces, Hindman hoped to be able to defeat them piecemeal: first Herron, then Blunt—then on to St. Louis and control of the Mississippi!

The decisive battle began early on December 7, 1862. The Confederates chose as a battlefield the large prairie on the east side of modern Prairie Grove. In the growing season the prairie farmland supported crops of wheat, corn, and hay, divided here and there with zigzags of rail fences. The Confederates occupied a low wooded ridge that rose about 60 feet above the valley of the Illinois River below—the center of what is today the modern battlefield park.

The battle began as Herron advanced from the Walnut Grove area west of Fayetteville, reaching the Illinois River below the ridge where Hindman had massed his soldiers. Now began a series of miscalculated Union charges and Confederate countercharges. The Confederates seem to have easily repulsed Herron's attacks, but the Confederate counterattacks were broken up with much loss by the superior fire of Union artillery batteries. Soon the slope of the hill and the area around the Borden house and orchard were covered with human wreckage. At one point in the fighting on the hill the Confederates had nearly destroyed Herron's army—the first part of Hindman's plan—but at this moment, when Confederate victory seemed near, Blunt's army (arriving after its march from Cane Hill through Rhea's Mill) linked with Herron's exhausted and broken regiments.

Women in the War

"When there were crops to be made, women made them; were fences to be built, women must build them. They raised houses, rolled logs, went to mill, not with two fat sleek horses for a team, but more likely the family cow and a big calf yoked together. It was women that killed hogs and beeves, and in the absence of these brutes, women shouldered guns and went hunting or fishing. In the absence of physicians. . .women practiced without leave or license. . .But more pathetic still, it sometimes fell to woman's part not only to offer the final prayer in behalf of the dying and close the sightless eyes, but with her own hands, aided by other women to dig the grave, make the rude pine coffin, and after reading the burial service to fill the grave, mark the place with a simple board, then leave his body to nature and his soul to God."

—from Confederate Women of Arkansas (1907)

One of the heroines of the war in Washington County was Mrs. N. J. Staples of Prairie Grove. According to the account in Confederate Women of Arkansas, Mrs. Staples lived on the dividing line of the bitter fight at Prairie of the Civil War in the borderland area of Washington County. Stand Watie's Confederate Indians were assigned the task of scouting the border area along the Arkansas-Indian border, occupying Hermannsburg and hoping to capture Union supply trains. Several Union Indian home guard regiments took part in the battle itself.

By the time the early December darkness covered the grim scenes on the battlefield, the total losses of the two sides amounted to about 2,500 killed, wounded, and missing, with the Union loss being slightly higher. Some of the wounded, trapped between the lines on the battlefield, crawled into haystacks for warmth, only to be burned alive when artillery shells ignited the hay.

After the Battle

According to an eyewitness account (Flashback May 1975), "The next day we went to the field and saw the burial detail putting the dead in trenches. The piles of dead where the battery was fought over, near the Hall House, were frightful. The ground was muddy with blood. . .Two or three crying women were moving among the throngs of men. . .Down on the slope, between the orchard and the spring. . .one could have walked a long distance on dead bodies. . ."

A Yankee cavalryman wrote, "Although the rebels had a party of 200 (sent in under flag of truce) at work all day interring their dead, yet but little effect was produced. They lay in heaps on top of the slope. . .Many had their hands full of dirt and leaves, grasped in their death agony. . .All our dead had been gathered up and ranged in rows. . .While some were digging graves, others were making rule and foot boards, cutting the name, Co., and Regt., with their knives. They were buried in long graves, all put in as close as they could lay with their clothes on and blankets wrapped about them. . .As I returned to my tent, I passed several piles of rebel dead that our men had built rail pens about to keep the hogs from them. . ."

From this ghastly scene, the Confederates under Hindman were in retreat toward Fort Smith on the morning of December 8. Poorly clothed and fed, and with little ammunition left, the Confederates had no chance now that they faced the combined Union force. Hindman masked his retreat so that it was hours before the Union commanders realized the Confederates had left the ridge. The Union forces were too cut-up and exhausted to follow.

The destruction associated with the battle was not confined to the actual scene of fighting. Rhea's Mill had furnished flour, pork, fence rails (used as fire wood), lumber, etc. to the Federal Army prior to the battle. A house was burned before the battle was fought, and sometime after the battle the mill itself was burned.

The German immigrants who had created the prosperous settlement called Hermannsburg suffered from the battle in a different way. Astride a major road traveled by forces of both sides—not to mention numerous bands of bushwhackers, etc.—the community with its mill, store, and homes was beset for weeks. They owned slaves, but they tried to keep to themselves the fact that they favored the Union side.

The journals kept by Lina and Nani Hermann show that as the Prairie Grove campaign began during November, their husbands (the Hermann brothers) had to go into hiding. On November 12 Nina wrote, "We live in constant fear and danger. It is said that all men must join the Southern army. . .Today starving secessionists were in our mill and acted as if it were their property." On November 16: "We dare not undress to sleep and even the children sleep with their clothes on." Food was taken by passing soldiers, the store broken into, and the community turned into a campground for passing military units. On November 15, Nani wrote, "The poor children cling to me, Eliese trembling the most," as Confederate troops passed through the community.

Grove. During the battle the women hid in the cellar of the house. "After the battle, about sundown the women. . .went out on the battlefield among the wounded and dead. They carried in the wounded of both sides until their two rooms and porch were filled with men torn by shot and shell. All night they worked to relieve the sufferings. . .They tore up sheets and pillow slips for bandages, made hot, nourishing drinks of herbs, and gave freely of their scanty store. . .The next morning those who were still living were taken to the old Presbyterian church and cared for until they were able to go away."

Much of the stealing and destruction mentioned in the journals was attributed to Southern soldiers, but on December 12 Nani wrote that men who called themselves Union soldiers (but who paid no attention to General Blunt's order protecting the Hermanns) robbed the families at gunpoint. On the following day they returned, this time with 30 men. And soon came five more, demanding whiskey. "We must flee," she concluded.

On December 19, 1862, 19 men, women, and children who had formed the core of Hermannsburg fled to General Herron's Federal lines at Prairie Grove. On December 24 they were in Fayetteville. Karl Hermann wrote, "The Christ-Child had lost its magic that day. Satan was ruling the land. Looking up at the star-studded sky, our memory saw again the lighted Christmas trees in our Fatherland." The families arrived in St. Louis in early 1863, but not until Nani, mother of five small children, had died along the road.

While the Hermanns were fleeing their Washington County homes, many of the victims of Prairie Grove were being cared for in "Uncle Buck" Buchanan's Cumberland Presbyterian Church in the village of Prairie Grove as well as in private homes. Many were being moved from the battlefield and were dying at Fayetteville and elsewhere in the county. According to the Reverend William Baxter, "The ambulances, with their mangled and bleeding freight, began to arrive" at Fayetteville, "and groans of agony extorted by every inequity of the road over which they passed were heard. . .erelong the town was one vast hospital." The fine buildings of Sophia Sawyer's now famous Female Seminary, which had survived the fires of spring, became a hospital whose "entire floor was thickly covered with mangled and bleeding men."

In the first days after the battle the wounded rested upon straw, the only available bedding until supplies began to arrive. Twenty other Fayetteville buildings, including churches, also served as hospitals treating the wounded of both sides from Prairie Grove. In the Christian Church where Baxter had formerly preached "the seats were removed, and the entire floor covered with bleeding and mangled men. . ." Many of the severely wounded soon died, and their bodies, taken outside, froze.

Many of the dead who had been collected on the battlefield were "unknowns." Their names were unknown perhaps because disfigurement from wounds was great in some cases; no family members were available to claim or to identify them; perhaps they were young conscripts without friends; or identifying papers might have been lost in the haste and waste of battle. The U. S. National Cemetery was established in 1867 and the Confederate Cemetery in 1872, both at Fayetteville. Remains in both cemeteries were reinterred in these locations from their original places of burial on the battlefields, primarily from Wilson's Creek, Pea Ridge, and Prairie Grove, or from hospitals. Other soldiers were buried in private family plots.

Union Occupation

Technically speaking, the battle at Prairie Grove was a stalemate, but for the Confederates it amounted to defeat. The desperate gamble of attacking in winter had failed. Hindman's army would fight elsewhere in the future, but no longer would a major Confederate Army operate in northwest Arkansas. Missouri remained in the Union grasp more firmly than ever. There was more fighting and dying in store for Washington County, but henceforth none of it would have strategic importance in terms of the outcome of the war.

After Prairie Grove, Washington County was periodically occupied by Federal forces. The home-grown troopers of the First Arkansas Cavalry were often engaged in bitter, but relatively small-scale, operations against legitimate Confederate guerrillas and the outlaws called bushwhackers. A recent history of the First Arkansas, Standing in the Furnace of Rebellion by Joe M. Fears, notes that while the regiment generally was well-behaved, it also included men who had enlisted merely to escape from the Confederate Army, as well as a criminal element or a kind of "lunatic fringe" which must have been responsible for depredations that were deeply resented by the people of Washington County.

Union strategy consisted of blocking Confederate movement through northwest Arkansas as well as holding the Indian country. It was this strategy which brought on the fight of April 18, 1863, known as the Battle of Fayetteville.

The Union Indian Brigade had been stationed in Benton County during the early part of 1863. (During this time the soldiers and Indian refugees with them suffered an outbreak of smallpox which continued all spring and summer.) Scouts rode out in all directions, keeping watch for Confederate movements. The brigade moved south in March, eventually camping on the Illinois River, scouting toward the Arkansas River and into the Cherokee Nation. Then the Indian brigade moved west into the Indian country.

At the same time, the First Arkansas Cavalry (Union) under Colonel M. LaRue Harrison had been occupying Fayetteville, "scouring the country to relieve it of the independent bushwhackers, who were the result of Hindman's Order No. 17," according to the Goodspeed history. Britton (p. 218) states that the First Arkansas was planning to leave Fayetteville and join the movement into the Indian country. This movement was halted when, at sunrise on April 18, 1863, the Federals heard "wild and deafening shouts" that announced a surprise attack by a force under General W. L. Cabell, the Confederate commander in northwest Arkansas. The Confederates had made a forced march over the mountains from Ozark.

The battle centered on the Tebbetts house, today home of the Washington County Historical Society, where bullet holes can still be seen in the doors. The Confederates were repulsed. Colonel Harrison stated that the Confederates left 20 dead and 50 wounded during the retreat; Union dead were four, with 26 wounded and 41 captured or missing. In 1963, the centennial of this fight was celebrated with considerable fanfare at the Tebbetts House (see Flashback, May 1963).

Old institutions which had given the county early fame continued to suffer from the war. On May 1, 1863, Sophia Sawyer's Fayetteville Female Seminary—which had survived the first years of the war to become a hospital after Prairie Grove—was partially burned. Miss Sawyer had died in 1854, but the school carried on under others until the coming of the war. In his history of Fayetteville, William Campbell states, "All the women and children of the neighborhood formed a bucket brigade and saved the original log part, and the assembly room. . ."

Shiloh Burned

On September 6, 1863, the budding community of Shiloh was burned, apparently as a result of the fighting that occurred in the northern part of the county in the area of Fitzgerald's Station (of Butterfield stage fame) and the home of the Reverend John and Dorothea Holcomb (Mill Street and Old Wire Road in Springdale). Holcomb's Shiloh Baptist church sat on the southeast corner of what is today Main and Huntsville. Springdale historian Bobbie Lynch has written that the church and other buildings were burned, "probably by the Confederate forces to keep them from falling into Union hands."

Fire also came to Boonsboro (Cane Hill). According to the history of Cane Hill College written by William C. Braly, "On the 12th and 13th days of November 1864, the college building with the entire village were burned by United States soldiers connected with the command of General Blunt. The Confederate general, Sterling Price, returning south from his 'Missouri raid,' rested with his command a few days at Cane Hill, and left there, in private houses, a number of sick and wounded Confederate soldiers. General Blunt's forces having followed him as far as the Arkansas River, returned by way of Cane Hill, and in passing destroyed, by burning, almost the entire Cane Hill country, including the village of Newton. . .sparing only those houses above referred to in use as Confederate hospitals. . ."

Guerrilla Warfare

Another "old institution" that suffered deeply was William McGarrah, a pioneer who'd been in the county since the first days. Though both were illiterate, McGarrah and his wife Sarah Elizabeth had sold 10 acres to Robert Graham where Graham built Arkansas College (corner of College and Dickson streets in Fayetteville). Marian Tebbetts (Banes) remembered seeing William in the days before the war. "At that time Mr. McGarrah, who kept a little store including whiskey among its commodities, was making his way home—a kind, harmless man. . .he wore a red blanket in lieu of an overcoat." And having consumed his own goods, he "staggered from tree to tree."

A McGarrah descendant, Ruth Morris of Lincoln, has written that during the Civil War, when William was in his 70s, bushwhackers raided his home, tortured him in order to make him tell where he hid his money, and then hung him from a tree in his yard. Sarah Elizabeth and some slaves revived him, but he was never "right" again and then died from smallpox on May 3, 1864.

An article published in the Arkansas Historical Quarterly (Autumn 1967) tells another disturbing story about the latter years of the war. In April 1864, a group of about 24 Confederate guerrillas in the Prairie Grove area dressed in Federal uniforms. They approached and then attacked a party of soldiers from the First Arkansas Cavalry, killing eight of the unsuspecting soldiers. The guerrillas also murdered a well-known Unionist, John Brown. The Federals mounted an immediate pursuit. Several of the guerrillas were killed, and four were captured. These four were taken to Fort Smith, tried by a military commission, and executed by firing squad on July 29, 1864, "for murder and violation of the civilized rules of warfare."

Lizzie Cooper Pollard was a moving force behind the creation of the Confederate Cemetery established at Fayetteville after the war.

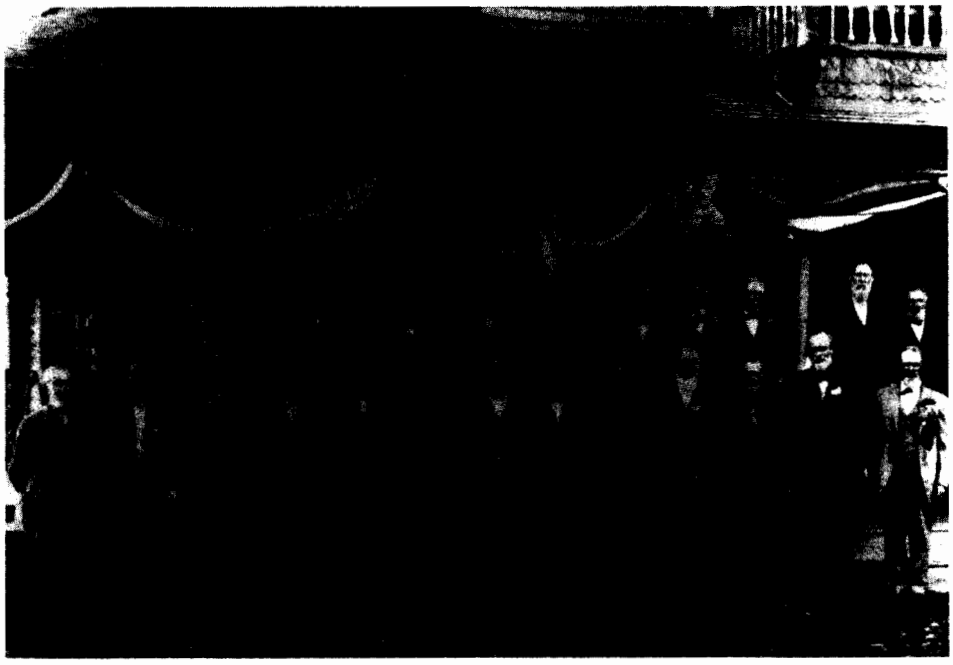
Women

In the second half of the war, and especially after Prairie Grove, Washington County men who had entered service to defend their homes were usually far away from them, and they keenly felt the pressure of hardship and defeat. Early in 1864, Confederate soldier John Buchanan of Farmington was stationed in south Arkansas. On January 15, 1864, he addressed a letter to his "Beloved Wife" who was at home in Federally-occupied Washington County. "I am sorry to hear that our country is treated as it is. I did not think that any white man could be so mean as some of the Feds are. I heard that the Feds killed your father and a great many others. . .I think of home and loved ones that I left behind that is near and dear to me, and to have to bear the troubles that the Feds put on you.

"I heard that the Feds had ordered all of the southern women out of that country and said that if they did not leave that they would burn you all up and make you leave and go one way or the other. I hope you will never go north. . ."

The Washington County of John Buchanan's dreams was truly in ruins—a far cry from the peaceful, prosperous land found by the enumerators of the 1860 U. S. Census. According to the Reverend William Baxter, "The fences had nearly all disappeared, shrubbery and fruit-trees were ruined, houses were deserted, nearly all the domestic animals killed, dead cavalry horses lay here and there; the farms, for miles around, were laid waste, the fences having been used to keep up the hundreds of campfires which were seldom permitted to go out by night and day; stables were pulled down, outbuildings burnt, and the very spirit of destruction seemed to rule the hour. . ."



The last Confederate reunion at Prairie Grove.

The guerrilla war was so bad in late 1863 and in 1864 that Unionists went north and many Southerners had gone south, some taking their slaves with them, following the fortunes of the Confederate Army. Some black people had taken freedom in their own hands, going north with the Union Army. Apparently a great many black people left the county, for in the 1860 census 1,540 black people had been counted; by 1870 only 674 remained.

Post Colonies

On December 23, 1864, Colonel Harrison, commanding the First Arkansas Cavalry at Fayetteville, wrote a letter describing a new Federal strategy in northwest Arkansas. "There are thousands of old men, women, and children left here yet," he wrote. Warfare, robbery, plunder, and the fact that so many men were in service meant that farms were not working, and people were hungry. The new policy involved creating "post colonies." The refugees that had flocked to towns like Fayetteville could be gathered up and provided with supplies and protection.

When 50 men capable of bearing arms made application, they and their families were allowed to settle on large tracts of abandoned land. A block house or small fort was constructed there. Everyone had to agree to "sign articles agreeing to be loyal to the United States authorities. . ." Post colonies were established at Rhea's Mill, Engle's Mill (Farmington), Bentonville, Pea Ridge, Elm Springs, and Huntsville. Organization had begun for others at Mudtown, Mt. Comfort, Oxford Bend, Richland, McGuire's, Middle Fork, West Fork, and Hog Eye.

"Six of the settlements have made such progress that each will raise large quantities of corn next season. . ."

The post colonies were controversial, to say the least. One Federal officer, quoted in Joe M. Fears' history of the First Arkansas Cavalry, complained that Colonel Harrison had created a virtual reign of terror, requiring men age 14 and over to join the post garrison troops. One of Harrison's subordinate officers reportedly had even stated publicly that all those who refused to join the post colonies would be shot! Writing in the Benton County Pioneer, Laura Woods tells about some people who totally refused to take part in the program. They packed up and left, arriving in Van Buren, Arkansas, just as the war ended, and then continued on to Paris, Texas, where they resettled.

Guerrilla fighting continued during 1865. In February, for example, Colonel Harrison reported that 53 bushwhackers had been killed in that month alone. The Goodspeed history of northwest Arkansas states that fighting of varying intensity continued until about July 1, when news of the surrender of Confederate forces in the west was received at Fayetteville.

Lincoln and Van Hoose

The following story must have been told many times in Washington County prior to its publication in the Washington County Review on March 7, 1895. (An original clipping is in the Van Hoose Scrapbook at the Fayetteville Public Library. This material, with interesting notes, can also be read in the story by Mildred M. Crawford that appeared in Flashback in October 1963.)

In late February 1865, James H. Van Hoose set out on a journey from Washington County to Washington, D. C., hoping to obtain from Federal authorities a pass that would allow him to visit his brother, the Confederate soldier George Van Hoose, who was in bad health and confined to a Federal prison on Johnson Island, Ohio. By luck and pluck he managed to gain an audience with none other than Abe Lincoln. Lincoln readily provided the necessary document, but before leaving the President, Van Hoose asked if he could take his brother food and warm clothing.

Lincoln said, "You want to set him up and make him comfortable. . .They have rebelled against the government; we have spent millions and millions of dollars and sacrificed tens of thousands of valuable lives trying to subdue them. . .Why should they now be comfortable? Why shouldn't they suffer?" Van Hoose told Lincoln that he and his brother and many others in northwest Arkansas had been Union men, but when Arkansas seceded they had felt their first duty was to their own state. They weren't rebels at heart, but rather humans torn cruelly by events, according to Van Hoose.

"Mr. President," Van Hoose continued, "suppose it was your own brother, with whom in innocent childhood you had played. . .that he had gone into the Confederate Army, been captured, and was sick in prison. . .Would you let him die without an effort, or would you regard him as your brother still and make an effort to save his life?"

The President threw up his left hand, exclaiming twice, "I grant it, I grant it. . .I hope you may find your brother alive and that he may live to be an honorable and useful citizen of this government."

Totally devastated by the Civil War, Fayetteville's town square was quickly rebuilt, mostly in brick, during a period called "the golden age of brick." A few buildings from that era still stand on the square today, more than a century later.

Chapter Five

Land of the Big Red Apple: Washington County, 1865-1900

"Verily, it was the travail of greatness at birth. It was heroism without glory or acclaim."

—William Campbell

The soldiers and families who had been away during the war returned to their ruined farms and villages in the spring and summer of 1865. Most of the livestock was dead or missing. Wooden rail fences had been burned for firewood. Neglected fields had been reclaimed by vines and bushes. Mills needed for grinding corn and wheat, for sawing boards, and for processing cotton and wool had been wrecked. The stores had few goods and the people had no money to buy what was available. There was no mail delivery and no regular stage coach transportation.

The county seat at Fayetteville was a ruin. Some homes had survived the fires, but gone totally were the pre-war colleges that once lent the town an air of culture and refinement. The public square, where once a brick courthouse stood, had by 1864 been turned into a fort, with the stones and bricks from burned stores serving as fortifications to protect Union soldiers from raiding Confederates.

Midst this ruin, the wheels of society slowly began to turn. "Stages will be running from Springfield here in about 4 weeks from now," wrote storekeeper J. H. Van Hoose on January 29, 1866. On March 6, 1866, he wrote, the mills will "get to sawing. . .in a few days. . ." He hoped that the big sawmill operated by Peter Van Winkle in Benton County would be open by mid-April, supplying the boards necessary for reconstruction. At

Confederate Cemetery

The Southern Memorial Association was organized at Fayetteville in 1872. At the first meeting of the group, Mrs. T. M. Gunter explained that the object was to raise funds for purchasing and ornamenting a "resting place for the friends who had fallen in our Lost Cause." Fayetteville's "ladies" were assisted by "ladies" from Springdale and Prairie Grove. The organization elected Mrs. Lizzie Pollard as its president.

The first fund-raiser was a benefit supper, attended by a "vast crowd." The organization soon purchased three acres of land at the top of Rock Street. The Confederate Cemetery was dedicated in 1873. To these grounds were moved the remains of 500 dead from Fayetteville, Pea Ridge, and Prairie Grove, most of them unknown. The grounds were enclosed by a white board fence that was replaced in 1885 by native stonework.

Next, the Southern Memorial Association campaigned for the erection of a suitable monument. It was unveiled in 1897 to a crowd estimated at 20,000. The shaft of the monument reads, "These were men whom power could not corrupt, whom death could not terrify, whom defeat the store, however, "Business is very dull—No[t] much money in the land. . ."

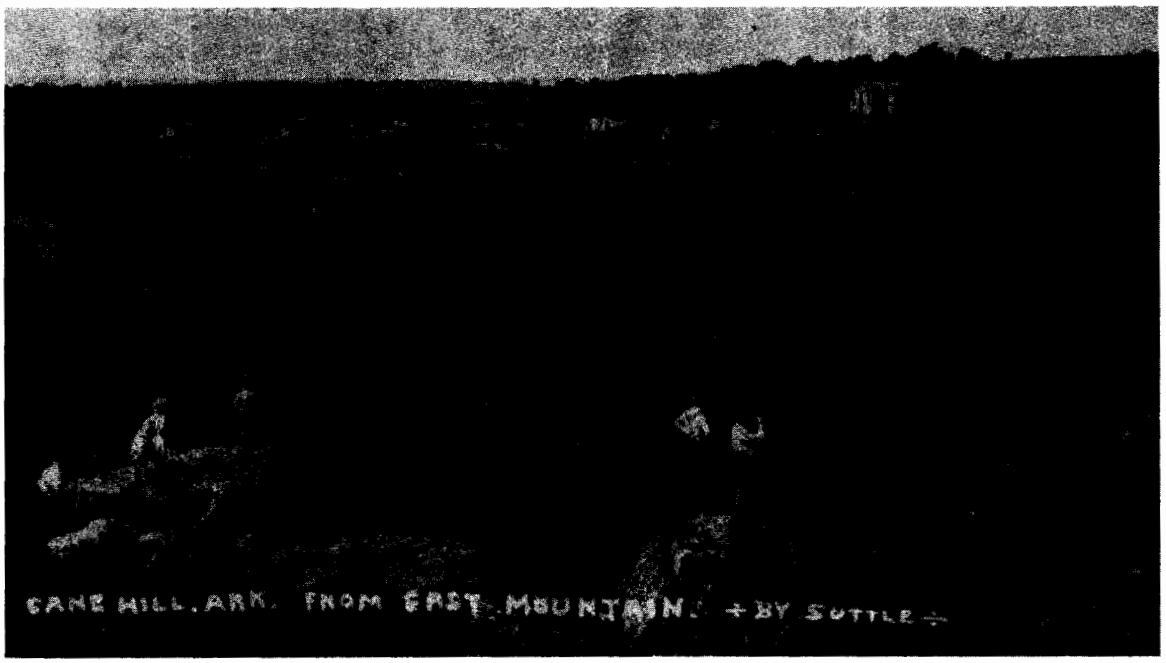
Re-building

On Clear Creek, in what is now the community of Johnson, two former Union soldiers—Jacob Q. Johnson and William Mayes—rebuilt the war-ruined mill, the one that was already said to be "old" when the county was organized in 1828. Johnson "erected a large sawmill, with grist-mill and flouring mill attached," according to Goodspeed's history of northwest Arkansas. The partnership between the Union vets lasted several years. Johnson completed a two-story brick residence nearby in 1879. It stands today near the mill that was restored as a tourist attraction in the 1980s.

The famous steam-powered mill at Rhea with its tall smokestack of native stones had been destroyed after the battle of Prairie Grove. It resumed operation after the war. At Boonsboro (Cane Hill) the Pyeatte-Moore mill north of the ruined village opened again in the spring of 1866. It later moved south of the village to Jordan Creek. The foundation and wheel of this mill can be seen today along Highway 45. The resumption of milling went hand-in-hand with renewed life on the farms. Details from the U. S. Census show that between 1860 and 1870 the county population rose from 14,673 to 17,266. The amount of improved farmland also rose, 59,379 acres to 73,145. There were increases in wheat production, Irish potatoes, and tobacco. But the effects of the war were evident elsewhere. Livestock totals were generally lower, as were the amounts raised of corn, oats, and wool. There were fewer businesses employing fewer people. But slowly, the economy was beginning to function. Social life, too, resumed.



Cane Hill as viewed from East Mountain overlooking the town. Distinctive Cane Hill College stands in the right background. (Martha Moore)

The first post-war service held in the Missionary Baptist Church at Spring Valley in the northeastern part of the county was January 6, 1866. (During 1860 the church had voted to receive into its membership "Brother Charles," a black slave owned by Daniel Vaughan.) The Church minutes (published in Flashback, April 1955) state, "The church met on Saturday, the 6 day of January, being few in number. . .Inasmuch as our last church meeting was in August 1861, the church agreed to make statement as to set forth the cause why the church had not met in conference. The cause was on account of a horrid and bloody war in our land and county so it was dangerous for a congregation to assemble."

Cane Hill College had also been closed during the war. Most of the buildings had burned in 1864. The college president, Fontaine R. Earle, served in the Confederate Army as did most of the students. Earle returned home in June 1865. During the fall and winter of 1865-1866, he taught school in the dormitory, the only unburned building. In March 1866, he, like most ex-Confederates, signed an oath of allegiance to the United States. He was elected to the Arkansas legislature, then became Arkansas' first state superintendent of public instruction. In 1868 he organized the rebuilding of the college on its old foundations. With only a few interruptions, he served as college president, minister, and teacher until 1892.

Black People After the War

Washington County's newly freed black citizens faced many choices during and immediately after the Civil War. Lincoln's Emancipation Proclamation of January 1, 1863, had legally banned slavery in the South. But even before January 1, 1863, some black citizens had voted for freedom with their feet, leaving when it was safe to do so.

could not dishonor." (More details are available in William Campbell's One Hundred Years of Fayetteville, p. 85, and in the Northwest Arkansas Times, July 16, 1978, p. 43, which quotes from articles in the Fayetteville Democrat in 1872.)

The first public school established in Washington County after the Civil War was the Mission School in Fayetteville. It was organized by the American Missionary Society to provide educational opportunities for the children of newly-freed slaves. The brick building on Olive Street still stands. (Robert G. Winn)

While the white people increased by over 3,000 in the decade 1860-1870, the county's black population declined from 1,538 to 674. Big losses occurred in the heavily agricultural areas where most slaves had lived: Illinois Township (modern Cincinnati) lost 409 blacks, Cane Hill Township 234, Richland Township (Elkins area) 79, Vineyard Township (Evansville area) 61, and Marrs Hill (Wedington area) 18. Only Prairie Township (Fayetteville) gained, from 278 before the war to 330 after.

Schools Established

In 1866 the concentration of freedmen in Fayetteville provided a suitable setting for a school established by the American Missionary Society. Former Union cavalry commander Lafayette Gregg and his wife gave land (now located at 350 Olive Street, Fayetteville) for a school. A brick building was erected and placed under the supervision of Ebenezer E. Henderson, an Ohio Yankee who had received an appointment as district superintendent of schools as a result of a school law passed in the Union-controlled Arkansas legislature. Henderson's daughter, Clara, taught in this school.

The Mission School, as it was called, was the first "public school" in the county, that is, the first school free to the students. The school was not popular among some of the town's white residents. Clara and other white female teachers were the hated "Yankee school marms" who had come South after the war to teach the freed slaves. The Henderson family was intimidated. "Chains were dragged over the roof of their house and one citizen held a revolver on Supt. Henderson and threatened to kill him. . ." (Flashback, May 1954). In time, both the school and the Hendersons were accepted. After 1871 the American Missionary Society could no longer afford to be the school's sole support. For a number of years it was run jointly with the new Fayetteville School Board. The school was renamed in honor of the Hendersons.

The original brick building, which is still standing, was incorporated into a private dwelling which also includes logs from a hotel, no longer standing, that was built by Coin Harvey at Monte Ne in Benton County.

The Mission School was but the first of the post-Civil War schools for black citizens in the county. According to writers Izola Preston and Gordon D. Morgan, one room schools met elsewhere in the county and were taught by black teachers. These schools were often held in a church rather than a special school house. Schools were kept in this way at Cane Hill, Cincinnati, Summers, Hog Eye, Harris, and probably in a few other communities. In the decade of 1891-1901 there were as many as nine black teachers in the county with enrollments varying from 268 (1891) to 179 (1900).

Among the black people who remained here after the war, many chose residence in Fayetteville, presumably because of employment opportunities, relative safety from vigilantes, and importantly, for social contact with other black people. In addition to the migration toward Fayetteville from other places in the county, some new blacks came here from elsewhere.

The July 17, 1885, West Fork Republican reported that "Washington Buchanon [sic], two miles west of town, on Cane Hill road, is a noted blacksmith, horse shoeing a specialty." This man is almost certainly from the Buchanan family that emigrated from Texas in 1870 and homesteaded land in the Hog Eye area. "Civil authority in Texas had broken down, as it did in many areas after the war," wrote Pat Donat in Flashback (November 1971), "and the family was 'running from the rebs' when they left Texas. As soon as they crossed the line into Arkansas they felt they were 'free'." The trip took three months and was made in covered wagons. "The family brought along cows to provide milk for the young children. . .a baby was born and died on the trip and was buried in a fencerow along the trail." Mrs. Annie Peele of Fayetteville was a great-granddaughter of Margaret Buchanan, the matriarch of the family in the long trek from Texas.

Arkansas Industrial University

The war that swept away Sophia Sawyer's school, Arkansas College, and other pioneer institutions ruined Washington County's most promising non-farm industry, education. The war had not, however, daunted the college-thirst of county leaders. During the war the U. S. Congress had approved the Morrill Act, providing each state certain lands to be utilized in support of agricultural and mechanical colleges. After re-entering the Union, Arkansas eventually qualified for 150,000 acres as an endowment for its A & M college. The county's civic leaders saw in the Morrill Act a chance to restore some of what had been lost in the war.

On July 23, 1868, the Arkansas Legislature passed "An Act for the Location, Organization, and Maintenance of the Arkansas Industrial University [becoming "University of Arkansas" in 1899], with a Normal Department Therein." The Normal Department was for advanced pre-college students and those planning to become teachers. Subsequently, counties, cities, and towns were encouraged to bid "money, bonds, or real or personal property," with the best offer winning the prize.

College elections were held in towns and counties in the state in 1871. The central location of Little Rock and Pulaski County made it a strong contender, but the voters decisively rejected bond issues there, apparently because ex-Confederates distrusted the Unionist-controlled state legislature as well as legitimately fearing indebtedness. In Independence County, too, the voters defeated a college bond proposal, but the election in the town of Batesville passed handily. Batesville, therefore, offered a bid for the school.

In his history of the University, The First Hundred Years, Robert Leflar wrote that in Washington County, "Three separate proposals, one for a $100,000 bond issue by the county, and the others alternative companions to the county proposal, were made. The alternatives were a $30,000 offer which included some individual land donations, from the city of Fayetteville, and a $23,265 offer from the Prairie Grove and Viney Grove area. . ." An understandable opposition to the bond issues developed in the Cane Hill area where it was feared a new school would harm Cane Hill College. Other citizens opposed a pig in a poke—that is, incurring debt that in hard times might be impossible to pay off.

Unlike the situation in Pulaski County, the schism opened by the war did not become an issue in Washington County. Here the cause of the University was championed by leaders on both sides in the war: wealthy former slave-owner and president of the 1861 Arkansas secession convention, David Walker, and Colonel Lafayette Gregg, commander of a Union regiment. Both had lived in Washington County since the early days and both were Arkansas Supreme Court judges. To sweeten the county's offer, Walker donated 280 acres of land to the University, Gregg 120 acres, and William. A. Britton, 20 acres. The town of Prairie Grove offered 866 acres and $7,350 in notes.

Gregg, Walker, "and several others met speaking engagements in every

Miss Naomi, A Pioneer Educator

Naomi Josephine Williams was a lifelong teacher in the era when public schools were just emerging in Arkansas. She was an instructor at the Arkansas Industrial University (later, University of Arkansas) from 1888 to 1910.

Her family arrived in Fayetteville by covered wagon in 1872. Naomi took her undergraduate work during the presidency of General D. H. Hill and graduated in 1880. After graduation she taught a private school at home. Among her students were many children of Fayetteville's early families. After five years she taught in public schools at Fayetteville and Fort Smith. She also obtained her M. A. degree and started work on a Ph. D.

In 1888 Miss Naomi was hired to teach in the University's Preparatory Department, which served as a high school preparing college-bound students. She taught Latin and history. When in 1910 the University discontinued the Preparatory Department, she went on to teach in other schools, continuing her career until about 1933, when at age 72 she suffered a slight cerebral hemorrhage. She died in 1943.

The Arkansas Legislature passed an act in 1868 to establish a state university. Through the efforts of civic leaders, the Arkansas Industrial University opened its doors in Fayetteville in 1872. The first graduating class (pictured here) had studied ancient languages, literature, and mathematics. (Special Collections, University of Arkansas Libraries, Fayetteville)

University Commencement in 1886

The Fayetteville Republican dated June 10, 1887 (and reprinted in Flashback, June-July 1951), includes a detailed account of that year's Arkansas Industrial University commencement.

Commencement then lasted an entire week. Baccalaureate exercises were held on Sunday morning in the chapel of University Hall (now Old Main). One thousand people heard the sermon. On Monday there was an athletic tournament that included the 100 yard dash, high jump, long jump, throwing hammer, hurdles, throwing baseball, three-legged race, etc. A Grand Ball was held Monday night in the armory in the basement of University Hall. The Republican termed it "the grandest ball ever given in Fayetteville for some time. . .The famous Italian Orchestra occupied a stand nearly in the center. . .The dancing commenced about ten o'clock and closed about four. . ."

part of the county, published letters in the Fayetteville Democrat, and did all they could to secure a favorable vote," wrote Leflar. By 400 to 320 the county voters approved the bond issue. In Fayetteville the proposal was opposed by only two votes, and voters in Prairie Grove also strongly favored it. Therefore, led by Fayetteville and Prairie Grove, the county had a strong offer that was accepted over Batesville's.

Washington County took the prize, but which community in the county would most directly reap the benefits? The issue was undecided when on October 28, 1871, the Fayetteville Democrat prompted its readers to get busy:

"The exact location has not as yet been selected. There are only two places contending for the rich prize—Fayetteville and the village of Viney Grove. The town of Fayetteville has offered thirty thousand dollars in money, besides several hundred acres of land donated by our citizens. The citizens of Viney Grove have made liberal offers in both money and land; so, 'when Greek meets Greek then comes the tug of war.' It behooves our citizens to be up and doing. We should not feel too sanguine of success, for in the enterprising citizens of Prairie Grove Valley we have a strong competitor. . .

"Will our citizens, after having done so much, let this prize slip from our grasp? Let the business men of our town, men of capital, those who will reap the greatest benefit, take the lead. . ."

Fayetteville Chosen as Site

Fayetteville was notified of its success on November 15, 1871. The campus was to be located on a 160 acre farm a mile north and west of the town. Much of this farm had been owned by the Freyschlag family who left Fayetteville for the gold fields of California. In 1871 the farm was owned by storekeeper and money lender William McIlroy who sold the land to the state for $11,000 (Flashback, January 1954). The McIlroy farm house was also purchased for use by the new school. According to Leflar, "More fertile land for farming might have been found, but no more beautiful location for the fledgling little campus could have been imagined."

The setting chosen for the new campus calls to mind Sophia Sawyer's similar preference for inspiring landscapes. When in the 1840s she built her Fayetteville Female Seminary on the south edge of a hill near the public square, she described the site as "overlooking a beautiful valley, mountains and woodland in the distance."

Under provisions of the Morrill Act, the college had to be open by February 12, 1872. This wasn't nearly enough time to erect formal buildings. According to William Campbell, "It was decided to roll the McIlroy home further back into the grove, remodel and add to it. This was done at a cost of $2,219. . .This hurried piece of architecture stood through a generation. . ." The pre-opening work also included the erection of another two-story frame building.

Arkansas Industrial University formally opened 20 days ahead of schedule, on January 22, 1872. There were eight students, a dozen books, acting president Noah P. Gates, and one teacher, Charles H. Leverett. Soon Miss Mary R. Gorton and Miss L. S. Standard were hired as Tuesday featured Junior Night, with a program of essays, orations, and a debate: "Resolved, that the jury system is the best method of deciding legal questions." On Wednesday afternoon the military cadets drilled for the Gold Medal, and on Wednesday night there was a grand concert in the University chapel, which was "filled to o'erflowing." Thursday morning featured an address by G. W. Caruth of Little Rock, who espoused a tax on all income over $2,000. Arkansas's Governor Hughes was introduced after the address, and he presented diplomas to several graduates. Commencement closed with the Junior Concert on Friday evening.

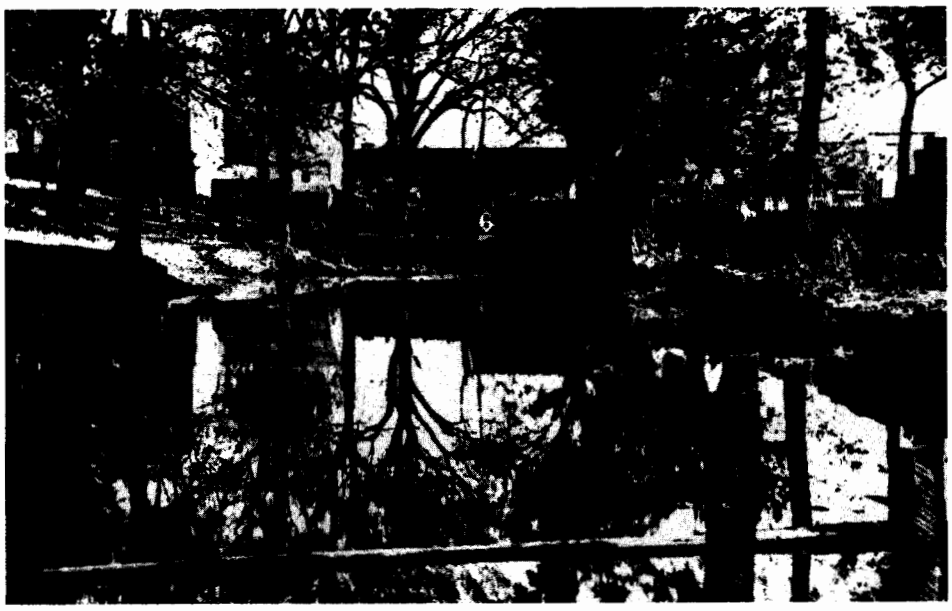
The Board of Trustees had been in session all week. From these meetings emerged a decision to start fall term on September 15 and close December 15, thus giving a three month winter vacation. A. I. U. was, after all, an agricultural and mechanical school. "The crops will need all the cultivation they can get in the summer months. There will be no more summer vacations."



Shiloh Lake in Springdale once covered the area which is now Mill Street below the Legion Hut at the intersection of Johnson and Spring. teachers. Gates was a Yankee who'd come to Arkansas in 1869. Leverett, who taught ancient languages and literature, was a Confederate veteran and former principal of the Ozark Institute at Mt. Comfort. Miss Gorton taught mathematics and literature in the Normal Department. According to Campbell, Miss Standard was an "instructor in model school."

The first eight students were all from Fayetteville, but by the end of the first year enrollment had reached 101, and students were coming from afar. Robert Leflar stated that "none were taking college for the term. Most were 'preparing' for college, and in September, 1872, sixteen of them were deemed ready to enroll as college freshmen."

The sprawling business of today's modern University started with a hope for rebuilding a land and people who had been ruined in the firepit of a civil war. Classes sat in a farmhouse remodeled and rolled into a grove of trees that doubtless had been there since the time of the Indians. "Verily, it was the travail of greatness at birth," observed William Campbell. "It was heroism without glory or acclaim."

Shiloh

The oldtimers called the community Holcomb's Spring—after the pioneer family headed by the Reverend John Holcomb and his wife Dorothea—and Shiloh Meeting-house, for the church built there in 1840. The name Shiloh stuck, and it was Shiloh that was burned, church and all, during the Civil War. The community was not long in recovering, however.

According to historian Bobbie Lynch, in the years immediately prior to the war the Shiloh congregation had considered building a new church house, but these plans were suspended during the war. There were no

The third Shiloh Church, built in 1871 at Main and Huntsville Streets in Springdale, was used by the Regular Primitive Baptists, the Methodists, the Missionary Baptists, and the Masons. When the Regular Baptists disbanded in 1936, the building was acquired by the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, Lodge No. 36. services from January 1862 until April 1866. In August 1866 the church minutes recorded plans for a new building for a church and school. This building may have been completed by 1868. It was then sold to the school district—an indication that a public school existed at Shiloh as early as 1871. In 1871 several congregations, including the Regular Baptists and the local Masonic lodge, entered into an agreement to construct a two-story frame building to be used by both the churches and the Masons. Today this building stands near the corner of Huntsville and Main Streets in Springdale's Shiloh Historic District.

A brick, two-story building for Shiloh Baptist College was financed by the Bentonville Baptist Association. Constructed in 1871, it stood near the corner of modern Johnson Street and Highway 71-B. The school opened in December 1871 with 40 students in grades 1-9. Later, the Salem Lutheran Church bought the school, offering instruction in grades 1-6. Then it became the property of Springdale School District 50 and was known variously as Springdale College Company, Shinn's Academy, and Springdale High School. This building is no longer standing.

In 1872 there were 28 families with five businesses in Shiloh, including two schools with 60 students. The citizens wanted to re-establish the post office which had been closed since the outbreak of the war. Since there was already a Shiloh, Arkansas, they chose the name Springdale. According to historian Bobbie Lynch, the "first spring around which the town was built was slightly south of Price Street and by the clear waters of Spring Creek. During the Civil War this spring dried up, but Holcomb Spring burst forth in its place. It was on the bank due south of the present American Legion Building. . .Shiloh Lake was fed by the Holcomb Spring and was the water supply for the small city for years after the Civil War."

Foot Washing Day

Foot Washing Day used to be a big event at the old Primitive Baptist Church at Springdale. For many years members gathered on the second Sunday in May to go through the ceremony of foot-washing.

"It always came on a Sunday," stated a writer for the Springdale News, May 25, 1923, "and it was an event to which all the young folks looked forward with great interest. They were not interested in the observance of the rites of the church, which was always packed to the limit anyway by their elders, but it was recognized as sort of a mating season among the young men and women. The girls came radiant in new spring attire, and unhappy was the maiden who did not have a new dress and a sweetheart, although the majority of them managed to remedy that latter defect before the day was over.

"It was an all-day gathering and picnic dinners on the ground were the rule, although many of the older visitors from the country scattered to the homes of friends in town. The church stood on the bluffs just south of the mill, and the trees and rocks afforded a loafing place in the shade. . .They no longer gather at the old church for 'Foot Washing Day'. . ."

(This story and other materials on the early day Primitive Baptists were reprinted in the Golden Anniversary Edition of the Springdale News, April 29, 1937.)

Early Springdale

The Shiloh Baptist College was built in 1871 at what is now the corner of Johnson and Thompson Streets in Springdale. At various times it was known as Springdale College, Shinn's Academy, and the Springdale High School. The building was demolished in 1910 and replaced by another high school on the same site. (Bobbie Byars Lynch)

The Shiloh Cemetery located at Main and Huntsville Streets in Springdale was moved in 1894 by order of the city council to the present site of Bluff Cemetery. This 1913 photo looking north on Shiloh Street shows Bluff Cemetery. (Lockwood and Annabel Searcy)

The brick building on the right is the Light Plant. The Cooperage Shop, built in 1908, can be seen in the background. (Bobbie Byars Lynch)

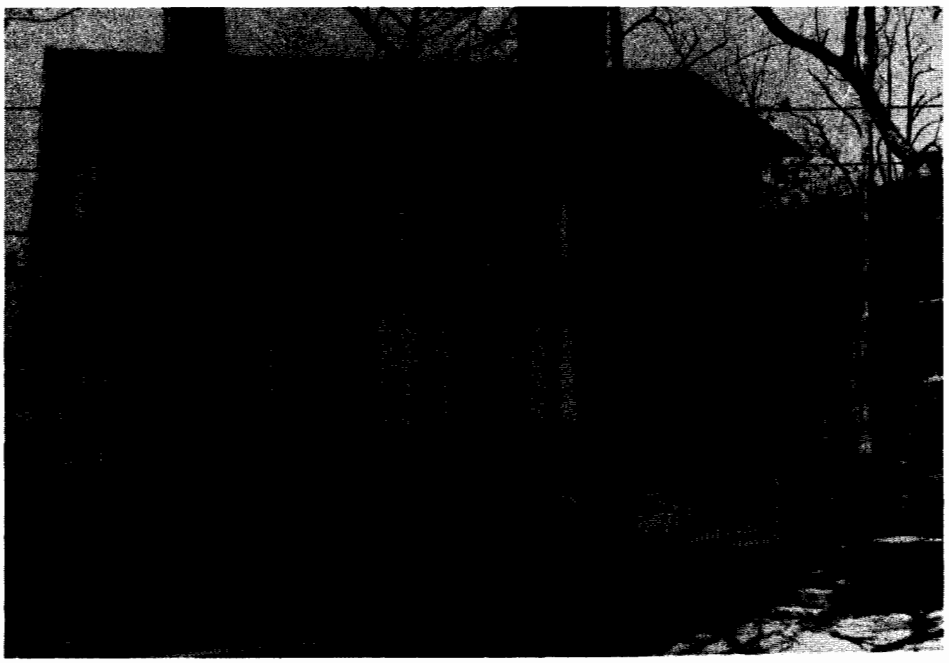
The Smith-Searcy House in Springdale was built in 1871 by Archibald Smith, who was a pastor of the Shiloh Primitive Baptist Church. It was purchased in 1884 by Wesley H. Searcy, whose family lived there until the death of Annabel Applegate Searcy in 1980. Mrs. Searcy bequeathed her house to the Shiloh Museum. (Lockwood and Annabel Searcy)

This classic, 2-story brick home built in Fayetteville for Lafayette Gregg remains today one of the finest examples from the "golden age of brick.



Today, the Shiloh Historic District includes a number of homes, businesses, and sites associated with the early days. Spring Creek, itself a part of the district, was once the motive power for mill wheels and the water supply for tanneries. Historic roads forded the creek within the confines of the Historic District. The Shiloh Museum grounds occupy the original town square. The town moved a few blocks southeast during the early 1880s in order to allow easier access to the railroad. The Smith-Searcy House next door to the museum was erected in 1871. It preserves a simple and highly functional architecture characteristic of the era. The Steele Store, which was moved to the museum grounds, is probably the oldest commercial structure standing in the area.

The Berry-Braun House, built in 1885, was once the home of Millard F. Berry, Washington County Judge and businessman who was involved in the early canning industry. In 1890 Berry strung an acoustic telephone between his home and abstract office. From this line evolved the Northwest Telephone Company (later purchased by Bell). He served as Washington County Judge, 1900-1904.

A Golden Age of Brick

"Elegant brick structures have been erected and others are in the process of erection. The Courthouse of Washington County, costing some $25,000, is rapidly going up. . ."—newspaper clipping attached to the 1868 report of the Arkansas Commissioner of State Lands.

Bricks made of Washington County clays had been manufactured here since the 1830s. The brick Methodist manse at Cane Hill, which still stands on the main road through town, was built in the early 1830s. The county courthouse erected in 1829 utilized logs, but in 1837 a brick courthouse replaced it. By the late 1840s Judge David Walker was able to afford a two-story brick house that still stands on Center Street, one block west of the Fayetteville square. But these buildings were not very typical of the pre-Civil War period.

Wooden buildings in Washington County had literally "gone up in flames" during the Civil War. Among the many people who suffered from fire there must have developed strong feelings for rebuilding in brick or stone. "The Civil War reconstruction period was the golden age of brick architecture in Washington County," wrote Bob Besom in the August 1981 issue of Flashback. "The structures built between 1867 and 1880 are dazzling. The list includes some of the great architectural gems of the Arkansas Ozarks. . ."

Judge Lafayette Gregg.

Exemplary structures from this golden age were built for David Walker and Lafayette Gregg, two wealthy citizens who had important careers in both the pre-war and post-war society of Washington County. Walker's pre-war role as pioneer lawyer and judge are well known. Gregg, a native of Alabama, came to the county in 1837, was educated in pioneer schools like Ozark Institute and had a distinguished career in both law and politics. In 1867 he entered into a contract with architect Alexander Hendry for the construction of a two-story brick house that stands today at the corner of Lafayette and Gregg streets in Fayetteville. In 1872 Judge Walker had a two-story brick house built for his daughter and son-in-law on the south end of what is now Mt. Sequoyah. The builder of both these houses was W. Z. Mayes. Each of these houses used bricks manufactured locally by John L. Kelton.

Terpening Brick and Tile Company located between Prairie Grove and Farmington, opened about 1890. It provided many bricks for local construction until about World War I.

Alexander Hendry

Alexander Hendry is a figure often mentioned in accounts of building during the golden age. He was a carpenter, builder, and architect, who was born in Scotland in 1820. He came to Fayetteville in 1866. Goodspeed's history of northwest Arkansas credited him with work on "Judge Gregg's residence, the Washington County court-house and mills, the university, the public school buildings, the opera house and many others." By 1889 he was in the foundry and machine-shop business.

A former landmark in the modern White River-Tuttle area was the three-story brick building erected by Hosea Maguire in 1867. Maguire was a strong Southern supporter in the war. His wealth in slaves and livestock was lost in the defeat of the Confederacy. Maguire seems to have recovered rapidly, trading in groceries and household goods in return for "chickens, eggs, hams, hogs, cattle, mules, or horses," according to Tom Feathers. "The business reached such proportions that at one time Mr. Maguire had a feeding shed about a hundred yards long. . ." A community called Maguiretown developed near the intersection of modern Highways 16 and 74. The death of Hosea Maguire in 1888 and the construction of a railroad south of the community caused a shift toward Elkins, on the railroad. Only a vine-covered ruin now remains of the huge brick store building.

Fear of fire probably played a role in the post-war boom in brick construction. Another possible reason for this burst of brick use may have been the relatively cheap price of bricks by the 1870s. Bob Besom pointed out, "By the 1870s brick making machines were widely available. . J. H. Renick of New York City advertised the 'Franklin Brick Machine' in the Fayetteville Weekly Democrat of April 10, 1869. He offered to test on any purchaser's brickyard his claim that with eight men and two horses, the machine would produce 2,500 to 3,500 'elegant' bricks per hour. . .A year later, H. G. Boyd, who presumably purchased some such machine, was prepared to sell bricks from his yard one mile east of Fayetteville at a reasonable $6.00 per 1,000."

The census of 1860 listed three brick masons in the county; 14 were listed in 1870. Most of these lived in Fayetteville, where much of the work of the golden age was done, but in 1870 there were also masons at Boonsboro (Cane Hill) and at Rhea's Mill. Several of these masons, including Edwin T. Caudle of Springdale and John H. Kelton of Fayetteville, opened their own brickyards.

Old Main

The single most visible achievement of the golden age was University Hall, known today as Old Main. It was the most stupendous construction project undertaken in the county up to that time. Construction of the building, which began in 1873, eventually consumed native bricks made at several locations in the Fayetteville area, including at least two brickyards in the bottomlands of what is today south Fayetteville. Peter Van Winkle's sawmill in Benton County furnished the wood, which was hauled to the construction site on ox-drawn wagons. According to William Campbell (Fayetteville Daily Democrat, June 11, 1936, p. 6D), the 72 cast iron pillars that went into the building and the limestone for the front entrance were shipped via railroad to Pierce City, Missouri, and from there were hauled by ox-wagons to Fayetteville. The sandstone used in the foundation was quarried on the campus.

the first phase of construction. The party went well into the night, with illumination provided by lanterns and fireworks, and shadows doubtlessly dancing up the 134 foot height of the tallest tower. The Civil War had been over 10 years, and nothing so much as this great building symbolized that the past was being put to rest.

"It was not until Old Main was completed. . .that people really began to recognize that the 'university' existed—for there it was for all to see, a massive red-brick edifice, trimmed in glistening cut limestone, topped by a mansard roof and two dissimilar square towers which loomed above old William McIlroy's recent hilltop farmstead like a giant castle on a European mountaintop. . .No matter which way you approached the town, there was Old Main rearing up on the horizon. . .," wrote Thomas Rothrock in his history of Old Main.

Oldest Bank in Arkansas

Modern people who are used to relatively stable currency and a wide variety of reliable and easily obtainable banking services may not fully appreciate what it meant after the Civil War to try to buy and sell goods and property at a time when no banks existed here.

Pioneer day banks had been a dismal failure, largely because every bank had issued its own paper money, often without much security. This worthless currency came to be called shinplasters—it was good for nothing else. The Arkansas State Bank was bankrupt by 1843, and banking was made illegal in the state in 1846. The only secure mediums of exchange were precious metals, bartering, and script issued and redeemed by merchants themselves. In 1868 banks were again legal in Arkansas, and soon a bank opened in Fayetteville.

The new banker was Denton D. Stark, a native of Pennsylvania who came to Washington County as a Union soldier in the First Arkansas Cavalry. After the war, he returned home long enough to collect an inheritance, then returned to "set up business as a war claims agent, dealer in gold and exchange and Land Grant broker," according to Peter Harkins, historian of McIlroy Bank. The Stark Bank, which opened in 1871, moved into a fine new building in November 1872 on the north side of the public square at Fayetteville.

The Stark Bank building was constructed by W. Z. Mayes, the same man who had been involved in many of the fine brick building projects of the post-war period, including University Hall. Mayes was to have been paid $124,000 for the University Hall job, but the state could not cover the full amount immediately and instead gave him several notes. Mayes was under pressure from his material suppliers for payment, so he sold the state notes at a discount to Denton Stark. The banker used $13,000 of depositor funds to pay Mayes.

When the state was able to pay off these notes, Stark could expect a good profit, but few people trusted the state government in the post-war period. When word got out about Stark's speculation in the state notes, a run started on the bank. Some depositors had Stark hauled into local court. Soon Stark was headed out of town—and the bank fell into the hands of William McIlroy.

A native of North Carolina, McIlroy settled in Madison County in 1838. He farmed, kept a store, owned slaves, and made personal loans. He had almost $2,000 out at loan in 1849, for example. In 1850 he obtained possession of the Freyschlag farm on the heights north and west of the public square in Fayetteville. In the fall of 1855 he bought the old James Sutton store in Fayetteville for $7,500 and entered business with his son-in-law, J. H. Van Hoose. By the time of the Civil War, McIlroy's personal estate was valued at $20,000, including six slaves.

In January 1871 McIlroy invested almost $8,000 in the Stark Bank, but was a silent partner in its operation. That fall, McIlroy made a tidy profit on the Freyschlag place and several other parcels of land that were sold for $11,000 to the state for the campus of the Arkansas Industrial University.

Denton Stark's purchase of W. Z. Mayes' University Hall notes had delivered the bank into McIlroy's hands, but at the time it may have seemed a potentially sour windfall. According to Peter Harkins, when Stark's speculation in the Mayes notes became public, the run that started on the bank didn't end until wealthy merchant Stephen K. Stone publicly backed the bank, and the Fayetteville Democrat editorialized that "everyone knows that McIlroy has been here since the woods was burnt and everyone knows he was always the solid man of the firm." Aided by an appropriation in 1877, the state began to pay off the Mayes notes against University Hall.

McIlroy made it official on January 2, 1876. He took down the old bank sign and hung a new one: William McIlroy Bank. "At age 63, William McIlroy, father of three school age kids and another on the way, was in hock up to his ears to pay back those depositors. . .At a time when most men are retiring, William was virtually starting all over again. . .," Harkins wrote.

(The surviving records of the McIlroy Bank have been donated by Hayden McIlroy, great-grandson of William McIlroy, to the Special Collections Department of the University of Arkansas Libraries).

On The Farm

Washington County's recovery from the Civil War depended on farms. The battle for recovery had to be waged with the plow, knowledge of livestock, and a willingness to try new things. Judging from the U. S. Census totals for 1870 and thereafter, the county's farmers fought as hard at home as they had on both sides in the war.

Between 1870 and 1900 the county population increased steadily as did production on the farms. The population of 17,266 in 1870 increased to 23,844 within 10 years and to over 34,000 by 1900. There was a tremendous increase in the amount of improved farmland: 73,145 acres in 1870 to 130,974 in 1880 and almost 238,000 by 1900. There were more horses, cows, sheep, and swine in this period as well:

horses	4,667	6,462	8,910	8,927
cattle	9,323	13,359	22,775	19,712
sheep	7,597	15,091	7,544	7,103
swine	33,431	47,869	56,212	42,966

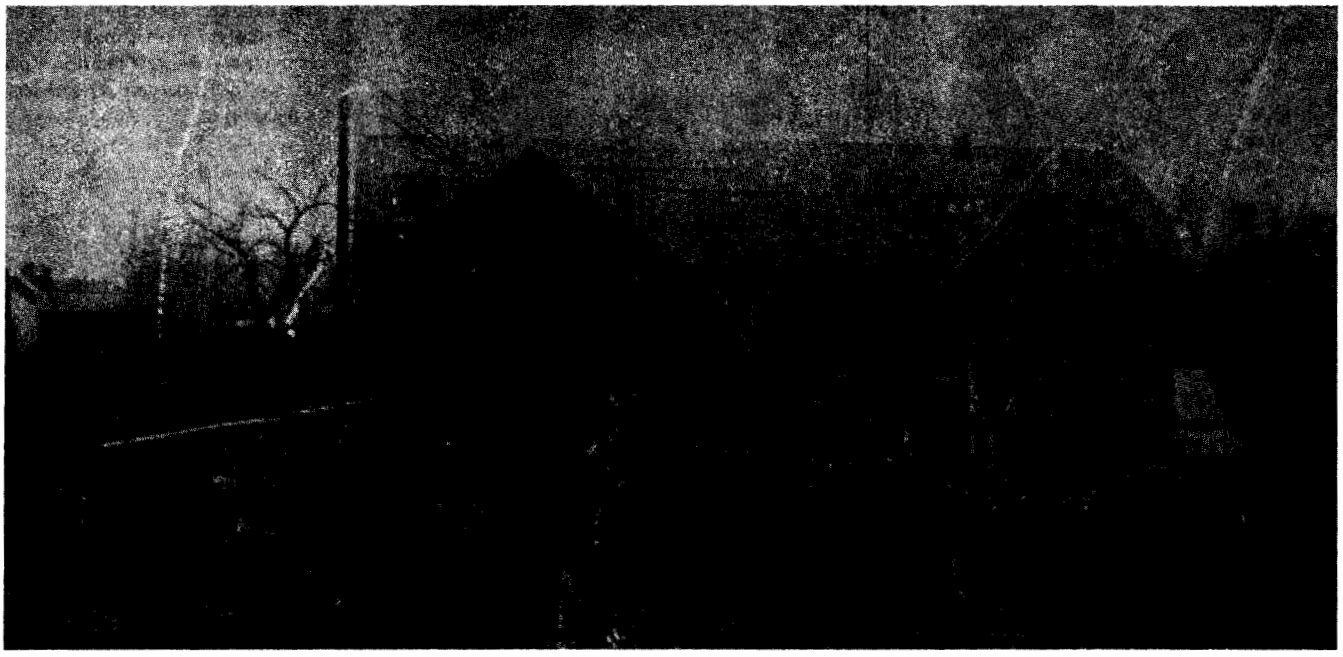
The increase in the numbers of sheep also led to an increase in the amount of wool harvested, and it stimulated the construction of a woolen mill. According to the Goodspeed history, W. B. Haxton was a native of Indiana, who entered the woolen business when he was 15 years old. In 1871 at about age 47, he moved to Arkansas and in 1877 began work on a large mill at Springdale. "He furnished all the woolen fabrics for the public institutions of the Cherokee Nation and did a large wholesale business besides." An article published in the Springdale News (November 30, 1962) noted that people came from as far away as 75 miles to have their freshly-sheared wool worked up into thread, fabrics, and blankets.

An Old Hermit in the 1880s

W. A. Burgess, whose father was a boss on the construction crews working on the Frisco, met an oldtimey hillsman near West Fork during the early 1880s. His story (and more) was published in Flashback, July 1952.

"An old man, who had come down from the hills near West Fork one day festooned with several strings of squirrels, had gradually disposed of most of his burden at the boarding houses. . .I persuaded him to permit me to accompany him back to his cabin. . .

"A tiny patch of tobacco, a few beans and other vegetables, and a larger space for corn was all the land cleared. The primeval forest hedged in this ridiculously small space of cultivated ground. [There were also] a horse, cow and a few chickens, the latter existing only by their ability to scuttle under some friendly bush at the rooster's sharp warning that a hawk was dropping like a shot from the sky above. . .The old man complained of how the squirrels were so numerous in early summer that only his constant vigilance at roasting-ear time saved enough to furnish his basis of supply of cornmeal. . ."



The Haxton woolen mill in Springdale supplied woolen fabric for Washington County, the surrounding area, and even the Cherokee Nation in Oklahoma. The mill employed some 14 persons. This photo was made about 1878. (Lockwood and Annabel Searcy)

The main products of the mill were yarns, fabrics for trousers and suits called jeans, flannels, and blankets. At one time the mill furnished employment for as many as 14 people—quite a few jobs for a small community.

As is obvious in the census information, sheep production declined sharply during the 1880s. The mill was torn down by its owner in 1908, two years after it ceased to operate.

There were considerable increases in some crops grown in the county:

wheat (bushels)	156,621	224,669	236,659	417,100
corn (bushels)	580,687	1,225,557	1,832,189	1,899,550
oats (bushels)	71,938	220,617	403,678	221,800
potatoes (bu.)	40,229	24,651	106,269	56,661

The county's prairies and rich bottomlands were given over to corn, wheat, and oats. And though not listed here, an enormous amount of hay was also being grown then, just as it is today. The annual production of cereal crops required an increase in milling capacity. During the period after 1870, the number of mills and the number of people employed in milling surpassed pre-war levels. Mills operated in communities large and small.

Springdale Woolen Mills

This is an excerpt from Goodspeed's 1889 history of the county: "Among the prominent industries that have materially benefited Washington County, Ark., and are worthy of mention, are the woolen mills owned by W. B. Haxton. He was born in the 'Buckeye State' in 1824, and is a son of James and Catherine (Cary) Haxton, who were born in Rhode Island and Pennsylvania, in 1799 and 1806, respectively. The father was a tanner and currier by trade, and died in Indiana in 1848. His wife died in 1886. He entered the woolen mills when about fifteen years of age and served three years' apprenticeship with Lowrey & McCuen, of Rockville, Indiana. He located in Illinois in 1836, and operated the first woolen mills ever run at Danville, and ten years later moved to Iroquois where he was

Business Growth

A business directory for Washington County published in 1900 listed grist mills or millers in places that most people will recognize, as well as in communities that have disappeared: Cane Hill, Brentwood, Cincinnati, Dutch Mills, Evansville, Farmington, Fayetteville, Goshen, Hazel Valley,

Wrecks on the area's railways, such as this one on the Frisco line north of Springdale, always drew great attention. People often came from miles around to see the destruction, which in this instance included broken cotton bales. (Kennedy Deaver Collection)

Hubbard, Johnson, Lincoln, Morrow, Onda, Pitkin, Prairie Grove, Rhea, Savoy, Staunton, and West Fork. This is not even a complete listing. For example, at Springdale the Petross Mill had been built in 1881. According to historian Bobbie Lynch, it was a "150-barrel mill, including both corn and wheat. Manufactured patent roller and high grade flour, choice table meal, bran and feed. They had a self-rising flour which sold under tradename 'Spgd. Best'." In its day, it was one of the greatest mills in the region.

The number of sawmills also increased, from four in 1860 to eight in 1880. There was to be an even greater increase in sawmills when the railroad was completed, and the cutting of the county's white oak forests began.

There was also a spurt in tobacco production. The 1860 total of 43,123 pounds went to 116,176 in 1870. The 126,762 pounds in 1890 was grown on only 221 acres—a speciality crop. A report on tobacco culture in Arkansas published with the 1880 census stated that "The quality of tobacco grown is very similar in every respect to that produced in Virginia." Many small tobacco patches were grown for personal use. Commercial growers sold most of their crop to local dealers or manufacturers (plug tobacco was made locally), and from here the crop went to St. Louis.

In the past, cotton was grown for home use, but it was not a commercially important crop in Washington County. At the time of the Civil War, the total production reported for the county (this probably does not include patches for home use) was 15 bales. The peaks reported in the census occurred in 1880 and 1890, with 133 and 140 bales, respectively. The 1890 crop involved only 509 acres of land.

engaged in farming for some time. He then went to Williamsport, and in 1863 or 1864 engaged in the woolen business again. This enterprise was a complete failure owing to war troubles. The following three years he was engaged in peddling, and in this way secured enough money to come West. He located in Arkansas in 1871, and in 1877 erected the Springdale Woolen Mills, and is doing a thriving business. He supplies all of the woolen fabric for the public institutions of the Cherokee Nation, and besides this does a large wholesale local business. Four years ago there were four woolen mills in Arkansas, but at this date Mr. Haxton's is the only one that has survived and prospered. At the Northwestern Agricultural Fair, held at Fort Smith, Mr. Haxton took the premium on the following fabrics: Jeans, blankets, stocking yarn, and a diploma on flannels."

There had been no county fairs since just before the war. The general success of post-war farming operations was on display at a newly organized fair. According to a report published in the Arkansas Sentinel in 1878, the Washington County Agricultural and Mechanical Association's successful fair that year was hindered only by heavy rains the week before, which had resulted in nearly impassable roads. Nevertheless, "the fruit [was] fine, particularly the apples of James Felton of Cane Hill. They were splendid specimens. . ."

The only structure on the ground that year was a temporary one in the agricultural and mechanical department. Exhibited were ladies' saddles, riding bridles, wagon and buggy harnesses, and home-tanned leather. Two two-horse farm wagons on display were made by James Oates of Cincinnati and D. B. Heaton of Fayetteville. The Oates "Arkansas Traveler" took the premium, but the Sentinel complimented Heaton for the "gilt scroll work and landscape views" on the bed of his wagon.

There were many horse events: half-mile races, equestrienne competitions, racking, pacing, and trotting. A special premium offered by Will Stone for the neatest calico dress went to Miss Sallie Rainwater. Mrs. W. F. Dowell had the best five pounds of butter. On Friday evening there was an address by General D. H. Hill of the Arkansas Industrial University. A pigeon shooting-match was won by Professor Harvey.

The fair took in $200. In light of the weather and bad roads, the amount was called "encouraging" by the Sentinel.

Lead and Zinc Mining at Morrow and Rhea

Along Fly Creek near Morrow is a "prospect" of lead and zinc in the beds of limestone and chert that constitute the Boone Formation. Some mining occurred as early as the 1880s. The Washington County Lead and Zinc Company was incorporated in 1900, and the company leased part of the Morrow farm. By 1908 this lease was held by another company, the Vineyard Mining and Smelting Company.

The mine was most productive during World War I when prices were high, but total production from the mine seems never to have exceeded 50 tons. According to the Arkansas Geological Commission, "The ore minerals are galena and sphalerite in about equal proportions. They occur in scattered pockets and small cracks in the chert and, to a lesser extent, in the limestone."

There is also a small prospect one mile north of Rhea, which was mined briefly around 1905.

Early Days In The Fruit Empire

Fruit production became a source of cash income for Washington County's farmers in the last few decades of the 19th Century. A reporter from Vineyard Township told readers of the Fayetteville Democrat on October 2, 1880, "Our fruit crop is immense. After drying all the fruit that can be dried in the sun and old fashioned kilns, and three brandy stills running at full blast, there is an immense amount of summer and fall fruit rotting on the ground." The U. S. Census of 1890 reported Washington County's apple crop of 211,685 bushels was the highest in the state. By 1900 the figure was 614,924 bushels.

The settlers who had come into what we call Washington County had brought seeds and seedling trees with them. "Mr. J. Holt of Lincoln, Arkansas, had an apple tree nursery established by 1827," writes Roy C. Rom of the University of Arkansas. "The Shannon family of Evansville started one in 1830, as did J. B. Russell in 1833, near Cane Hill." Rom noted that northwest Arkansas "has a natural blend of altitude, rainfall and temperature for apple production. The soil is a stony to silty loam, loose and porous, but having a subsoil with considerable water holding capacity."

These first orchards of the 1820s and 1830s were primarily for home use. Generally the farmers wanted apples maturing from early summer until late fall. Apples not consumed fresh were dried to carry them through the winter or made into cider, apple butter, and vinegar. Some apples could be stored fresh in cellars and other cool places.

By the 1850s, these early plantings had progressed well enough that in December 1852 apples were hauled by wagon over the Boston Mountains to the Arkansas River, where they were shipped to market on the steamboat "Governor Meigs" (Prairie Grove Enterprise, June 12, 1986).

An early photograph of the Kimmons-Walker Evaporator in Springdale, circa 1890.

In the first years of apple growing, Washington County orchardists not only grew fruit, they also discovered and marketed new varieties. "A remarkably large number of apple varieties have originated in Washington County, Ark., and several of them have become of commercial importance," stated a 1913 bulletin published by the U. S. Department of Agriculture. The famous Shannon Pippin variety seems to have dated to about 1833 when a tree peddler from Indiana sold Ohio trees to farmers in the Cane Hill area. The Shannon fruit was described as "large, surface very smooth, yellow, occasionally faintly blushed with dull overcast of whitish blotches and streaks."

The Wilson June apple dates to before the Civil War in the Earles Holt nursery near Cane Hill. The nursery reverted to the wild during the war, but in the spring of 1865, 1,000 trees from the nursery were planted by a teenager, Albert Wilson, and his younger brother, 6 or 7, a few miles northeast of Lincoln. One tree in particular stood out, its fruit large and its surface yellowish with dark crimson stripes; this became known as the Wilson June. The Arkansas, Arkansaw, or Mammoth Black Twig apple dates to about 1840 when seeds were planted by John Crawford near Rhea's Mill. It was first propagated in 1869. The large, highly colored fruit, which compares favorably with the Winesap, attracted attention at the New Orleans Exposition in 1884.

Apple Varieties

The Ada Red apple originated in about 1890 at Springdale. The Collins Apple (also called Collins' Red, Champion Red, or Champion) was a scrubby tree in 1867 when it was discovered northwest of Lincoln. The Howard Sweet was discovered at the end of the Civil War at the Holt Nursery near Cane Hill. It originated near Cincinnati, Arkansas. The King David apple originated at Durham about 1890. The Oliver Red (also called Oliver and Senator) also originated in the county, probably around the turn of the century.

While these local varieties were of keen interest to the orchardists, by late in the 19th Century when commercial orcharding reached major proportions, most of the trees planted were of the Ben Davis variety, known locally as the "striped Ben." According to Thomas Rothrock of Springdale, who grew up in the apple business, "Although not a native apple, no commercial apple has ever been as well adapted to northwest Arkansas's climate and soil as the Ben Davis. . .The tree was large and a heavy bearer. The apple was also large with red stripes which covered the apple pretty well when nipped by autumn cold spells. . .Said a Louisiana native to an Arkansas apple peddler, 'That man Benny Davis up there sho' do grow the apples'."

William Campbell, who wrote the history of Fayetteville, was in the apple business for 25 years. "Surrounding Fayetteville, great apple orchards were planted after the war," he wrote (p. 40). "In the latter eighties these began bearing heavily, and there became the problem of conservation of 'culls.' Small evaporating plants were built to take care of them." The Fayetteville Democrat of July 19, 1883, reported that the Northwest Arkansas Fruit and Vegetable Company had purchased machinery in Boston that would evaporate perishables from the farm, orchard, and garden so that they could be sold at a profit. The technology was no longer considered "experimental." Uncle Johnny Mayes and 12 mechanics were putting up the factory. Campbell worked for A C. Hamilton, who came to Fayetteville from Texas in 1896 and "devoted his entire energies to handling evaporated apples exclusively. . .The millions of packages of fruit were seen by more millions of people."

How important was the apple? It provided cash incomes to farmers and the raw material for commercial operations—shipping, evaporating, storage, etc.—in towns like Fayetteville. In other words, the apple was a major source of employment from the 1880s until the decline of apple growing in the 1920s and 1930s.

Valuable as it was, the apple still was not as important, overall, as corn. Data from the U. S. Census for 1900 show, for example that in 1899 the corn crop in the county was valued at $655,000 as compared to $195,000 for apples.

What the apple did was to fill people with pride in their land and work. Apples brought favorable attention like no other activity. In 1876 Arkansas took first prize for apples at the Philadelphia Centennial and later at the world fairs held at Chicago and St. Louis. At Chicago, Washington County apples won the prize for the largest apples, for the best display of apples, and also the highest award for seedling trees. Even though apples have not been an important crop in the county for over 50 years, the glow from what was once an apple empire lives on.

The Railroad

"Fayetteville, and Northwest Arkansas, are exuberant with joy. We are entering a new era; the humdrum of the stage coach days is past, we are out of the old grooves; the steam is up, the bell is ringing and we plunge into the stirring active scenes of the new life"—J. R. Pettigrew, publisher of the Arkansas Sentinel, upon the arrival of the first train in the county, June 8, 1881. (The arrival of the first regular passenger train was celebrated on July 4, 1882).

A crowd estimated at 10,000-12,000 greeted the engine, baggage car,

The Railroad is Coming: 1881

"The productions of the fertile country around Fayetteville have hitherto been marketed at rates unremunerative to farmers. Crops have been comparatively small; it has not paid enough to raise them on a large scale, with the exception of perhaps, tobacco. There has been no market for the fine timber of that district, and no cheap and easy outlet for manufactures. . .

"With these drawbacks Washington County has acquired a population of about 25,000. . .Its great farms will be divided into small ones and immigration will people its wilds. . .This railway will soon open a gulf state market to our Arkansas friends. . .So Northwest Arkansas has good cause for its cantata of joy. It not only has a railway—it has one unembarrassed and in good hands: not the monopoly of one cold-blooded and grasping capitalist who flays the whole country, but a road that is hostile to such monopoly and cultivates the popular goodwill; a road that is in the hands of a liberal company, using its means to benefit a hitherto unappreciated land. . ."

passenger coach "Fayetteville," and the car of Captain Rogers, general manager of the St. Louis & San Francisco Railway Company (Frisco), as it pulled in from the north, having first passed through Benton County and then Springdale. A 50-gun artillery salute was fired from College Hill by cadets from Arkansas Industrial University (one cadet was injured). The elder Peter Mankins, said to be 111 years old, came from Middle Fork Valley to witness the event.

Rail transportation had been a goal of civic leaders since before the Civil War. In 1868 when the county was still reeling from the ill effects of the war, railroad fever was rampant, with several hopeful plans afoot. The September 23, 1871, issue of the Fayetteville Democrat was given over to railroad promotion and the touting of the region. Included was a map showing the locations of railroad projects in the regions surrounding northwest Arkansas. Pierce City, Missouri, was then the closest rail terminus north of Washington County. Why should a railroad come here? According to the paper, the fruit crops including apples, pears, peaches, grapes, plus wild fruits like persimmons and paw-paws already compared "favorably with those of any other country on the Western Hemisphere. . ."—presumably of such immense value no railroad executive in his right mind would bypass.

In 1868 the Arkansas Legislature passed an act granting aid of $15,000 per mile to the Northwestern Railroad Border Company upon the completion of a road from Missouri to Van Buren, via Bentonville and Fayetteville, but even this didn't get the job done. On January 2, 1872, the Democrat reported on a meeting of the board of directors of the Arkansas Western Railroad Company, which hoped to interest the St. Louis and Gulf Branch Railroad in coming here. David Walker, president of the local company, was sent to St. Louis on behalf of local interests.

Winslow residents gathered at the north end of the tunnel for this photo taken in 1899. The tunnel bears a marker with the year of construction (1882). The marker was removed in 1969 when the tunnel was enlarged to accommodate larger, modern freight trains. (Robert G. Winn)

Things didn't move, however, until the Frisco decided to build into Texas, via Fort Smith. Washington County was right in the center of the proposed new route.

The Frisco eventually surveyed two routes from Missouri, one through Prairie Grove Valley and another via Fayetteville. Businessmen in Fayetteville and other communities seized the moment, purchasing right-of-way from Missouri to Fayetteville for $8,000 and adding $2,500 for a depot in Fayetteville. Many individuals donated private land for the right-of-way. "That knocked the plum," stated William Campbell.

The arrival of the first train at Fayetteville was only part of the job, however. From Fayetteville the rails had to be pushed south through the Boston Mountains. It wasn't difficult to run 25 miles of rails through the basically level valley of the West Fork branch as far south as the community of Summit Home, renamed Winslow for Edward F. Winslow, president of the Frisco from 1880 to 1889. But at Winslow the surveyed route approached the very top of the Ozarks. Here the rail crews faced formidable high elevations and deep ravines. Sadly, that wasn't all these workers faced.

Winslow Tunnel

On August 4, 1881, the Fayetteville Democrat reported that 250 men were at work on a tunnel through the high mountain at Winslow, and 8,000 were building the road between Fayetteville and the Boston Mountains. Frisco's tunnel at Winslow went through 1,726 feet of Atoka Formation sandstone and shale before emerging on the south side of the mountain. The tunnel was originally 19 feet high and 14 feet wide. (It was enlarged in 1969 to accommodate modern railroad cars and engines.)

A 1922 scene shows two passenger trains meeting at the Winslow station. The southbound train has moved onto a side track to allow the northbound train to pass. Timber ready for shipment was stacked high by the rails. (Ruth Ann Wilson)

This great engineering feat took an equally great human toll from the men who did the work.

W. A. Burgess, whose father was an official on the construction crews, was an eyewitness who published an account in the Arkansas Historical Quarterly. At Winslow, "the mountain had been in process of being tunneled through and the work was still incomplete. A force of white men had been employed on the north side of the tunnel and Negroes on the south end. Upon my previous vacation, reports had come to us of occasional bloody clashes between the two, often resulting in fatalities. . ." Life in the camps must have been very hard. The April 27, 1882, issue of the Arkansas Democrat stated that two black men, one from Fayetteville and another from Little Rock, had been in a fight in which the Little Rock man died.

At Winslow, Burgess "noticed a great number of small cubicle-style rough-lumber shacks, and the driver explained that each supplied shelter for one smallpox victim, as that dread scourge had been raging through the workers for many weeks and the death toll was high. Life was cheap in those days out at the front, and here were reportedly 150 workers at each end of this tunnel with apparently no regard being taken for their welfare."

In his book Steel Rails And Crosscut Ties, Robert G. Winn stated that four burial sites were used for black victims, one for the whites. At one place, "about fifteen bodies were thrown into one long trench and covered with dirt. The blankets on which the men had died were wrapped around the dead bodies. . .South of the tunnel and north of Number One Bridge is a railroad fill long known as 'The African Center.' The name derived from the fact that the men who died in the nearby camp were dumped into the place and their bodies covered to become a part of the foundation upon which the railroad was built. . ."

Smallpox also appeared at Fayetteville, closing down the county seat town. On January 5, 1882, the Fayetteville Democrat stated that a smallpox quarantine had been proclaimed in Fayetteville. The Arkansas Democrat of Little Rock, dated March 23, 1882, published a list of the names of 18 patients in a pest house at Fayetteville. Of these 18, three had died; 16 were blacks. On July 14, 1882, A. M. Botefuhr of Fayetteville wrote the Springfield Wagon Company of Springfield, Missouri, about the smallpox at Fayetteville (see Flashback, February 1952). Botefuhr was a partner in a store that sold farming machinery, stoves, etc. "Five weeks ago smallpox broke out. In ten days trade was dead as a nit and has remained so to this time and is likely to until the scourge is over. Just now it is bad and excitement is running high. We have discharged our clerks, brought our expenses down to bedrock, and with a house and barn and warehouse full of goods, sit and pray for customers who don't come. The same cause operates to prevent collections, as our country friends are panic-stricken and won't come in to settle. . ."

Effect of Railroad

The tragedy didn't prevent completion of the great tunnel, and business houses in Fayetteville reopened. But smallpox and the tunnel were but two obstacles faced by the Frisco. Robert G. Winn described the situation in his Railroads of Northwest Arkansas. "The seven miles between the tunnel at Winslow and Schaberg span the most rugged and spectacular section of the Frisco Railroad between St. Louis and the Texas border. Within this short distance are the three highest bridges along the entire line. Number One, about a mile south of the tunnel, is the highest and longest, spanning the hollow 117 feet above the stream. . .The first bridges were constructed of wood, and each bridge of any length had side platforms where barrels of water were kept. This water was necessary to extinguish the fires set by embers falling beneath the train. . .Hot coals fell from the engine and between crossties, down the timbered area below the bridges so that fires spread. . ."

The Frisco fostered changes in each community through which it passed. At Springdale, for example, business development occurred along the tracks, shifting focus away from the town square. At Fayetteville the railroad crossing at Dickson Street near Arkansas Industrial University became an important industrial, warehousing, and shipping center. The railroad stopped at Rugby, a few miles south of Fayetteville. This became Staunton in 1886, then Greenland Station or Greenland in 1909. Down the line at West Fork, the village was incorporated in May 1885. According to the Goodspeed history of northwest Arkansas, "The construction of the St. Louis & San Francisco Railway was as great a boon to West Fork as to other places along the line." A few miles south of West Fork, the train made a flag stop at Woolsey Store. Later, this community was renamed Pitkin, then again Woolsey. The community of Gunter was renamed Brentwood in 1882, the year the rails went through.

After July 1882, when regular passenger service was initiated on the line, Winslow developed a lively resort business, complete with fine hotels that catered to well-to-do visitors, who could now visit the Boston Mountains with ease and comfort. The Summit House was a stage stop before the railroad, then was used by railroad workers. Later, Mrs. Arena Sample built the Mountain Hotel. According to Robert Winn, "The largest single resort operation was at Mountain Lodge, promoted by a Chicago man. . .T. B. Harris." Winslow first became a summer resort for

West Fork

West Fork owes its name to the beautiful little stream that passes by—the West Fork of the White River.

The first known white settler in the present day West Fork area was Eli Bloyd (or Bloyed) in 1828. He obtained title to his land by entry in 1840; John Graham and Robert McPhail had done so in 1836. In 1837 the West Fork Christian Church was organized. In 1875 or 1876 a water powered sawing and grinding mill was moved to West Fork from four miles south, then steam mills were built near by. Soon other businesses were added: a carding machine, mercantile, spoke-factory, and two blacksmith shops.

The "West Fork" post office was moved from present day Woolsey to present day West Fork in 1878. Harris H. Davis was the first postmaster at the new location.

One of the Fayetteville to Fort Smith stagecoach routes passed through West Fork, and the first train on the St. Louis and San Francisco Railway line arrived in West Fork June 8, 1881. The trains hauled fruit, produce, and timber from the area, leading to a boom in West Fork. The town incorporated in 1885. By 1889 there were establish-people from Fort Smith, then "other visitors from Oklahoma, Texas, Louisiana and other southern states were enjoying the cool, refreshing mountain summers."

In retrospect, it would seem that the fruit crops and other agricultural productions would have made Washington County a rich prize for any railroad. However, this doesn't seem to have been the case, even though great quantities of fruit were eventually shipped on the Frisco. Two factors contributed primarily to the Frisco's coming here: Washington County's strategic location between Missouri and Texas, and the great, largely untapped forest that grew in the rough terrain in the southeastern part of the county.

Only a few years after the rails had finally been pushed into the county, J. H. Van Hoose—who had been involved in railroad promotions as far back as 1868—contributed a column to the Arkansas Democrat in Little Rock (February 22, 1887, from Fayetteville, and therefore published a little later in the Democrat). "Since railroads have been built in our state the timber, that in former years was of no use except to produce its annual crop of acorns to fatten the swine and wild game, has brought millions of dollars into our country. Our agricultural products would not of themselves have been a sufficient inducement to Eastern capitalists to build railroads into Arkansas, especially among our mountains. But they wanted our valuable timber and have built roads and will build more and keep building until Arkansas is chequered all over with them."

Van Winkle and His Sawmill

The big virgin forest of white oak trees—with scaly, ash-colored bark, 100 foot heights, and handsomely lobed leaves—had been growing in the cool ravines of the county in the time of the Native American Indians. The trees had survived the days when the white pioneers and their black slaves cleared land for farms. The ravines and hillsides were plenty good for forest birds like Ruffed Grouse and Wild Turkeys, but not for farming. The advent of the railroad changed this by making easy the transportation of goods. With so many railroads being built in the United States, markets were assured for ties. Now the great trees could be whittled down to ties by lumberjacks. As the virgin forest disappeared, so too did the Ruffed Grouse and Wild Turkeys.

The history of Washington County up to the 1880s is replete with references to Peter Van Winkle and his sawmill. At the time of his death in 1882 he was probably the wealthiest person in northwest Arkansas. He owned what was then the region's greatest industrial plant, a sawmill, thousands of acres of land, plus other property. Having hauled timber for years in wagons over often non-existent roads, he knew how valuable a railroad could be. He was naturally one of the most influential promoters of a local railroad. In a biographical sketch for the Arkansas Historical Quarterly, Thomas Rothrock called him the "pioneer lumberman and lumber dealer in Benton and Washington Counties."

He was born in New York City in 1814 and moved to Washington County in 1839, where he farmed and did mechanical work for 11 years. He specialized in breaking the heavy prairie sod which was then common in northwest Arkansas. He moved to a location north of modern War Eagle in southeastern Benton County in 1850, where he started a milling

The Still at Goshen

*"An Old-Timers Reminiscenes of the Old Days at Goshen" collected by Tom Feathers (*Flashback, April 1952) includes a story about whiskey-making days of the past (probably late 1800s).

"A large still was in operation south of Goshen and east up Dry Creek on the Washington-Madison County line. It was under the management of Link Johnson and John Webb. Most of the whiskey was hauled to Bentonville and sold to the government. It was put in 10-gallon kegs and hauled by wagon. One of the teamsters who transported the whiskey tells the story of how a stop was made at a point near where Rogers is now located. He would remove a hoop from each of the three or four kegs, bore a hole where the hoop had been and take a quart or so from each keg. Then he would plug the hole and replace the hoop. These quarts were hidden by the side of the road and picked up later after making delivery of the kegs to the warehouse."

and lumber business that soon became famous throughout the region. He eventually operated several mills. His large, steam-powered sawmill was on the White River, slightly downstream from the present Horseshoe Bend recreation area on Beaver Lake.

Van Winkle was a slave owner and lost much as a result of the Civil War. However, he recovered quickly and obtained the contract to supply the wood that went into University Hall (Old Main) at Fayetteville. He fulfilled this contract by hauling wood from his Benton County mill to the construction site in ox-drawn wagons over roads which in part he had to construct. In 1879 he began construction of a hotel at the northwest corner of Center and College in Fayetteville. According to the Fayetteville Democrat dated February 14, 1880, "Nearly every carpenter in the town, painter in the country, are now at work on the Van Winkle house. . .The third-story of the house will be used as a public hall, and will be the largest hall in the State. A rousing old dance is in contemplation. . .An old Virginia reel will head the programme and 'Uncle Peter' will be expected to lead the column of merry shufflers." According to William Campbell, "The third story of that hotel was fitted up for an 'opera house.' Of course talent and erudition had their sway in the University chapel in those days. . .But up in that spacious place small road troupes began their ministry of mirth and emotion." The hotel received a brick veneer in 1905 and was destroyed by fire in 1914.

According to the Goodspeed history, Van Winkle "built an extensive sash and door factory, and supplied the majority of the material used in the building of Eureka Springs, Fayetteville, and other places." He died in 1882, just as the huge timber boom spawned by rail transportation was getting underway. Nevertheless, his career had laid the groundwork for the timber cutting just then starting. The Van Winkle home, which stood

The white oak trees which grew abundantly in the area provided raw material for a lucrative lumber business. until 1969, was situated near modern Highway 12 in Van Hollow, which is today part of the Hobbs State Management Area.

Hugh F. McDanield

Much later on the scene, but of importance to the timber boom, was Hugh F. McDanield. The Goodspeed history states that he was born in 1843 in Ohio and served in an Ohio regiment in the Civil War. After the war he farmed, then went into the mercantile business in Kansas City. In 1873 he took a contract to build the Kansas Midland Railway and after its completion operated a ranch in west Texas. He completed the Texas Western Railway in 1877. "In 1881, having learned that the San Francisco Railway would build this way, he came to Fayetteville for the purpose of furnishing ties for the new division." He moved to Fayetteville and soon developed a huge business shipping ties to western markets. He furnished the Santa Fe Railway with nearly all of its ties. In 1887 alone he shipped out 15,000 railroad cars, worth $2,000,000. The basis for this business was white oak trees, reached by a new railroad.

In 1886 he began construction of what was in time known as the St. Paul Branch. The rails started at Fayette Junction in south Fayetteville and extended into Madison County. At first the terminus was at St. Paul, later Pettigrew, a distance of 45 miles. In an article for the Arkansas Democrat (dated September 5, 1886, at Fayetteville, and therefore a little later in the Democrat), J. H. Van Hoose stated that 700-1,000 men would be employed in building the line by mid-September of 1886. In addition, he noted that Fayetteville businessmen had raised $7,000 to purchase the right-of-way they favored. The line was built and sold to the Frisco in 1887. In the six years prior to 1886, Van Hoose stated that McDanield had shipped $10,000,000 worth of ties. Van Hoose speculated that the figure would double in the future. McDanield died in 1888.

The Maguiretown store stood in a once thriving community that moved to Elkins when the St. Paul Branch railroad was constructed. The crumbling remains of this brick building can still be seen along Highway 74.

The St. Paul Branch and the associated timber business had an enormous impact on the development of southeastern Washington County. By 1887, the rails had been pushed across Washington County into Madison County, spawning a host of new communities that were born in the timber boom and provided services to the railroad as well as farm families. In Washington County, there were stations or stops at Baldwin (which got a post office in 1892), Harris (post office in 1888), Hood (which became Elkins in 1892), Durham, and Thompson (in Madison County just across the Washington County line).

The history of Thompson is probably representative of the period. Lewis Thompson opened a store in the community that bears his name prior to the arrival of the railroad. A post office was established in 1887, the year the railroad came. John K. Pool bought the store from Thompson in 1890. According to Thompson native Louise Lockhart, "The general store flourished under Pool's management, becoming a trade center for nearby farmers. The major commerce in those days was timber: large logs for sawmills and smaller logs to be made into railroad ties and posts. Pool created a market for the crossties and posts, as well as hogs and cattle. . .He bought acres of railroad ties. . .it was reported at one time that he had almost a hundred thousand." Eventually the community had a gristmill, blacksmith shop, school, and justice of the peace court, in addition to the store and post office. Though not formally educated, Pool became a major depositor, shareholder, and a director of McIlroy Bank in Fayetteville.

Thompson's end as a trade center coincided with the last trains on the St. Paul Branch in 1937. Glimpses of the past can be seen in old ledgers from the store that are in the possession of Mike and Carolyn Craun Tillery, who operate a poultry farm at old Thompson.

In the 1890s, the Frisco published a magazine called Headlight Flashes. According to this publication, the Northwest Arkansas Lumber Company was a giant that operated in Fayetteville and Springdale, handling timber cut in both the Indian Territory to the west and Arkansas. Beginning in 1885 under C. W. Phillips (whom the Headlight called "the pioneer lumberman in this section"), the company was shipping 200 Frisco cars of "the finest grade of timber in the world" by 1900. The Fayetteville Wagon-Wood and Lumber Company was organized in 1893. Drawing on white oak, ash, and hickory, the company manufactured carriage and wagonwood stock, plow parts, spokes, etc. The Ozark Wagon Works, established in 1897, turned out the famous Ozark Wagons, said to be the best on wheels. The Red Star Spoke Company, with plants in Fayetteville and in Madison County, was said to be the largest such company in the United States. The Ayer and Lord Tie Company bought six million feet of railroad timber yearly, not including 500,000 to 700,000 railroad ties and piling timbers. The St. Paul Branch also spawned the J. H. Phipps Lumber Co., once the largest such company in all northwest Arkansas. Its Fayetteville plant employed as many as 200 men.

Timber Boom and Agricultural Activity

The timber boom was not exclusively the province of the St. Paul Branch. In 1900, 70 wagons were backed up waiting to unload timber at Woolsey on the main Frisco line. A buyer at Woolsey shipped 40 carloads of fence posts in one month. Winslow became an important shipping point for hardwood cut in the surrounding forests of southern Washington County. Oldtimers recall when the rail siding there was covered by posts, ties, spokes, and other wood products. The E. A. Budd Post Company of Winslow was a major timber buyer, shipping posts to the newly developing western states. Budd later moved to Fayetteville. The interior of the house he built at Fayetteville, 205 W. Rock, still contains superb examples of hardwood carpentry.

The clearing of so much land that had formerly been covered with forest created opportunities for new settlers. The railroad, naturally seeking new sources of revenue, encouraged people to come to Arkansas and make their fortunes in fruit. The Fayetteville Democrat dated November 9, 1893, for example, mentions booklets available from the Frisco that promoted fruit farming as well as immigration to northwest Arkansas: "Fruits of Arkansas" and "Farms and Homes in Arkansas: Farming Joys." One pamphlet claimed there were "No Droughts, No Floods, No Cyclones, No Blizzards, No Cold Snaps. . ." (The booklet didn't mention that a cyclone had flattened part of Fayetteville in 1880!). Arkansas, stated another, had "THE FINEST COUNTRY IN THE WORLD FOR FARMING." Another proclaimed Washington County as "An Independent Empire, Capable of Being Developed Into an Ideal Commonwealth, With Opportunity and Wealth for Every Earnest Worker."

It is apparent that the coming of the railroad quickened the pace of agricultural activity in the county. The Northwest Arkansas Horticultural Society was organized at Springdale in December 1886, with 16 members. The Washington County Horticultural Society was organized at Fayetteville in August 1887. In 1888, the Western Arkansas Fruit Growers' and Shippers' Cooperative Association, composed primarily of Washington County farmers, was organized with headquarters at Springdale.

Almost immediately after the rails came through, there developed a canning industry, which as Robert G. Winn wrote, "sprang up in almost every hamlet along the Frisco," as well as in other places in the county. Vegetables, especially tomatoes, were sealed in tin cans, and apples were peeled and dried in evaporators. High quality apples could always be shipped to markets, but "culls" went to waste unless they were evaporated.

The railroad helped turn Springdale into a boom town during the 1880s. According to historian Bobbie Lynch, "The first known commercial canning factory in Springdale was formed by a stock company of forty men. They rented a wooden building in 1886 on the east side of the railroad near Emma Ave. . .The first year the company had a capacity of 3,000 cans a day. Installing a copper jacketed kettle for making preserves in 1887, they employed 25 men and 70 women. A goal of 360,000 cans of tomatoes for the year was met. There was a fruit evaporator attached. . ." A two-story brick building was erected in 1888 with a capacity of 10,000 cans a day.

Canning and Evaporating

In the late 1880s, the Prairie Grove Canning and Evaporating Factory was operated by a joint stock company. According to Goodspeed (1889), "The factory is supplied with all the latest improved machinery for canning and evaporating fruit. It has a capacity of 10,000 cans per day by the canning process, and 250 bushels per day when evaporating fruit or vegetables." Goodspeed also mentions that a cannery was put into operation at Boonsboro (Cane Hill) that was similar to the one at Prairie Grove. The factory at Woolsey is said to have canned an entire railroad freight car of huckleberries in one season.

A cannery was opened at West Fork in the 1890s that specialized in canning tomatoes and evaporating apples. Robert Winn published this amusing tale about one side light of life around the factory. "Juice from the apples ran in shallow trenches from the building out to the east side and collected in pools where it soon fermented in the warm sunshine. Peelings were also dumped near the factory; these also fermented. All livestock ran on an open range and wandered about the factory. Cows, pigs, poultry, and any other livestock running outside drank the juice and ate the peelings. Soon after the factory opened in the fall every cow, pig, and chicken that was permitted on the open range, staggered home at night in a drunken condition. The only sober animals or fowls in West Fork were those confined within their owner's fences."

New agricultural enterprises began to develop in the county. Commercial strawberry production seems to have been initiated in the mid-1880s. The planting of less than one acre in the Springdale area in 1886 was a noteworthy item (Springdale News, April 29, 1937), as was the harvest worth several hundred dollars in 1889. By 1897 there were 500 acres of strawberries in the Springdale area, and 40 railroad cars were shipped in 1899. The U. S. Census shows that by 1900 Washington County had 2,429 acres in strawberries, leading the state.

Migrant workers and local seasonal workers were involved in the strawberry business. In 1898, for example, the Shipper's Union of Springdale advertised for 3,000 strawberry pickers. Those who lived a distance from the fields were advised to come "ready to camp" (Springdale News, March 30, 1978).

The grape business came to Washington County with Italian immigrants. In 1898 Father Pietro Bandini led about 35 families of Italian immigrants from southeastern Arkansas, where they had first settled, to

Mary Bastianelli

Mary Bastianelli was among the original group led by Father Pietro Bandini that settled Tontitown. She is remembered for many things, not the least of which is the donation of her house for the site of the Tontitown Museum.

She is also remembered for her philosophy of life and humor so necessary for survival of those early times. An Italian settlement was not welcomed by Northwest Arkansas, and when one unsuccessful self-appointed party of men tried to burn the newly erected school at Tontitown, it was with gratitude that she commented of the coal-oil toting arsonists, that their oil was "Just like ours—so poor it wouldn't burn. Praise God! We can still laugh."

Tontitown's John Mollar

John Mollar didn't come to Tontitown with the 1898 Italian settlement. He wasn't even Italian. He had been born John Mollard, son of a French Count (Count of Chatillon) under the reign of Napoleon during the French Revolution.

Forced to flee the country, his family emigrated to Italy where John pursued the study of music, medicine and, for a time, the priesthood.

When John's sister, Magdalena, came to America in 1910 to join her husband, John Mollard accompanied her and Americanized his name, Mollard, by dropping the 'd'.

Once settled in Tontitown, Mollar made himself invaluable to the community with his service. An insomniac, he was always the first to arise and toll the church bell for services or school, waking Father Bandini and building fires for school, church, and rectory.

Mollar was organist, choral director, composer, and director for both church and school. He managed a general store for his sister's husband, Frank Baudino, closing it when needed for rehearsals, weddings, and funerals.

With no doctors in residence, Mollar counseled and prescribed for the sick, even to the setting of broken limbs. He was known by all Tontitown's children as a kindly man who would give them candy whenever they visited the store.

This gentle, religious man slept in an old meat ice box in the back of the store, leaving more room and privacy for his sister's family that lived in rooms overhead. Never refusing to help anyone who called on him, his services were freely given.

Evenings, after the store closed, friends dropped by to listen to John play the piano while his brother-in-law sang. After his family slept, John Mollar, dressed in white, would walk down the road to the cemetery, where he'd pray for the dead.

John Mollar, his sister Magdalena and his brother-in-law, Frank Baudino are buried, side by side, at the Catholic Cemetery in Tontitown.

the Smith's Chapel area west of Springdale, now called Tontitown. The immigrants had suffered horribly from malaria and intense heat in southeastern Arkansas. Northwest Arkansas was attractive because it reminded them of Italy, was free of malaria, had proven its suitability for fruit growing, and now had good rail transportation.

Initially, each family settled on 10 acres and cultivated one acre of grapes. Soon came orchards and vegetable gardens. By 1909 the original 35 families had increased to 70, and the Italians owned 1,400 acres. These immigrants were resented by some residents, probably because they spoke Italian, and as immigrants, they stuck together and did not quickly assimilate into the existing community in northern Washington County. Attempts were made to burn their farms as well as the school established by Father Bandini. After one such incident Father Bandini confronted the vandals and said, "We are all Americans here, and I am warning you that we will use our American rights in our own defense. There are few men among us who have not served in the Italian army. We are familiar with guns. From this moment on I am the colonel of our regiment, and I assure you that night and day a sentinel will guard our streets. Anyone who comes to us intent on evil-doing will be shot." The immigrants persisted in making Tontitown a prosperous new addition to the cultural landscape of Washington County.

The Ozark and Cherokee Central Railroad

Railroad fever and new development was not limited to the parts of the county directly served by the Frisco. Prairie Grove had been on the proposed Frisco route that eventually went through Fayetteville. Even though Prairie Grove didn't get this route, interest persisted. A mass meeting for "every citizen feeling interested in the building of a rail road from the Frisco line to Prairie Grove" was advertised for September 25, 1888. This line was many years in coming.

The first train of the Ozark & Cherokee Central Railroad entered Prairie Grove in August 1901. It ran from Fayetteville through Farmington to Prairie Grove, and was extended to Lincoln, and Summers, and then into the Indian Territory. In his history of the local railroads, Robert Winn states that much of this line was built by black convict labor leased by the State of Arkansas to private contractors. The men were forced to work chained together in pairs. Cann and Gibson in their book, A History of Summers Community, stated that "The line was built with Negro, Mexican, and Irish labor, and was mostly pick and shovel work, though many teams of horses and oxen were used on the larger fills."

These communities were growing even before the advent of the railroad. Farmington got a post office in 1868 and a town was laid-out around 1870. Summers got a post office in 1882, which was discontinued, then re-established in 1884. Prairie Grove had a post office in 1867 and was laid-out as a town in 1877. By the late 1880s, the 500 citizens of Prairie Grove had their own newspaper.

The town of Lincoln traces its lineage back to Beaty Mountain, north of the present town. A post office was established there in 1877 under the name Mt. Hayes, but was discontinued in 1879. The community slowly crept southward and was then called Blackjack and Starr Hill. A store was opened in 1874, and a post office established in 1884. The name Lincoln appeared in 1885 after the U. S. Post Office informed the community that there was already a Georgetown, Arkansas—the name submitted in 1884.

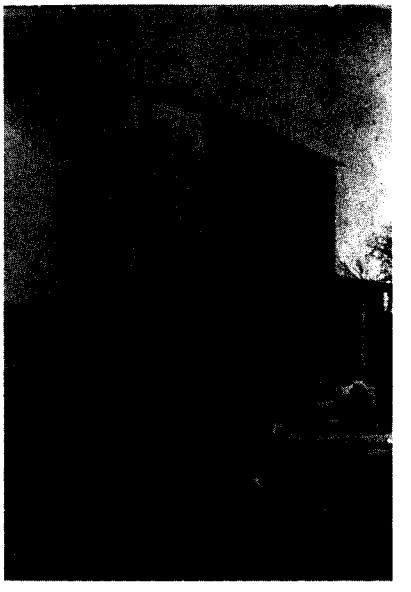
Communities along the tracks benefited from the O & CC, but those by-passed went into decline. Boonsboro, which became Cane Hill in 1901, was several miles south of the tracks. It had long been an important community in the county. Cane Hill College was eclipsed by the opening of Arkansas Industrial University, but the school carried on. In 1875, it even took the somewhat radical step of becoming a coeducational institution, with five women earning degrees in 1877. A fire destroyed the college building in 1885. A fine new brick building was erected in 1886 that today serves as a community center and museum. Competition from the Arkansas Industrial University in Fayetteville finally was too much, and Cane Hill College closed in 1891. This was a blow to the once prosperous village. When it was by-passed by the O & CC, Cane Hill—which had been so influential in the affairs of Washington County since the first days—went into decline.



Though no longer in existence, the Cincinnati flour mill stood for many years on Cincinnati creek. (Ruth Ann Wilson)

Cincinnati in western Washington County was lively in the days before the railroad. From the time of the Civil War until about 1900, Cincinnati was probably the leading trade center in the western part of the county. In 1885, for example, there were four general mercantile stores there. Two mills once operated within a mile and a half of the business district, and an 11-room hotel served travelers. The town also had a drugstore, blacksmith shop, and tannery. A Masonic Male and Female Academy was established there in 1878. According to a printed folder (reproduced in Flashback, June 1955), "The location of the school is remote from anything of a demoralizing nature and exceedingly healthy. . .The discipline is strict, but not severe, cognizance being taken of deportment both in and out of school."

Cincinnati is located four miles north of where the tracks of the Ozark & Central Cherokee were laid through Summers. Cincinnati declined after the turn of the century, a victim of the railroad boom that spelled growth elsewhere—such as in the Summers community.

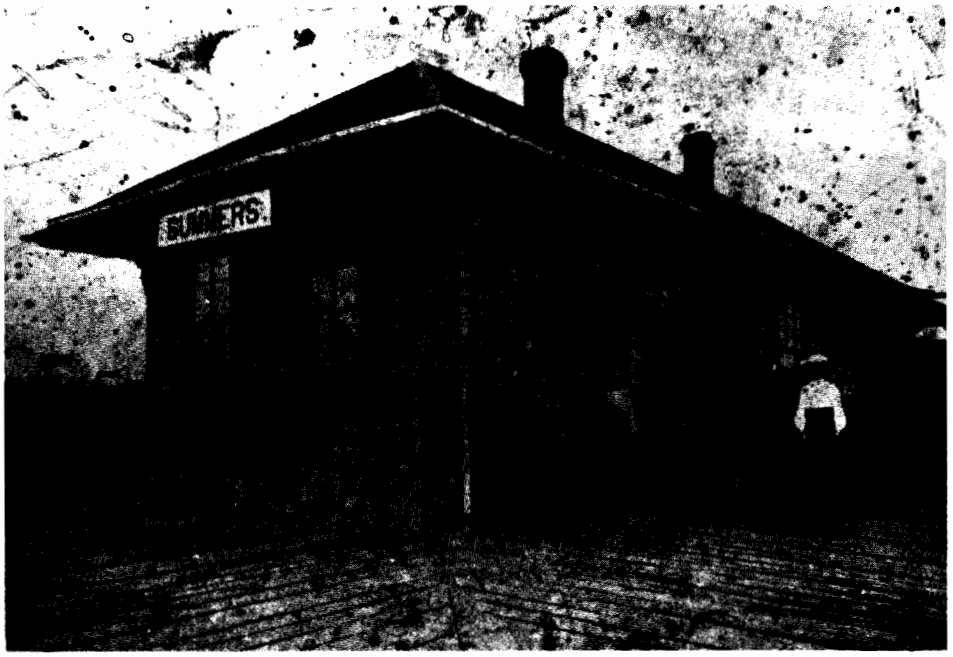
Summers got its first scheduled train in 1902. In their history of the Summers community, Cann and Gibson wrote, "After the construction of the railroad, there were three general stores, Strickland and Wood's Drug Store, Strickland's Photography, Wm. Elms Barber Shop, and in 1904 a hotel was built by Dee Little, a few years later destroyed by fire and never rebuilt."

With its great wealth and power, and its obvious connection to the wider world beyond, the railroads initiated Washington County into the modern corporate world. An economic boom was set-off as new lines were laid and new businesses opened. The benefits, however, were not shared by everyone nor by all segments of the population.

In 1896 the county poor farm was moved from the location near Son's Chapel east of Fayetteville to the Mt. Comfort community west of Fayetteville. The inmates lived in a large two-story house with basement that stood across the road from the Mt. Comfort School and what was once the Cumberland Presbyterian Church. Another small building was added as the number of inmates increased. Many of these paupers were buried on a hill across the ravine from the home. Robert Winn has written, "No markers were placed at these graves and long ago the location of these burial sites has been lost and forgotten." An item in the Fayetteville Democrat for October 5, 1899, stated that there were 23 paupers on that date and that the county allocated for each of them $4.00 per month, which included food, clothing, and medical attention. Much of the food was grown on the farm itself.



Like so many other small town depots in Washington County, the Summers depot reflected life in the community. People gathered there to meet, to part, and sometimes just to watch the trains. (Jerry Risley)

Black Folks

Black citizens of the county continued to face tough choices in the days when many white citizens were benefiting from the railroad boom. When the railroad passed south of Cincinnati, for example, the economic pressure on black farmers increased tremendously. Dr. Gordon Morgan, a sociologist at the University of Arkansas, has written, "The little town had plans for growth, but after the Civil War, and the bypassing of the community by the railroad, its prospects declined. Marginal and small farmers could not get their crops to market rapidly and most began to sell-out and vacate agriculture as a source of livelihood. Since black people did not often own their land, but worked for others, their ties to the area were lessened."

Steve and Dora West Parks, who owned a small farm at Cincinnati, saw bad times coming. Owning a farm gave them roots, but "As the children grew older, they wanted to socialize and travel to find black communities for these outlets. . ." Around the turn of the century, they, along with other black families, moved 14 miles to Cane Hill, where there was a more stable black community. "The three room house at Cane Hill was made of logs, plastered inside. The floor was rough lumber and the roof was tin. Cooking was done in a lean-to connected to the house. Mr. and Mrs. Parks and the two small children shared one room. . .It was not long before Mr. Parks found work, but it was also a short time before the oldest boy left home heading for Fayetteville where the prospects for day labor were better."

At Cane Hill there was a black church, St. James Baptist. There was recreation, such as dances as well as music, especially singing, at people's homes. Black farms were small, but the Cane Hill community was relatively large. People could get by through sharing work and expensive tools.

There was a common cemetery at Cane Hill where everyone, black and white, was buried. This seems to have changed sometime after the Plessy v. Ferguson Supreme Court decision of 1896 that legalized "separate but equal" accommodations in public facilities and led to a hardening of racial segregation. Eventually, blacks from Cane Hill, Cincinnati, Summers, and Lincoln were buried in a common cemetery at Lincoln. This cemetery is discussed in Flashback, May 1966, p. 32.

Dr. Morgan points out that the same processes that caused blacks to abandon Cincinnati were at work in Cane Hill. The black community there declined, with many people moving to Fayetteville. In Fayetteville, black people lived in places in addition to the modern Willow Street community in the hollow east of the Washington County Courthouse. Prior to 1930 many blacks lived north of North Street and as far north as the 3000 block of North College Avenue. The Willow area probably developed as a black community because of its proximity to the public square and the homes of wealthy white families in what is today the Washington-Willow Historic District. The low-lying land along the stream fed by Big Spring was much more subject to flooding than the higher ground. Its low value made building lots accessible to black people.

Agitation on the Farm

Some citizens of Washington County recovered rapidly from the effects of the Civil War and went on to success in the railroad and agricultural booms. Others felt left out. Farmers had recovered from the devastation of the war and actually surpassed pre-war production, but Buck-Snort and Bob Kidd, or What's in a Name?

There is no official book of Washington County place names, but some of the more unusual ones have been gathered by Louise Thornton of Springdale and published in Flashback, November 1973. Ernie Deane of Fayetteville published some Washington County names in his book, Arkansas Place Names. Here are some examples, drawn from Thornton's paper:

Hog Eye: origins unclear, but may date to the time when an itinerant fiddler played the song "Hog-Eye" for drinks in a saloon which once graced the community. There are other stories about this name, too.

Bug Scuffle (west of Devil's Den): Apparently named for two large tumble beetles whose scuffling over a small ball of manure easily captured the attention of several church-goers trying to avoid a lengthy revival sermon at the church there.

Buck-Snort (another name for Belleview, near Cane Hill): A man named Buck apparently got "likkered-up" and managed to cause such a ruckus that a church service was disturbed.

Greasy Valley (a few miles east of Brown's Cheap Store in Lincoln was one of the town's many businesses which benefited from the construction of the Ozark and Cherokee Central Railroad.

Cane Hill): Country people used to grease their shoes before they went to New Hope Church—few had any polish, and the grease made their rough shoes more presentable.

Onda (near Hogeye): A black man who drove teams never said "giddap." Rather, he said, "On da." Some travelers mistakenly thought "on da" was the place's name.

Possum Hollow: Named for the familiar mammal.

Buzzard's Roost (probably an old name for the present locale of Cincinnati): named for the familiar turkey vulture which perches on rock bluffs or on the trees along the slopes.

basic farm prices remained low while interest rates and the prices of consumer goods were relatively high. Simultaneously, the country was shocked by corruption and scandal in both the state and national governments. While farm prices stayed low, huge corporations that were building railroad, oil, and manufacturing empires were conspicuously rolling in wealth. This, plus the lingering memories of defeat in the Civil War, caused many people in Arkansas and elsewhere (especially in the South) to long for basic changes in society. As stated by Berton Henningson, who studied the roots of the farmer movement in northwest Arkansas, "Following the Civil War, three decades of declining farm prices kept rural America in an almost continuous state of rebellion."

After the Civil War, Washington County was swept by a series of social and political movements that were based on the belief that money monopolies—like those owning railroads and controlling the sale of agricultural futures—were squeezing the life out of little people who worked on farms and in factories.

The grandparent of these movements was the Grange, or Patrons of Husbandry. According to the Fayetteville Democrat (March 7, 1874), "Their cause is the cause of right, of justice, the cause of the whole people. Against them there are monopolies, official corruption and the knavery of cliques and rings. . ." The belief among the Grangers that the monopolists and capitalists were getting richer while the farmers were getting poorer seems to have been shared by a fair number of people in Washington County, for the January 17, 1874, edition of the Fayetteville Democrat stated, "Granges of the Patrons of Husbandry are being organized all over Washington County. The 'bone and sinew' of the land are waking up. Let the column move forward." By January 24, 1874, 12 local Granges had been organized in the county (including those at Elm Springs and Farmington). By February 7, there were more: Prairie Grove, Mt. Pleasant, Cane Hill, White Rock, Tuttle, and Gearen. The February 7, 1874, Democrat stated, "It has hardly been two months since the first Grange of the Patrons of Husbandry was organized in this county, and now there are eighteen, with several more about ready to organize. In less than six months the membership will number fifteen hundred or two thousand."

Grangers saw every facet of American business being organized into powerful groups, with the farmers alone remaining individualistic and therefore easily victimized. The Grange proposed legislation to free farmers from corporate rule and tried to organize cooperatives that would give farmers a better profit. According to Granville Davis's study of the Arkansas Grange, "The Grange put the husbandmen in touch with improved methods, thus making for better agriculture; it succeeded in drawing farmers from their shells, thus encouraging social and recreational activities. . .the arousing of farmers from apathy was a monumental achievement."

The Grange movement went into decline in 1875-1876 and almost disappeared by 1880. Many of the Grange aims and views, however, reappeared in the Brothers of Freedom. According to one study of this organization, "The Brothers of Freedom did propose to restore farmers to the status of independent and sturdy yeomen. . .The organization mounted a popular campaign urging farmers to secure their independence through a philosophy of self-help. . .[and to] liberate farmers and their profession from the clutches of capitalistic economic exploitation."

The Brothers merged with the Agricultural Wheel about 1885. The Wheel had begun in Arkansas in 1882 as a society opposed to monopoly

Lincoln

The Lincoln area was first settled in the late 1820s. The first school there was called Black Jack, after the oaks of which it was built. In 1874 Joseph L. Carter set up the first store, then established the first post office July 31, 1884. The first name filed for this new facility was Georgetown, but postal authorities duly informed Carter that a Georgetown, Arkansas already existed. In a Northwest Arkansas Times article Mrs. Burlene Hilton relates her skepticism with the story that Carter simply saw the name "Lincoln" on a box of freight, since Carter "was a Republican from the north." In any event, this name was officially accepted January 13, 1885. Local acceptance, however, was more difficult to get that soon after the end of the Civil War.

A train of the Ozark and Cherokee Central Railroad arrived in Lincoln on January 22, 1902, and trains were soon hauling large quantities of dried and barreled apples. As the apple industry grew so did the town of Lincoln, which was chartered November 1, 1907.

Apples and tourists are still important in Lincoln. During the first weekend in October the Arkansas Apple Festival draws tens of thousands of visitors to the Lincoln square to view arts and crafts, the Apple Harvest Queen pageant, music, a parade, and other activities.

Poultry is another important part of the Lincoln economy. In the 1980 census Lincoln's population was 1,429.

and oppression. In the wake of the Grange's collapse, the Wheel grew rapidly, with 40,000 members after consolidation with the Brothers of Freedom. "Lawyers, teachers, physicians, bankers, brokers, and tradesmen of all classes have their organizations through which they expect to protect their interests. . .and wield a more perfect and powerful influence. Then why not the farmers and laborers adopt the same methods?" asked a prominent Wheeler.

During this same time, another Grange-like farmers' organization, the Farmer's Alliance, was winning converts in Arkansas. In 1888, the Wheel and the Alliance were consolidated. W. F. Dowell of Washington County was the state treasurer, and J. E. Brian, (or Bryan) also of the county, state lecturer.

In 1888 the Wheelers mounted a nearly successful campaign for the Arkansas governorship, coming close to dislodging the Democrats. The vehicle for this challenge was the Union Labor Party, which had been formed nationally in 1887. Union Labor's candidate for governor was ex-Confederate Dr. Charles M. Norwood, who ran against planter James P. Eagle.

On September 16, 1888, the Arkansas Gazette reported that Eagle had carried Washington County by 1,131 votes—a solid majority, but also a clear indication that in Democratic Washington County there had been many protest votes cast for the farmer's candidate.

This defeat hardly ended the farmer's movement in Washington County or elsewhere in Arkansas. In 1891 a movement newspaper was published at Evansville. The Alliance Advocate, edited by C. H. Alexander and assisted by B. J. Brown, proclaimed its devotion "TO THE INTERESTS OF THE FARMERS ALLIANCE AND INDUSTRIAL UNION." The paper had numerous commercial advertisers, indicating that the cause was not so "far out" that it was shunned by business interests.

The columns for volume one, number one, include references to the Washington County Alliance as well as to local sub-alliances within the county. This first issue was sent to 700 people in Washington, Benton, and Crawford Counties, as well as "a great many to our neighbors, the people of the Indian Territory." State Alliance officers listed in the paper included nine officers of the Washington County Alliance.

The county lecturer, J. P. Carnahan of Boonsboro, stated in the paper that, ". . .by a system of vicious class legislation the farming population have been subjected to a system of trusts, combines, monopolies, and favored corporations, until their condition has been reduced to that of debtor, and then the currency of the country contracted until their real debts have been doubled and quadrupled upon them and the same increased proportionally to their creditors."

Contributors to the Alliance Advocate saw an "increasing tide toward pauperism and bankruptcy" and "an irrepressible conflict between the people and corporate power" that could be met only by firm government action on behalf of the common people. The Advocate demanded abolition of national banks and government reforms that would guarantee common people loans at a fixed low rate of interest and an end to government favoritism on behalf of the rich, especially giant corporations like those which owned railroads. "Not half the villainy and robbery committed by railroad manipulation will ever be known," stated the Advocate.

By 1892 the Farmer's Alliance and national labor organizations set up

Prairie Grove

In Centennial History: 1888-1988, George E. Wiswell and Essie Wiswell relate that Thomas Wagnon was the first known white settler at the large spring which was to become central to the town of Prairie Grove. Wagnon traded his claim to Rev. Andrew (Uncle Buck) Buchanan in 1829 for two good sermons. Rev. Buchanan established a church and school soon thereafter.

On December 7, 1862 some Union and Confederate troops fought near Prairie Grove. More than 300 men died in this fierce battle, some 1600 were wounded, and another 600 were counted as missing. The losses were roughly equal for each side, and both claimed victory.

The Prairie Grove post office was established in July, 1867, with Abraham Price as the first postmaster. The town of Prairie Grove was established in 1871 by the stepson of Andrew Buchanan, Col. James P. Neal, who built the first store there. Rogers and Baggett opened a blacksmith and wagon shop in the next year, and they and McPhetridge built a steam powered flour mill in 1876. A plat of the town was made in 1875, then streets and lots were laid out on a grid in 1877. Prairie Grove was incorporated July 9, 1888, and by the next the People's Party as an alternative to the regular national parties. J. B. Weaver was the party's presidential candidate. In Arkansas, J. P. Carnahan of Boonsboro (Cane Hill) ran for governor on the Alliance ticket. The platform for the campaign included the eight hour work day, government ownership of railroads, the graduated income tax, government postal savings banks, direct election of senators, an increase in the money supply, and free silver (a political issue related to making the dollar cheaper and therefore reducing debts). Weaver got over one million votes nationally, and Carnahan over 31,000 in Arkansas (out of 156,000 cast).

Just as the Grange had melted into the Wheel, and the Wheel into the Alliance, and finally the Alliance into the People's Party, after 1892 agrarian discontent manifested itself in the populist movement, which was later associated with the unsuccessful political campaigns of William J. Bryan. The Alliance Advocate itself did not remain long at Evansville. It was moved to Fayetteville in December 1891. There, J. E. Bryan assumed control and changed the name to The Alliance Liberator.

The Old Settlers Picnic

On July 4, 1883, the surviving founders and makers of Washington County gathered at Prairie Grove battlefield for a day of festivity in their honor. A reporter for the Fayetteville Democrat (July 5, 1883) wrote, "In spite of the great dust and heat" 5,000 people crowded "every bus, carriage, vehicle and horse" to get there. "The platform was attractively decorated with flags, banners and the products of Washington County. On the right of the platform sat the choir, consisting of fifty beautiful young ladies of Prairie Grove and Viney Grove under the leadership of Prof. Dolgarouki. . .The Bentonville band delighted the people with new selections. . ."

In the late 1890s, these men gathered with their bicycles at Old Spring Park (now Mock Park) in Prairie Grove.

Colonel J. P. Neal got things started promptly at 9:30 that morning. The old settlers were seated in the front, commencing with those who'd come prior to 1830. In an eloquent tone, Colonel Neal welcomed the crowd, including among the "welcomes" this one, appropriate on a hot July day: "I welcome you to our cold, pure water that is brewed by the hand of the Almighty away down in the mellow earth. . ." He then explained the purpose of the picnic. "We have met today to tell of the early settlement of this county, to recount our early reminiscences, to make a record from which the historian may write the true history of the county. . ."

The official historian of the picnic was J. H. Van Hoose, who spoke for a half hour (part of his speech was printed in the Democrat, July 12, 1883). Among other things, he stated, "I can but contrast this gathering, with its band of music, its fluttering flags and eager faces, with another, which mingled together two flags, with shouts loud and fierce. It was brother to brother in the death grip. Thank God that time has gone. . ."

Of course, speech-making wasn't for everyone. The reporter noted, "There were several 'merry-go-rounds', 'Jenny Linds', or other kinds of 'fuzzy-guzzy' nuisances on the grounds where the rustic youths and maidens did gaily glide round and round. . ." And sometimes the words of some old pioneer, speaking to the crowd in the days before microphones, were virtually drowned by vendors: "Here's your ice cold lemonade, made in the shade. . ."

Relics were displayed. Of special interest to the women "was a calico dress made and worn by Miss Fannie Baker in 1833, cut in Mother Hubbard style and looking very much like the dresses now coming into style. . ."

year had a population of about 500.

Growth of Prairie Grove centered around Mock Spring, which met the town's water needs for many years. Mock Spring and Mock Park are named for Dr. Will H. Mock, who purchased this land in 1901. He removed the buildings from it, then had soil hauled in and trees planted. Dr. Mock encouraged public use of this park while he owned it, then in 1963 he donated it to the city of Prairie Grove.

The Ozark and Cherokee Central Railway brought a significant boost to Prairie Grove and the entire Illinois River Valley. This line connected the Frisco rail lines in Fayetteville, Arkansas, and Okmulgee, Oklahoma and on August 22, 1901 the first train arrived in Prairie Grove. Hundreds of cars of apples, strawberries, and other products were hauled from the area before the tracks were removed, and the train station at Prairie Grove was torn down in 1942.

In 1908 the Daughters of the Confederacy purchased nine acres near the center of the Prairie Grove battlefield, and Battlefield Park was established. Several organizations have made improvements at the park over the years. Several buildings have been moved onto park property, and Hindman Hall Museum was completed in 1965. The park itself has also been expanded, and now exceeds 100 acres.

Every Labor Day weekend Battlefield Park is the scene for the Clothesline Fair, featuring booths of handmade arts and crafts. The first full weekend in every other December a battle re-enactment and authentic Civil War encampment are held at the park. In 1982 the park and surrounding area were used as scenes for the TV miniseries The Blue and the Gray. A short distance west of Prairie Grove is the 32-acre Prairie Grove industrial park.

The population of Prairie Grove grew by 200 persons between 1970 and 1980. The 1980 census showed a population of 1,704.

Circus

In 1870 the Orton Brothers Great Southern Circus visited Fayetteville, apparently the first post-Civil War circus in the county. Like those before the war, this circus was a wagon show. After 1870 circuses visited the county with regularity. Big crowds were attracted by novelty and a chance to take the day off.

Cooper & Jackson's Great European Circus, which hit Fayetteville on September 25, 1880, was described in a Fort Smith paper. "When the band struck up, the work tools were thrown aside, books closed and everybody turned out to view the exciting scene. . .people from the country were in by the hundred. There is, perhaps, no source of amusement so gratifying to all classes as a circus and menagerie; and to hear the quaint soliloquies of the spell-bound citizen as he beholds the wild beasts from distant climes.

Even a century ago, Washington County's citizens were already looking into their history—and before the century was out, there would be more history to recount: telephones, flush toilets, fire hydrants, electric lights, and the system of collecting fresh water and making it available for homes and businesses. We take all of these innovations and inventions for granted today, but they were novel and thrilling in their first days.

The Washington County Telephone Company was organized in 1886. William Campbell wrote that "Lines went via Farmington, Prairie Grove, to Viney Grove, Rhea's Mill and Cincinnati. They were strung on trees and poles." The telephones put in use were declared an infringement on the patents of Bell Telephone, and as a result, most phones and lines on the local system were seized and destroyed. A few people resisted this action, and their phones formed the seed of a system operating in 1891. By 1895, there was a system with 50 customers. According to Peter Harkins, Fayetteville City Council minutes from 1883 indicate a telephone wire was in operation there as early as 1883!

Imagine how people reacted to the first electric lights. "For many years, naught but the heavenly luminaries, or the flicker of fireflies lighted the streets" of Fayetteville, wrote William Campbell. But a few electric lights went on in the town in 1888, powered by a mill.

Water Supply

The introduction of electricity was surely no more novel than the arrival of the flush toilet and the municipal water system. Washington County had long used the springs and rivers, and with a small population, there had formerly been no need for plumbing. But the population was growing. Between 1884 and 1887, "water closets" (flush toilets) were installed in University Hall (Old Main). Prior to 1895, the campus water supply came from wells, cisterns, and springs. In 1895 the town of Fayetteville built a municipal water plant, which was connected to the campus. Sewage from the campus did not go to a wastewater treatment plant (there was none); rather, it was piped just west of campus hill.

The new Fayetteville Water Works was celebrated by J. H. Van Hoose in the Sentinel, May 28, 1895. The machinery was installed on the West Fork of the White River, just southeast of town. Steam-powered pumps drew water from the river and forced it into water mains which carried it two miles to a reservoir atop East Mountain (Mt. Sequoyah). The water then flowed by gravity through five and one half miles of mains below the streets of the town. The new system included 44 fire hydrants. "Already our city authorities have organized a good fire department under the management and control of an energetic chief, Mr. J. F. Mayes, and in case of fire we will have some hope of saving the property, which heretofore would have been doomed to destruction. . .

"Already the work of plumbing is being rapidly done by first-class plumbers, and in a few weeks our business houses and dwellings will be supplied with an abundance of fresh water forever flowing. . ."

Washington County was still a land of corn, wheat, oats, and hogs late in the century. To keep things in perspective, the corn crop in 1899 was roughly three times as valuable as all the fruit crops of the county. In that year, Washington County had 75,000 acres in corn, 48,000 in wheat, and 10,000 in oats. But people were looking ahead. We see some of this in the planning for agricultural shows.

On October 20-21, 1897, a Washington County Fruit and Vegetable Show was planned for the south side of the square in Fayetteville. On

There stood cousin Jake and brother Sandy, cousin Rebecca Jane and sister Sally Ann, each in turn had their say about the roar of the lions and the snort of the elephant. . ."

After the railroad was completed, most circuses came on the train, which meant fewer towns had circuses—only those along the railroad. Circuses were exciting diversions for the people of Washington County, but in the money-lean years after the war some civic leaders saw them as an acute drain on the county. On April 9, 1870, for example, the Fayetteville Democrat warned that "every dollar you contribute to these humbugs, is that much money taken out of the county, and what are you benefited? We think the sooner these humbugs are put down, the better it will be for the country." When Barnum and Bailey played Fayetteville in 1888, the Democrat stated that in one day the show "scooped in about $12,000. . ."

There's no evidence that the Democrat*'s concerns made any difference to people hungry for the awe and glitter of the bigger world.*

(Many more details are available in Harold C. Tedford's article "Circuses in Northwest Arkansas: 1865—1889" in the Arkansas Historical Quarterly, Summer 1973.)

A large Springdale crowd turned out on July 24, 1899, to hear politician William Jennings Bryan speak. The train is at the Emma Avenue crossing on the south side of the street. To the right is a lumber yard and beyond that may be seen the roof of the Seventh Day Adventist Church.

Springdale at the Turn of the Century

"I have just returned from the flourishing, progressive town of Springdale. . .which you will remember as Holcomb's Spring, the former home of old Uncle John Holcomb. Afterwards, a meeting-house was built there and it was then called Shiloh Meeting-House.

"In 1881 the Frisco road was built through Uncle John's corn field, and his son, our old friend Joe, laid the old field out into streets, avenues, alleys, blocks and lots, giving away some of them to the railroad, and today a beautiful town of 1,500 inhabitants, half a dozen church buildings, several nice public school buildings, the finest flouring mill in northwest Arkansas, and the only woolen mill in the state, where are now being manufactured out of the wool from Washington County sheep as fine blankets, linseys, flannels and jeans as are produced by New England, several blocks of elegant two-story brick store houses, two good hotel buildings, a splendid opera hall, and two bank buildings with vaults well filled, are a portion of the permanent improvements made on the old Holcomb farm."

J. H. Van Hoose in the Arkansas Democrat in the late 1890s (the original clipping is number 36 in the Van Hoose scrapbook, Fayetteville Public Library.)

September 23, 1897, the Fayetteville Democrat stated that the streets were constantly blocked by farmers and their wagonloads of fruit heading for the packing houses to be barreled and shipped all over the country. Wine was said to be as "cheap as water." By late November, Springdale alone was said to have shipped 306 railroad cars of apples, worth $75,000-$100,000 to the farmers.

On November 25, 1897, the Democrat reported that J. H. Marler of Boonsboro (Cane Hill) had sold 1,181 barrels of "good shipping apples" from a 10 acre orchard. He received $1.80 per barrel delivered, or $212.58 per acre, including culls. The paper called this the highest yield in Arkansas. It was this kind of success that encouraged outside investment. In 1900 at Bethel Grove (just south of Farmington), the Ozark Fruit Company—a land developing company from St. Louis—bought 1,200 acres and planted 800 of that in apples.

First Annual Poultry Show

On May 27, 1897, the Northwest Arkansas Poultry & Pet Stock Association met at Springdale in the Opera House. The meeting, called to order by President Robinson of Rogers, was well attended by Springdale residents. The purpose of the meeting was to plan for the First Annual Poultry Show. The May 27 Fayetteville Democrat featured an article that called the local poultry business "astonishing"—$1,000 per day in chicken orders were going through one of the banks, and it was thought the other two banks were probably doing as well. The $1,000 did not include the egg business, nor business being transacted in other towns in the county. Nobody living in 1897 could have imagined just how far the chicken business would go in Washington County.

Just as springs had given way to pipes, now as the century came to an end, the dirt roads in the county seat town were giving way to progress. Busy Dickson Street, from College Avenue to the Arkansas Industrial University, was widened from 28 to 55 feet in 1888. In the process the street lost a number of trees, including a gigantic black oak which stood at the corner of Block and Dickson. J. H. Van Hoose wrote that this tree was the original landmark of Prairie Hill, dating back to 1828. In 1899 College Avenue in Fayetteville was being macadamized with stone and lined with culverts (Fayetteville Democrat, October 5, 1899). The paper stated that a few fine shade trees that were growing beyond the sidewalk had to be sacrificed, but the citizens were willing to yield to the inevitable.

In that same year, 1899, Arkansas Industrial University became the University of Arkansas.

Now it was time for a new century. Coming were many more apples and other fruits; a giant food processing industry whose lifeblood would be the productions of the farmers and the "cold, pure water brewed by the hand of the Almighty"; and the final cuttings of the once vast white oak forests. A spreading system of paved highways would carry farm goods to markets and eventually supplant the once almighty railroad.

Chapter Six

Northwest Arkansas City

"I ask myself, 'What makes a man or woman great?'—'Service to fellowmen.' On that basis the housewife and mother ranks with legislators, doctors, builders, or others high in business or professions. In truth, it is usually because of the unselfish service of a woman to her family that a man is able to achieve high position."

—Walter J. Lemke

Washington County got its fourth courthouse soon after the turn of the century. The previous three were located at the center of the Fayetteville square or immediately adjacent to it. The new courthouse faced elegant, tree-lined College Avenue. Soon College was to become Highway 71, the main transportation route in Washington County.

The first courthouse had been a log cabin made of trees cut from the hill that became the square. This log house was followed by two brick structures. Just as the logs were obtained from the hill, the clays for the bricks were obtained nearby. County Judge Millard Berry was presiding in 1904 when the fourth courthouse was constructed. It was the most elegant building of the four. Unlike the others, much of the material from which it was made was obtained outside the county, a symbol that the county had broken from pioneer emphasis on self-sufficiency and was becoming integrated into a wider world.

Architect Rene F. Diaz of the University of Arkansas has written that the towers in the 1904 building were symbols of wealth and power, contributing "a sense of establishment and stability. . ." to county residents proud of what had been achieved since 1828. "The Washington County Courthouse is a 1904 Victorian reflection of the Pittsburgh Courthouse, and can claim the bell tower of St. Mark's Square in Venice as the source of inspiration for its central tower."

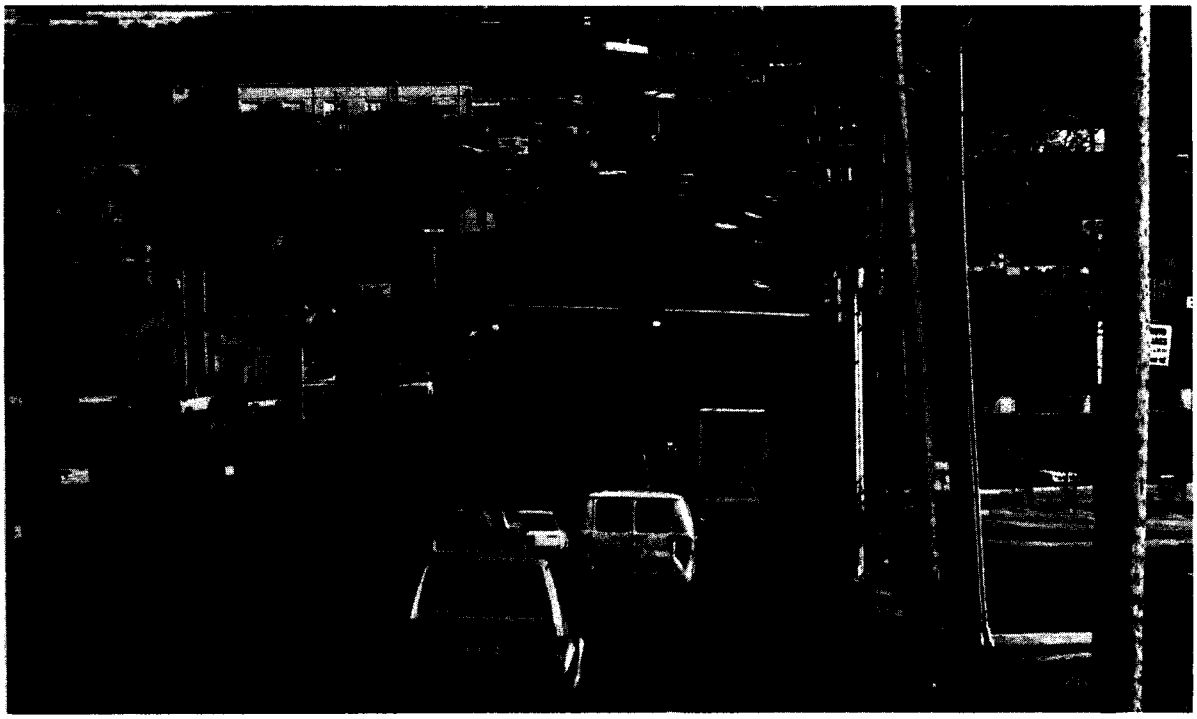
The 1904 courthouse had become a reality two decades after the railroad was built through the county. The railroad tied Washington County more firmly than ever to the outside world. Judge Berry's courthouse reflected this new reality. Washington County was wealthy enough in 1904 that the citizens were willing to shop around for materials to fit their vision of the county government's house. Little Rock architect Charles Thompson was hired to design the building.

At the time of its construction, a writer for the Fayetteville Democrat referred to the 1904 courthouse as a "work of art. . .We could consistently say that architecture is a visible melody. This is the view of the poet who exclaims 'How beautiful!' rather than the utilitarian who inquires 'Of what use?'. . .there is no doubt that the intelligence and culture of a people will be reflected by their architecture which combines the useful and the beautiful. . ."

If anyone needed visible evidence that Washington County was breaking away from the past and launching itself stylishly forward into a new century, here was a seat of government that spoke for itself.

Portrait of Northwest Arkansas City

The new courthouse presided over a county that was still mainly rural, but its towns were growing. The population of Washington County in the 1980s has exceeded 100,000, nearly tripling the total of 34,000 in 1900. At the turn of the century, Fayetteville's 4,000 and Springdale's 1,250 residents made them the leading towns in the county.



Highway 71B, the "main street of Northwest Arkansas City." (John Wampler, Northwest Arkansas Times)

While eighty percent of the county's population in 1900 lived on farms in rural areas, today most of the county's 100,000 residents live in the sprawling urban complex of Springdale-Fayetteville and secondarily in or near the county's small incorporated towns. According to 1980 population figures, Fayetteville's population was 36,608 and Springdale's 23,458. Population totals for other incorporated towns were: Prairie Grove (1,708), West Fork (1,526), Lincoln (1,422), Farmington (1,283), Elm Springs (781), Greenland (622), Tontitown (615), Elkins (579), Johnson (519), Goshen (404), and Winslow (247).

In 1900, the students of the University of Arkansas numbered 642 or about two percent of the county's population. By 1970, nearly 12,000 students contributed 15 percent of the county's population.

Confederate Vets

There were still 166 Confederate soldiers in Washington County who were receiving pensions as late as 1931 (Flashback, August 1971), but the number had so dwindled and the remaining vets were so old that the annual veterans reunion at Prairie Grove was discontinued a few years later.

An Arkansas map shows that Springdale-Fayetteville and half of the small incorporated towns are located in the corridor of U. S. Highway 71 (and the recently redesignated old 71, now 71B). Highway 71 follows the route of the Frisco railroad as it was constructed in the early 1880s. University students used to come to town on the trains, but today they travel 71 in their cars. In the past, the county's great wealth in timber and millions of bushels of apples and other fruits were shipped to national markets by train. By the 1930s, trucks were regularly hauling the agricultural productions of the county to distant markets over a newly paved Highway 71.

Feed mills punctuate the landscape near Highway 71 in Springdale, forming an Arkansas poultry skyline. Heavily-loaded trucks from the mills carry feed to poultry farmers whose long, low chicken houses are located in the rural areas of the county. Several sprawling poultry processing plants that employ more than 1,000 workers each—Campbell

Road conditions in Washington County were far from ideal when automobiles first came to the area. Rutted dirt tracks turned to quagmires during wet weather, and directional signs and road markers were almost nonexistent.

Anti-Horse Thief Association (A. H. T. A.)

According to William Campbell, "A. H. T. A. was a very active organization here for years when horse thieves had lots of temptations." According to Virgil Talbot, local A. H. T. A. groups were called sub-orders. The 1911 state convention was held at Fayetteville, and the Fayetteville sub-order, with 157 members, was the largest represented. Summers, with 72, was second. A national convention was held in Fayetteville on October 8, 1915.

"From what my uncle told me, the members were resigned to stop all stealing—horses, mules, cattle, hogs, or any livestock or property (*Springdale News, December 21, 1986, 3A). According to Talbot, "The days of the familiar sign with the red and black horse and rider inside a horseshoe and the words 'Protected by A. H. T. A.'. . .have long since passed. The group became the Anti Thief Association in the age of the car, then faded away."

Milton D. Rafferty, author of The Ozarks Land and Life, refers to Highway 71 through northwest Arkansas as Northwest Arkansas City. "The main street (U. S. 71) of Northwest Arkansas City is about twenty-five miles long. It begins just south of the Missouri state line and leads southward through the sprawling retirement town of Bella Vista, then through Bentonville, Rogers, and Springdale to Fayetteville." We could add Greenland and West Fork, south of Fayetteville, and small communities immediately west of the Springdale-Fayetteville area, such as Farmington, Johnson, and Tontitown.

Highway 71 and 71B

"U. S. 71 is fronted on both sides by almost continuous strings of businesses in more or less random order. . .the traffic. . .through the northwest Arkansas strip has no ebb and flow but instead is the frenzied scramble of a big city string street." The average daily traffic count on Highway 71B totaled 27,900 cars at Springdale in 1987.

The mother thread of Northwest Arkansas City, Highway 71, came to Washington County in the age when horses and mules were giving way to the car. The first automobiles appeared in the county around 1905. By 1924, the price for horses and mules had dropped sharply while a Ford runabout could be purchased for $260.

In 1905, a Texan drove a two-cylinder Model F Buick into Fayetteville (Flashback, August 1961). In 1907, three Ford Model K Runabouts were shipped to the railroad station at Pierce City, Missouri, and driven from there to Fayetteville by their owners. The event was publicized in the Fayetteville Democrat and a crowd turned out to cheer their arrival (Northwest Arkansas Times, June 20, 1976, p. D1).

Traffic was picking up on the land, and now it began to pick up in the skies. The first airplane was surely as curious and unbelievable as the first cars. Roberta Fulbright, who would become editor of the Fayetteville Daily Democrat, was at the Washington County Fairgrounds, then located on Razorback Road in Fayetteville, when a Pusher biplane flown by Glenn Martin made a flight on October 5, 1911. The plane was shipped in on the railroad and assembled for the flight (Flashback, November 1972). A committee was organized in 1929 to get an airfield at Fayetteville. Dr. N. F. Drake donated $3,500 for the land, and in 1947 the airfield was named for him. This field was the scene of considerable military activity in World War II. After the war, airplanes were put to work for football and chickens. In 1948, an amazing 127 planes landed for the Arkansas-Baylor football game (Northwest Arkansas Times, December 30, 1950). On April 12, 1946, the Times reported, "The Future Is Here," announcing that for the first time baby chicks hatched in the eastern United States one day had been flown to Springdale the following day, opening new growth possibilities in the poultry industry.

The forerunner of Highway 71 was a wagon road that was improved under the auspices of the county government with state support. "Under provision of the Alexander Road Law, passed March 30, 1915, property owners along the hundred-year trails to Goshen and through the passes of the Boston Range southward to Winslow, petitioned for a highway. A majority signing, Road District No. 2 was formed. Bonds were sold, and work pushed to completion, 1916-1917," wrote William Campbell in his history of Fayetteville.

Taking to the Skies

The first airplane flight made in Washington County took place at the Washington County Fair on October 5, 1911. (Washington County Observer)

In April of 1946, John Tyson (left) received two thousand chicks from Ray Ellis, manager of South Central Air Transport, Inc. The day-old chicks were hatched in New Hampshire by the originator of the Hampshire Red strain and shipped by air to Springdale. The pilot R. H. Truax watched from the cockpit as the exchange was made. (Ray Ellis)

The first airplane in Springdale was owned by Bryan Work. It was a 1930 model with a 3-cylinder, 30-horsepower Szkeley engine. Work sold a half interest in the plane to Eddie Warner, who was later an inspector for the Civil Aviation Authority (now the Federal Aviation Authority). (Bryan Work)

According to historian Robert G. Winn, "In March 1920, the first workers for the new road were moved from the state penitentiary. . .Work began at the Crawford-Washington County line and proceeded northward. The first major undertaking was to blast and widen what had been a rough, rutted wagon road. . ." Free workers later replaced convicts on the highway work.

Weather conditions permitting, a car could travel to Fort Smith in three to four hours by June 1924 (Northwest Arkansas Times, January 21, 1969). The grading and other work was a tremendous improvement. Next, the road was graveled. According to the Fayetteville Daily Democrat (October 14, 1924), "The work of laying the dangerous stretches of slopes and curves is to start at once." A rock crusher was starting up immediately. Native stone gathered from along the right-of-way furnished the base, with creek gravel and clay forming a surface over which the gravel was laid. In the late 1920s the route of the Canada-to-New Orleans Jefferson Highway was shifted from eastern Oklahoma to western Arkansas. Under the new designation, the highway was eligible for paving. Part of the old road was re-routed. The official opening of the paved road was August 15, 1930.

Smallpox at Elm Springs

Smallpox created panic in Elm Springs Township during January and February 1914. The disease was brought to Washington County by a family which had visited Mexico in late 1913 and early 1914. The bad news is that 10 of the 26 people who became sick died. The good news is that 800 to 1,000 people were vaccinated, stopping the spread of smallpox. Of those who died, only one had ever been vaccinated, and he had been vaccinated in 1864 (Flashback, November 1957).

Highway 71 was widened during the 1950s. The tremendous population and industrial growth in northwest Arkansas, coupled with heavy north-south traffic, have made Highway 71 between Fayetteville and Alma one of the most dangerous stretches of highway in Arkansas. As a result, design work started on a new highway from the Missouri line to Alma during the 1970s. Most of this four-lane, interstate highway was finished between Fayetteville and the Missouri line by summer 1987. At the same time, work on the route from Fayetteville to Alma was just beginning. It is thought this southern stretch of the new highway will require 10 years for completion.

Major projects like this new highway open the door for other changes, including damage to water and air quality, disruption of the ranges of endangered animals like the Eastern cougar, disruption of local traffic patterns, and displacement of farm families. Some local citizens opposed the new highway, fearing it would lead to uncontrolled growth in northwest Arkansas and even more traffic congestion. Money was collected in the Fayetteville-Springdale area for a lawsuit against the highway based upon allegations that the environmental impact statement was inadequate. This suit was dismissed in Federal court.

World Wars

Washington County suffered horribly in the Civil War, with hundreds of deaths and massive destruction of property. The two World Wars were different. There was no fighting inside the county and therefore no property destruction. However, residents went off to fight and over 200 never returned home. Influenza brought into Washington County by World War I caused widespread illness and many deaths among civilians. In addition, resources of the county were mobilized to aid the national war efforts.

In 1920, the Marion Chapter of the Daughters of the American Revolution commissioned artist William Steene to paint a 10 by 40 foot mural in the Washington County courthouse to honor the 54 Washington County men who died in World War I, 1917-1918. The central figure in the painting is an angel of victory representing the womanhood of America and Washington County. The angel holds two tablets, upon which are inscribed the names of the 54 men. The World War I memorial mural was restored in 1976 by artist Gertrude Gump. It can be viewed today in the courthouse.

Founder of VFW—Fayetteville Resident, James Carrollton Putnam

James Carrollton Putnam was a salty veteran of the Spanish-American War and and Indian fighter who scouted with "Buffalo Bill" Cody under the command of a young lieutenant named John J. Pershing. He also founded the Veterans of Foreign Wars.

By the time he moved his family to Fayetteville, in 1939, Putnam had retired three times from military service, worked on the Panama Canal, was a deputy sheriff in Oklahoma, and served as Missouri State Representative from Howell County. (He was known as an advocate of the "Whipping Post" for punishment of bootleggers).

It was Putnam's return to Columbus, Ohio as a veteran of the Spanish-American War that led to his involvement in the formation of the American Veterans of Foreign Service. It began as a small group of 13 veterans, with Putnam as their chosen leader. The group received its charter from the state of Ohio, October 11, 1899. The organization grew rapidly, and in 1913 became the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States (VFW).

Putnam chose Fayetteville for retirement because the community had a university for his children (Helen Putnam Blackwell, his daughter, still resides in Fayetteville—his son, William Putnam, resides in California), a veteran's hospital, and a national cemetery.

James Carrollton Putnam died October 11, 1956 at the Veteran's Hospital in Fayetteville and was buried at the National Cemetery in Fayetteville.

The VFW has grown from the original 13 to an organization that boasts nearly three million members today. In Putnam's words: "The Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States will live on as long as the United States is a world power, or until human nature changes and the dove of peace actually presides over the affairs of men."

One of the names on the mural is that of Clarence E. Beely, the first Springdale lad to die in the war. Springdale's American Legion Post is named after him. Posts in other towns were similarly named for local men.

The University campus became a military camp on June 15, 1918. According to William Campbell's history of Fayetteville (p. 50), "The first contingent arriving was 153 men, and soon there were 300 quartered in the dormitories. . .The grounds were picketed and for the first time in the University's history, one had to have a pass to get in. . ." Troops were shipped out and new troops came in. "The campus became a beehive of activity and drill. Sentries were doubled, and the city waterworks posted. Induction of the 800 men now on the campus was a very impressive occasion." Influenza also came with the war. On October 9, 1918, schools, theatres, churches, classes at the University and elsewhere were all suspended by public health order. According to Campbell, "There were 54 girls ill at one time in Carnall Hall. The barracks and infirmary were full of sick men. Every available nurse and doctor in the city worked day and night. Many died."

The epidemic also reached the rural areas. A memoir of the Round Mountain area (Flashback, February 1986, p. 16) states, "all of our family were sick at one and the same time. No one was able to care for anyone else. Fortunately, none of us died. Dozens of people in our area did, however." Schools were allowed to reopen on November 2. The epidemic returned in January and February 1920. Again, all public gatherings were banned, and the number of cases reported increased to more than 100 (Northwest Arkansas Times, June 14, 1960).

Once again, Washington County residents answered the call in World

The Washington County Red Cross was organized in Fayetteville in 1917-1918 as a result of World War I. There were 2,800 members out of a county population of 34,000 in 1918. The local group made surgical dressings during the war, provided relief for service families, and assisted servicemen passing through the county (Flashback, May 1978).

The Red Cross provided tremendous service during World War II. In 1943, for example, there were 2,258 volunteer workers. There was a canteen corps, helpers at the rationing board, a loan closet that supplied sheets, hospital gowns, etc., a motor corps at work in a county with little gasoline or motorized transport, a disaster committee, and the still-familiar water safety program—to name a few of the Red Cross wartime services.

The vital blood donation program began in 1948. The blood used in all local hospitals is furnished by the Red Cross. Red Cross also provided assistance to families in both the Korean and Vietnam wars.

Changes on the Farm, 1910-1970

The vast majority of the citizens of Washington County lived on farms at the turn of the century. Data from the U. S. Census for 1910 (based upon information from 1909) provides a look at agriculture in the county nearly eight decades ago.

Today's pasture land was once planted in row crops. Cereals including corn, oats, and wheat were grown on 103,988 of the county's 248,438 acres of improved farmland. Of this total, 68,923 acres of corn were produced mainly as livestock feed. The 13,276 acres of wheat were grown primarily as a cash crop. The corn, wheat, and oats accounted for half of the $2 million in total farm production in the county in 1909. Hay and forage were grown on 27,703 acres, valued at $290,883.

There were 1.7 million apple trees in the county in 1909, which produced a harvest of 514,950 bushels. Spring was apple blossom time; in fall, roads to the railroad shipping points were clogged with wagons, and the apple evaporators were running full blast. There were also over 200,000 peach trees that year. Nearly 56,000 pounds of grapes were harvested in the county in 1900. This figure tripled by 1909. Fruits, including apples, peaches, strawberries, etc., were valued at $353,484, making fruit production one of the leading sources of cash income that year.

Farm work was not mechanized at the turn of the century. The 1910 census reported 10,281 horses and 4,994 mules. In the era before the car and truck, these animals provided the power for personal travel, hauling logs out of the forest, and pulling wagons. Draft animals were employed in tread mills and for pulling plows, harvesters, and other pieces of farm equipment. In addition to these draft animals, livestock included 19,712 cattle, 7,103 sheep, and 22,268 pigs. Chickens, of course, also lived on farms at this time, but not in the numbers associated with the modern poultry industry.

Manufacturing-industrial activity in the county was closely related to the farm or to exploitation of timber resources. Two common industrial operations, canneries and fruit evaporators, serviced the fruit and vegetable industry. Small canneries and family-size evaporators were common throughout the county. Timber hauling was an important source of revenue for the Frisco. Plants that fashioned the county's hardwoods into finished products were mainly located in Fayetteville. In Area farmers supplied produce to the Kimmons-Walker Company, purportedly the largest evaporator in the country, located on the southwest corner of Emma and Park Avenues in Springdale. (Austin Cravens)

1900, there were also 76 blacksmith shops, 22 flour and grist mills, and 12 sawmills. Since the population in the county at this time was dispersed, rather than concentrated in towns, these businesses were found at crossroads throughout the county. The 132 manufacturing establishments listed for the county in 1900 employed 336 people, which means these businesses were usually small operations with only a few workers. (The census figures may not include those members of farm families employed for a few months on a seasonal basis in canneries.)

Agricultural Production

By 1969, the county's wheat crop had declined to slightly over 10,000 bushels, far below its former glory. And, of course, the mills that had once processed the wheat were deteriorating.

Other big changes are noted in these data. The once robust crops of corn and oats which fed the county's hogs, horses, and mules were in decline. The corn crop fell to 14,000 bushels in 1969, and almost no oats were being grown in the county. After 1920, the number of horses and mules working in the county began to fall, declining to fewer than 2,000 by 1969. The mechanical farm tractor made its appearance in the decade 1920-1930. The numbers of these machines increased steadily as the numbers of horses and mules declined.

The A. J. Phillips peach shed.
(Lockwood and Annabel Searcy)

The fruit industry collapsed in this period. By 1969, neither apples nor peaches had much commercial importance. Only four acres of strawberries were reported in the county in 1969. Tomatoes continued to decline. Of the crops that had made northwest Arkansas famous as "The Ozark Fruit Empire," only grapes were holding their own in the late 1960s.

The initial spurt of growth in broiler production was noticeable in the decade 1930-1940. County production surpassed 80 million birds annually by the late 1960s and over 100 million during the 1980s. Cattle production increased slowly throughout this period, reaching over 100,000 head in the county by 1969. There was also a small dairy industry—enough at least that the W. R. Felker cheese factory opened at Springdale in September 1928 and within a year had paid area farmers over $80,000 for milk.

The end of field crops like corn, wheat, and oats caused land to revert to forest or in many cases to become pastures. Poultry houses take little space on a farm. Many broiler growers began to raise cattle on land that had once supported field crops.

Legendary Maud Duncan published the Winslow American and was Arkansas' first woman licensed as a pharmacist. She came by her feminism naturally since her mother, Virginia Dunlap, was the first woman to vote in the state after ratification of the 19th amendment in 1920.

Women

As Walter Lemke suggested in the quotation at the beginning of this chapter, the role of women as homemakers is the often unsung support for the more often visible accomplishments of men. But women in Washington County have had numerous visible accomplishments as well.

Writing in Flashback (March 1954), Dr. Ruth Ellis Lesh told the stories of several early women doctors in the county. Dr. Nina Hardin was one of the first three graduates from the Arkansas Medical College and was physician-nurse at the University of Arkansas Infirmary, 1910-1920. Dr. Phoebe Lininger of Springdale was admitted to the Washington County Medical Society in 1905. She maintained an office in Springdale as well as a farm. Dr. Ella Sturdivant was associated for several years with Dr. Lininger before moving her practice to Cave Springs in Benton County.

Women in the United States won the right to vote with the ratification of the Nineteenth Amendment in 1920. According to historian Robert G. Winn, Mrs. Virginia C. Dunlap of Winslow was the first woman to pay poll tax in the state of Arkansas after women won the right to vote. Her daughter, Maud Dunlap Duncan, was the first woman in Arkansas licensed as a pharmacist and was editor of the local weekly paper, The Winslow American.

The Dunlap-Duncan team fostered what came to be called Winslow's "petticoat government" in the years 1925-1927. Maud Duncan ran for mayor. The aldermen (women) chosen to run with her were all women of experience. One was in business, one operated a summer hotel, one had taken over her husband's hardware business upon his death, another had operated a business before her marriage, another was a cashier at the Bank of Winslow, and the last was the town's postmistress. Winn wrote that their capable management of the then bustling town won over doubtful men and brought Winslow enormous favorable publicity.

Upon the death of her husband in 1923, Roberta Fulbright became publisher of the county's leading newspaper, the Fayetteville Daily Democrat. By 1931 the paper was being called "one of the best dailies in the state, outside large cities." Fulbright owned the paper until her death in 1953. It had then become the Northwest Arkansas Times (Flashback, February 1966). Roberta Fulbright was mother and chief supporter of her son, J. William Fulbright, University of Arkansas president and later distinguished United States Senator.

Beginning in 1933, Roberta Fulbright wrote a column of comment called "As I See It." Her column for November 9, 1935, gives a flavor of her thinking. "Men always boast a man-made world. Women really made it and let the men play the big parts, for they can't function without applause, although I contend women have the leading parts after all, minus the glamor. If you can find a bigger part than bringing the race into the world and sustaining it! We are glad that some men are willing to let women figure in their books, in their lives, and in their world. My idea is that it takes two to make the life circle complete and no apologies are due from either side."

Lessie Stringfellow Read, a native of Temple, Texas, became Fulbright's editor-in-chief in 1924 and remained with the paper until 1942. In 1920, she became national press chairman of the General Federation of Women's Clubs. She also contributed articles to various national magazines.

University of Arkansas faculty members has had a very positive impact upon the lives of people in Washington County. Eleanor Lincoln Johnson, whose late husband Thomas Johnson was a professor of botany and microbiology, perfectly illustrates this spirit of generosity. She was born in China, where her parents were missionaries. Before her marriage to Professor Johnson, she pursued a career as an artist. The Johnsons moved to Fayetteville in 1952. Instead of retreating into the quiet life of a faculty spouse, Eleanor jumped into community service with a vigor similar to her husband's research on the lichens. She has served on the Washington County Juvenile Court Advisory Committee, the Fayetteville Community Development Committee, and the board of the Washington County Economic Opportunity Agency and has helped organize a cooperative for artists, etc. In 1987 she was publicly honored for 13 years of service in the Elderly Nutrition Program (helping deliver hot meals and commodities to elderly shut-ins) as well as other assistance to elderly shut-ins.

The liberal feminist movement of the 1970s had some impact on the University of Arkansas campus. A Women's Center began on the campus in 1972 with a $500 grant from Associated Women Students. At first the Center was located off campus, but in 1976 it received funding through student services and moved on campus. A number of special interest groups were involved in the center, the oldest being Problem Pregnancy, Rape Crisis, Women's Health, Feminist Press (publishers of the tabloid paper Hard Labor), and Razordykes, a lesbian-feminist group. In 1978-1979, the center was beset by various political issues. Some of these issues were the result of men who felt threatened by politically active women, and others involved conflict among women holding conservative and liberal views on issues. The Women's Center closed, but women of all political views remain active on the campus.

A Book of Her Own

Historians love diaries. They often provide the very personal views of ordinary folks, views of events that are otherwise unavailable. Olive Fincher (Stevens) of Fayetteville kept a diary during much of her life. Here are excerpts from some of her entries for 1913, when she was 21 years old. They cover an eventful five months when Olive lost her job as a Fayetteville telephone operator and became a teacher at Johnson. In her diary she weaves together family events, such as a birthday party and her cat catching a mouse, and public events, such as a "never to be forgotten" hanging and Good Roads Day in which local men pitched in to repair roads.

The girls at the telephone office are talking of going on a strike but I guess it is all talk.

Sunday, July 3, 1913

Well we went with Uncle Bobs and Uncle Dillards about 10 or 11 miles out to the river today and there we met Uncle Luthers' folks there was 20 of us ate dinner together and of all the good stuff to eat you ever heard of we had it, but we are all tired to death tonight mama has the headache very bad.

This has been an awful hot day. We had two cases of soda pop to drink and ice water and lemonade. One of our four 2nd cousins was married today. The Rev. Mr. Babcock rode into town with us, it was after 8 o'clock when we got home.

Monday, July 4, 1913

This is Grandma Finchers birthday she is 75 yrs. old today but we had the dinner yesterday. One of our operators (Ruth Snoden) at the office was operated on for appendicitic this morning that cast a gloom over the whole force for a while, but we are so glad she is getting along nicely. Miss Forgey is taking her place at the board. We got quite a write up in the daily paper about our reunion yesterday.

July 6

We had planned on going to the country today, so just after mother and I got here came little Ruby Qualls to say we were going to the river. So we got Ella up and she and I bustled around and went up to Aunt Kates. We started at 8:20 and by 10:08 we were located at our camp. After resting a little while we picked a few berries and then got dinner we had a good dinner I just ate and ate.

This afternoon before the folks got out of the swimming hole it begun to thunder and lightening very bad we got out of there in a hurry drove to a barn and got out of the rain. Came on home after rain.

Mrs. Strain gave the operators a box of candy this evening with her comps. No mail today. Mrs. Tunstill's funeral was this morning. All the stores are to be closed tommorow and it is a holiday all over the state appointed by the Gov. as good road day but I'm afraid it won't be a success in Washington County.

Wednesday, September 3, 1913

Well I enjoyed going through the square this morning, the kid band was playing a lively tune and there was a great crowd, I think the two days of road working will be a success after all. We were busy all day. Tonight Ella, papa, and I went up to Uncle Bob's a while. This has been an awful hot day. I wore my new dress this afternoon.

September 4, 1913

Gee I was sick this morning every few minutes I would get sick enough to vomit. We have been busy all day most all the stores were open for a while but a number of men went to work on the roads again.

Invitations for the reception to be given at the telephone office Fri. from 2 to 10 are being sent out today and everything is hustle bustle.

A never to be forgotten day in Fayetteville Ark. Omar Davis the boy who killed a girl last spring was hanged here in the court house yard this morning at 6:39 and of course the town has been in a great stir all day.

September 12, 1913

Well! as a preacher would say this has been a great day in the house of the Lord so has it been in the Telephone office. I don't know what we would have done if it had been a nice day for there was such a crowd and so much noise that we couldn't hear anything as it was, but anyway everybody loves the chief and I don't blame them. It has rained all day. Our building looked lovely with the pretty flowers and furnishings. Sister wore her blue lawn and looked very well she feels better tonight. As I went to work I mailed two cards and bought Baby a dimes worth of candy.

Joe Bob caught a little mouse tonight.

Tuesday, October 7, 1913

Another nice day. We are rather on a deal of renting another house. Papa is still not doing any work gee I'm blue. It is all decided tonight, we will move to the Jarmau property on Rock St. Thursday. It seems too good to be true think of living in an 8 room house with everything nice.

Wednesday, October 8, 1913

Well I've felt like crying all day and when I came back to work at 3:30 I got a chance and I certainly put in a good time.

Miss Venable (chief operator) said I was vacation operator and the company was going to lay off one girl so I was the one. I can't get over it just as I'm getting settled down, here goes again. It is awful. But all things are for the best and I'm praying that I never have to go back to the office. Of course we won't move tomorrow.

Saturday, November 1, 1913

I had a talk with the neighbor across the street. I got as mad as thunder. We came home at 9 tonight. It clouded up this afternoon and looked like it might rain. Have signed the contract to teach a country school [at Johnson].

Thursday, November 6, 1913

I had a lovely ride up here to Springdale from Fayetteville. The train was due at 4:10 but was a few minutes late. Eicher met me and I went with her over to the auditorium where we stayed quite a while, then came out to her home.

They have a nice home and my room is lovely they have two dear children Rachel, 7, (she will go to school to me) and Herbert, 3. We couldn't see the building very well but it looks nice. I tried to call Sister about 8 o'clock but couldn't get the Fayetteville line.

Friday

This morning we went up to the school house about nine we waited quite a while there was 15 pupils came then Mr. Eicher called them to order and talked mighty nice to them for a few minutes we then told them what books they were to buy and sent them home. It looked very much like raining but cleared off and we went to town this afternoon got back late but went back for the "Tom Thumb Wedding" which was real good.

I'm doing fine have met a number of people among them two old batchelors.

Women helping women and their children has also been an important theme in Washington County. The Project for Victims of Domestic Violence, often called the battered women's shelter, is a sub-agency of the Economic Opportunity Agency of Washington County. It began in the fall of 1978 with a grant of approximately $3,500 from the Washington County Quorum Court. Additional money was raised through matching grants and other fund-raising activities. In the first 18 months of operation, the project provided shelter and housing for 113 women and 200 children who had suffered the abuse of domestic violence. Most shelter staff have been women, but the benefits of resolving severe family disputes accrue to all citizens of the county.

Unique Black Cultural Heritage

The waters of Big Spring pour from a cavern eroded in limestone that outcrops on a hillside below the Washington County courthouse. The McGarrah family settled there even before there was a land called Washington County. Big Spring's flow joins another spring-fed creek, and the two pour southward through the hollow below the courthouse. Here, in a sylvan setting below the courthouse, is a cluster of roughly 120 homes, three churches, and a tavern that form a neighborhood populated by the black people who are natives of the county (this does does not include black University students). Most of these houses are wooden structures with gabled roofs. The foundations are mostly of field stone, and each foundation is constructed so as to level the house on the sloping hillside land where most of these houses are built.

One of the most distinctive structures, located at 105 N. Willow, is wholly constructed of stone gathered from the creek and surrounding hillside. This is the Reverend James W. Webb place, now the home of the Ricks family. The house was built in 1893 by Webb and his wife Emma. Webb was pastor at the St. James Baptist Church. The house includes two stories and a basement. Besides providing living quarters for the family, Emma Webb ran a cafe there, and she was probably the one responsible for renting rooms to students. Dances were sometimes held upstairs. This building is not as architecturally grand as some structures in Washington County that have received special historical interest designations, but it certainly deserves recognition.

At least as early as 1928 there was an organization of black women called the Modern Priscillas, for the Priscillas were responsible for a float in the July 4, 1928, parade which marked the 100th anniversary of the founding of Fayetteville and Washington County. In his Stitches In Time, A Legacy of Ozark Quilts, Michael Luster wrote that Fayetteville's black Priscillas numbered about a dozen members, who met in one another's homes on Friday evenings "to talk, sew, and get away from their husbands and dishes." The women sometimes made communal quilts. The only surviving one known is "an applique of butterflies similar to those seen hanging on clotheslines at roadside stands throughout the Ozarks. There is one small difference: the Priscillas' butterflies have brightly colored wings, but the bodies are black." Like the native stone Webb house, this quilt is a unique part of the county's heritage.

The Priscillas were responsible for the float, but the man "in charge of arrangements" for the float was George Ballard. He was born in Cincinnati, Arkansas, on January 4, 1882, the son of Ike and Lee Ballard. He married Rosetta Dart on March 6, 1902. As was the case with so many black people who once lived in western Washington County, the Ballards moved to Fayetteville. They lived in a three-room board house covered with gray tarpaper on East Mountain Street just east of the courthouse.

KKK

In 1922, 125 people were initiated under the fiery cross of the Ku Klux Klan in Fayetteville. The Washington County Sheriff thanked the Klan for help in law enforcement work (Northwest Arkansas Times, June 14, 1960). A KKK convention at Fayetteville October 16, 1924, featured a torch light parade from the University campus to the Fayetteville square by 1,200 Klansmen and a smaller number of Klanswomen. There was also a barbecue and fireworks display that attracted 2,000 members and visitors (Fayetteville Daily Democrat, October 16 and 17, 1924).

In April 1925 a small group of Klan members who were seniors at the University said they would not attend the Baccalaureate address that was to be delivered by a Catholic priest from Ft. Smith (Arkansas Traveler, May 7, 1925). On April 15 the 600 KKK members attending a conference in Fayetteville also voted their opposition to the priest's appearance. When told by the University that their diplomas would be withheld if they boycotted the service, the seniors attended. The KKK was inactive by 1928.

Ballard became known to the local public in the 1920s through publication of his poems by Lessie Stringfellow Read, editor of the Fayetteville Daily Democrat. According to Read, "George goes to sleep and when he sleeps he dreams and when he awakes his dreams are so real that he gets up from bed and by the light of a flickering lamp writes on his typewriter as his remembered dreams dictate to him. He loves poetry and reads all of it that he can get."

Read facilitated the publication in 1928 of a poetry collection titled Ozark Ballards which he dedicated "To members of the colored race who thus may be encouraged to seek self-expression even in a crude way, it being believed that the poorest self-expression is better than none; and to all white friends who have lent help and encouragement. . ." The $200 raised through sales of the book was used to pay off a note on the Ballard house. A library organized by Read for use by black students at Henderson School in Fayetteville was named for him. George Ballard died on December 4, 1951, and is buried in Oaks Cemetery. Rosetta remained for a time in Fayetteville, then moved to Oklahoma.

Kin in spirit to the poet Ballard was a black musical group. In the late 1920s or early 1930s, the Black Diamond Serenaders played ragtime music, according to musician Bill Luther who grew up in Fayetteville (Flashback, November 1986, pp. 16-17). "They had no piano, of course, but they went around to different places and performed."

An important landmark of Washington County's black community, Lincoln School, is no longer standing. In 1937, Henderson School for blacks had been traded for land where Lincoln School was erected, just one block south of the Webb place on Willow Avenue. After segregated schools were declared illegal in the mid-1950s, black students and teachers were integrated into the Fayetteville schools. Lincoln School was abandoned, used for a time as a community center, then torn down. The Willow Heights public housing project was constructed on the Lincoln School grounds in 1971.

The migration of black people from rural Washington County into Fayetteville enriched the growing town. At 226 East 6th Street there is the frame Parker family home. Around 1920, Otis James Parker and his wife Anna Berthina Parker moved from the Baldwin/Harris area east of Fayetteville. Otis was a farmer who knew blacksmithing as well as how to care for sick animals. Anna was a pioneer black school teacher. They moved to Fayetteville in order to improve opportunities for themselves and their children. Anna raised 12 children and Otis became famous in Fayetteville for his ability to break horses. His services as a veterinarian were much in demand. Otis also worked at the Mountain Inn, Piggly Wiggly on Dickson Street, and slaughtered animals.

They did so well that all of the 12 children who wanted to go to college eventually did so. None of the children remained in Fayetteville. Bernice Mayes, a Parker who today lives in the old family place, says the children left "because there were no jobs or opportunities, and Otis didn't want his kids working in other people's kitchens—he wanted something better for them."

Fayetteville's black community is proud of what the Parker children did—one became a colonel in the army, another a school teacher, yet another a policeman, nurse, etc. The Parker home, which is still standing, preserves an architectural heritage associated with working people, rather than the town's rich and wealthy citizens. Architectural examples associated with working people deserve recognition and historical protection.

Anna Berthina Parker and her husband Otis sent all of the members of their large family to college. Anna was also a pioneer black school teacher. (Bernice K. Mayes)

William Edward Reynolds, born March 7, 1911, weighed 13 pounds at birth and therefore throughout his life carried the nickname Jimbo, for the baby elephant in the Barnum & Bailey Circus. Jimbo grew up in Ft. Smith but came to Fayetteville in 1930. His life in Washington County illustrates one of the relationships that has existed between the University and the black community.

He was a "houseboy" in many of the sorority houses on the campus. He worked in cleaners, cafes, and the old Scott Hotel on Dickson Street in Fayetteville. In the late 1960s and early 1970s, Jimbo was a familiar figure in the basement of the old Student Union, where he shined shoes—often those of ROTC cadets on their way to drill—for 35 cents. His was more than a shoeshine stand, for in the familiar hustle and bustle of youth on the campus, there was Jimbo, who had time to talk, sharing the experience of growing up black and poor with the young, upwardly mobile white students.

The story of the Hoover family is entwined with the history of Washington County's first hospital. Among the veterans of World War I who returned to Washington County was James Cortez Hoover, a six-foot, six-inch black man who'd been born at Harris, east of Fayetteville. After the war he went to work as a janitor at City Hospital. His wife Rissie went there as a cook. His career at the hospital spanned 35 years, until his death in 1954. While he was still a janitor and handy man in 1954, his job had become much more than sweeping and maintenance.

According to Miss Ruth Riley, "He became useful in all departments and all came to look to James for help. He was ambidextrous and could do almost anything with his hands. He knew how to lift patients and became rather expert in helping patients with broken hips. He was especially good with children and old folks" (Flashback, August 1967). Gordon Morgan and Izola Preston wrote that he was "indirectly promoted to medical assistant. He learned many phases of medical work and carried out quite technical procedures under the general supervision of doctors who were shorthanded" (Northwest Arkansas Times, July 16, 1978, p. 39).

Hoover made sure that each of his five children had some college education. One daughter, Theresa, made headlines in the local papers when she became national executive secretary of the Department of Social Relations of the Women's Division of Christian Service of the Board of Missions of the Methodist Church (Springdale News, April 24, 1964).

Social practices on the campus have had impacts on the lives of black people here. Dr. Guerdon D. Nichols, retired dean of the University's College of Arts and Sciences, contributed a history of black students to Robert Leflar's history of the University. According to Dr. Nichols, a few black students were admitted to the University in 1872, but they were taught separately, and none were apparently admitted thereafter until 1948. A black student was turned down for admission to the University Law School in 1936. In 1948, the University adopted a policy of admitting blacks to graduate and professional schools while retaining some segregated teaching features. Among the first admitted was a World War II veteran, Silus Hunt, a native of Ashdown, Arkansas. Hunt and other early black students were harassed, but by the early 1950s there were numerous black graduate students, and the walls of segregation in higher education were tumbling down.

Changes in social practices on the campus soon became changes in the town. A few black students were admitted to Fayetteville High School in the fall of 1954. Fayetteville movie theatres began to desegregate in 1963.

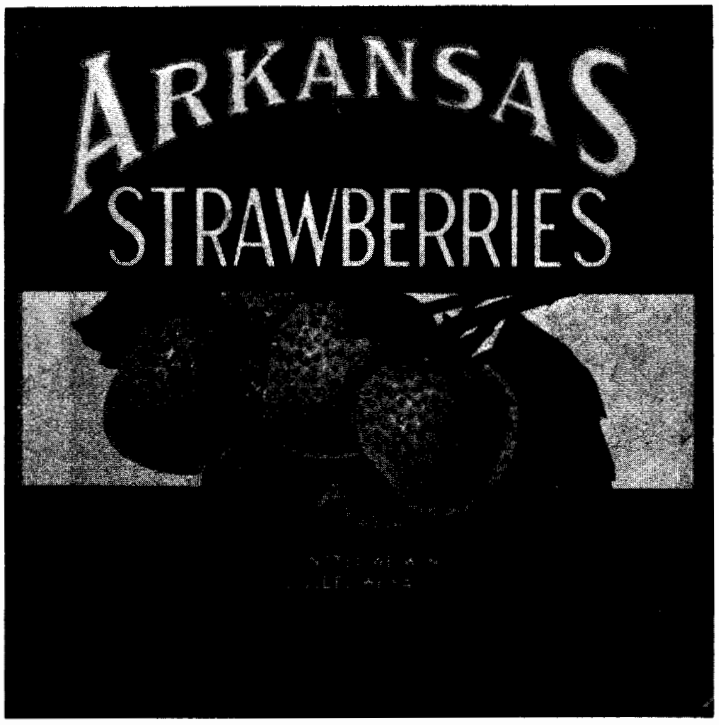
Fruits, Vegetables, and Canning

Grape production began in Washinton County with the first settlers, but grapes were not a major crop until residents of the Italian community of Tontitown began setting out vines in 1898. Their grape festival, held during late summer, endures to this day.

Grape production in the county took a huge leap forward in the decade 1920-1930. Instrumental in this growth was the establishment at Springdale of a factory. According to the Springdale News (April 29, 1937), it was in 1920 when ". . .several hundred acres of land were purchased near Springdale by the Welch Company for planting in grapes, and the plant was established here on condition that farmers and businessmen of the section would subscribe as much as $75,000 of stock. The Welch officials promised to care for the grape crops from certain Arkansas and Missouri sections and to take all the fruits from places within a 24-hour shipping radius. . ." The cornerstone of the plant was laid on December 2, 1922.

Railroad carloads of peaches were being shipped out of Springdale at least as early as 1908. The 150 carloads shipped from Springdale in 1913 was termed a bumper crop. By 1915, the Peach Growers Exchange estimated the local crop at 225 carloads. Like apples, peaches suffered from hail, frosts, and drought. According to the Springdale News (April 29, 1937), the best production year was 1915, when there were 500 acres of bearing trees near Springdale. The News stated, "The peach crop here has always been uncertain because of the warm winter weather and late freezes which often cause frost damage."



Blackberries were also once grown here in commercial quantities. The Arkansas Crop Report for 1922, for example, stated that nine railroad carloads of blackberries were canned and shipped out from Fayetteville, bringing about $2,000 per carload.

All the fruit crops required many "hands" to help with the harvest. In 1898, for example, the Shipper's Union of Springdale advertised for 3,000 strawberry pickers. Those who lived a distance from the fields were advised to come "ready to camp" (Springdale News, March 30, 1978). At the B. A. Rudolph farm near Fayetteville (now the University of Arkansas Agricultural Experiment Farm north of the campus), there were once more than two dozen shacks for migrants who worked in the strawberry fields (Flashback, August 1955). "Wagonloads" of Indians came over to the Rudolph farm from Oklahoma, and they had their own camp. Rudolph also operated a number of canneries in Washington County (Flashback, December 1955). Migrant workers picked strawberries and tomatoes and helped with canning at Savoy (Flashback, May 1977) and in other places in the county.

Canning Industry

Springdale early emerged as the center of the canning industry in northwest Arkansas. Tomatoes were almost the exclusive product of the first canneries of the 1880s, and these were canned for local use only. By the 1930s, canning at Springdale had greatly diversified, involving more than 30 food items. Welch's grape pressing plant was using 100 tons of grapes a day during the season by 1929. World War II caused a boom in the canning industry here. By the early 1950s, the top three vegetables canned were green beans, spinach, and tomatoes. Also canned were several kinds of berries plus potatoes. Three plants at Springdale in the early 1950s each employed 50 to 100 people, and during peak vegetable seasons these plants worked three shifts.

One of the best known of Washington County's canners was Joe Steele, who was 18 when he entered the business in 1924. He incorporated Steele Canning Company in 1930 and began expanding his plants and products. By the early 1960s, 26 products carried the Steele name, and the big black and silver trucks seemed to say "All roads lead to Springdale." He was president of the Ozark Canners Association and served as an officer or member of the board of numerous civic organizations at both the state and local levels.

The Appleby brothers, George and Charles, were pioneers in local business. They, too, served as presidents of the Ozark Canners Association. They packed blackberries near Fayetteville as early as 1907. Charles ran the canning factories, while George managed farms, orchards, and dried fruit plants. They had eight plants in Arkansas. George had hundreds of acres in strawberries at one time and organized the first strawberry association from whose sheds in Farmington berries were shipped throughout the United States. George was one of the largest producers and processors of apples and dried fruits before World War I.

One of the large canneries outside Springdale was at Summers. Built by T. U. Jackson in 1925, it was devoted to tomatoes, beans, and spinach. Capacity was one railroad car of canned goods per day during the peak season. At first local labor was used, but later "hands" had to be transported by truck. The machinery was sold in 1945, and the building turned into a broiler house, where Jackson was said to have 16,000 broilers in the early 1950s.

The Great Depression, that began in 1929 and continued until World War II, spurred the movement of large numbers of people seeking migrant work. Conditions under which migrant workers lived and labored were far from ideal. Newspaper editor Marguerite Gilstrap remembered how bad it was for these people. "I didn't have to go to eastern Arkansas to see what poverty was doing to rural families and observe the misery. We could see it right here in Washington County when the migrant workers came through during berry and fruit season. There were thousands of them just as desperately hungry, ill, and mistreated as the sharecroppers. . ." (Flashback, February 1981).

In 1940 the United States government constructed a semi-permanent labor camp at Springdale. Two hundred shacks, 11 feet by 14 feet in size, were constructed to accommodate migrant workers. The camp was taken over and operated by the City of Springdale after 1948. Later the camp was discontinued, and the materials from its buildings were sold in 1969 (Springdale News, November 30, 1962, and January 21, 1969). The site is now partially occupied by Jones Elementary School and public housing units.

Growers of fruits and vegetables labored under pressure generated by shifting markets, the vagaries of weather, and the need to get the fruit to consumers in a fresh condition. Not so well-known, however, were the hardships endured by the migrant workers. One aspect of these hardships came out in the testimony of J. L. Charlton of the University of Arkansas College of Agriculture in hearings held by the United States House of Representatives in 1940. At these hearings Mr. Charlton stated, "Employers prefer an oversupply of laborers for strawberry picking that makes it possible to hold the pay rate at two cents per quart and to pick over the fields after the morning dew and in time for transporting the berries for shipment in the early afternoon. This oversupply during the

Footnote to the Apple Kingdom

Visitors to the Arkansas Apple Festival, held for the first time at Lincoln in 1976, might have wondered what happened to the big red apple in Washington County. In 1919—well within the memory of some of the retired people who attended the festival in 1976—everything had gone right for the growers, who brought in the biggest crop in local history.

Preliminary totals published in the Arkansas Crop Report for 1919 showed that 2,000 railroad cars (average 600 bushels per car) of fresh apples had been shipped from Elkins, Fayetteville, Farmington, Greenland, Johnson, Lincoln, Prairie Grove, Springdale, Summers, and West Fork. These totals weren't complete since towns like Fayetteville which had cold storage facilities were not through shipping. Additionally, these 2,000 car loads represented only the 60 percent of the crop which was shipped or stored; 8.5 percent was made into vinegar, 26.3 percent went into evaporated apples, 2.6 was used in commercial canneries, and 2.6 percent was consumed in the farmer's homes.

This great harvest, however, only masked serious problems that were already beginning to emerge. Damage from the late, unpredictable frosts typical of northwest Arkansas had always been a problem. In their book The Commercial Apple Industry in North America (1921), authors Folger and Davis note that in the Ozarks there were five crop failures due to frost damage during the period 1900-1910. This caused a shifting of the market to growing areas further north, where flowering occurred later, and frost damage was less likely.

W. R. Bird of Springdale at the town's first apple fair. As the sign made of apples above Bird's head indicates, Northwest Arkansas was the "apple orchard of America" at the time.

The large, red-striped Ben Davis apple had been heavily planted in Washington County. The concentration of one variety created a monoculture perfect for the spread of disease and pest, especially the pink larva of the codling moth, known as the apple worm. Orchardist Thomas Rothrock of Springdale wrote that the larva tunneled into the fruit, ruining it. The best method of control was a spray made from arsenate of lead. The apple worm developed a resistance to the spray. "In the three decades between 1910 to 1940, eight times as much spray material came to be applied. . .results were less and less satisfactory. . .Northwest Arkansas was near the southern end of the apple belt and the resulting long growing seasons spawned three broods of codling moths in place of two further north. . ." This gave growers in the northern part of the United States an advantage over local growers in Washington County.

Diseases like blister canker, a fungus that gains entrance to the tree through wounds in roots and branches, was very destructive to varieties like Ben Davis. Management of the big commercial orchards to control the fungus would have been difficult. San Jose scale also damaged trees. Control of diseases cost the orchardists money and time.

William Campbell, author of One Hundred Years of Fayetteville, worked for years in the apple industry. In 1950 (Flashback, February 1961), he argued that the stability and marketing associated with railroad carlot shipments was upset by truck owners whose intrusions in hauling and marketing cut into the profitability of railroad shipping and seemed to have finally driven the railroads out of the business. Campbell felt that the advent of the pure food laws with special shipping regulations put costly restraints on the dried fruit industry. The opening of the Panama Canal in 1914 gave unfair shipping rate advantages to West Coast growers in the competitive national markets.

Fabulous feathered bonanza. (Tyson's Inc.)

Thomas Rothrock stated, "By the Autumn of 1931, the Great Depression had hit bottom and so had apple prices; a shipping grade apple selling for a half dollar a bushel or less. . ." Trees that had been planted in the high-rolling days of the Apple Empire were dying. Low prices, frosts, codling moths, and several heavy drought years (during the "dust bowl" time of the 1930s) did not encourage replanting of dying trees. "The Depression-Dust Bowl decade of the 1930s tried the very souls of the apple growers of northwest Arkansas. When the decade ended, some were no longer growers."

The 60th meeting of the Arkansas State Horticultural Society was held at Springdale in January 1940 (Springdale News, January 11, 1940). "For the first time in its history, the subject of poultry in orchards will be among the important topics of discussion in connection with the economics of the apple industry. . .Until the last few years, orchardists paid no attention to any other type of farming save growing apples. Now, some of the more progressive growers have decided to increase their income on here-to-for one-crop land by utilizing orchards between seasons, for growing fall and early spring broilers."

Fabulous Feathered Bonanza

Chicken raising was different in the old days. Out in the Hog Eye area, the family of Neva Barnes McMurry used to keep a flock of Barred Plymouth Rocks. "They were good rustling range chickens," she wrote in the Washington County Observer (June 25, 1981). "Their color blended fairly well with the landscape for some protection from predators. They were heavy hens to eat and sell."

Technology for this pre-Poultry Empire operation was simple. Hens were encouraged to nest inside a shed, but sometimes the bird "stole her nest out" and hid the eggs in weeds. Neva's father once had a small, 60-egg incubator, but found it didn't work to his satisfaction—technology was not then viewed as the universal cure-all. There was little "boughten" feed. Chicks were started on "crumbled hard boiled eggs, or cornbread and dry homemade cottage cheese." For their efforts, the family got fryers, canned some chicken (especially after the first pressure cooker arrived in 1927), culled roosters and hens to sell, and eggs.

In 1935 chickens on broiler farms were usually hand fed and watered. Most brooder houses were heated with coal. (George's Inc.)

Some county farmers were raising chickens for markets before the turn of the century, but this was a relatively minor sideline. On May 26, 1893, the Springdale News reported that, "Millard Berry has purchased an incubator and proposes to raise chickens on an extensive scale. It will hold 200 eggs which will make it equal to 15 Arkansas chickens." What Berry had in mind was the untried concept of mass production, that is, growing chickens like corn.

On May 27, 1897, an article in the Fayetteville Democrat reported that the local poultry industry was "astonishing"—three banks in Fayetteville were cashing $1,000 per day in chicken orders for birds shipped live from several points in northwest Arkansas, including Fayetteville. Also in 1897, the First Annual Poultry Show sponsored by the Northwest Arkansas Poultry and Pet Stock Association met in the Springdale Opera House.

Decline in the fruit business during the late 1920s and early 1930s made poultry appealing. According to Curtis Cable in Growth of the Arkansas Broiler Industry, "Because of the rolling terrain, the low fertility of the soil, and the small acreages being operated, farmers in the area were restricted in their attempts to find a replacement for the apple enterprise. After it was demonstrated by a few farmers that commercial production of young chickens was profitable, others were attracted. This enterprise is suited to small acreages; it is not dependent on soil fertility, topography, and climate; and provides employment for excess family labor."

Early Poultry Production

Production of chickens for market received an early boost with the establishment of the county's first poultry processing firm at Fayetteville in 1914. M. L. Price, a representative of the Aaron Poultry and Egg Company, came from Kansas to Fayetteville in January 1914 and set up shop in an old mill building along the tracks near the Frisco station on Dickson Street.

"Neither the Chamber of Commerce nor any business people were interested in a large poultry processing plant. They were then interested only in cattle, apples, tomatoes, beans, and berries. . ." The Aaron company decided not to build a plant here, but Price remained. In 1915 a new company was formed, with Jay Fulbright (father of now retired U. S. Senator J. William Fulbright) as president, and in 1916 this company built a plant on West Avenue near Dickson Street.

The first job was to improve the local stock. "We worked with many communities and started shipping in young roosters from the North and exchanging pound for pound the scrub stock that the farmers brought in. The same procedure was applied to turkeys. . ." A program was also begun to improve local egg production.

Chickens slaughtered in the Fayetteville plant were rushed to markets in special refrigerator cars filled with crushed ice and rock salt. A man stayed with the shipment to make sure the temperatures remained below 32 degrees.

Price's company was eventually sold to Jerpes of Nebraska. The principal owner was Gilbert Swanson, son-in-law of Jay Fulbright. The name was changed to Swanson and Company. It was this company that was eventually acquired by Campbell Soup in 1955. The much expanded Price slaughter plant was operated at the same location until 1966, when Campbell Soup moved to a new complex on 15th Street in south Fayetteville. This plant has long been a major industrial employer in the county.

The presence of rail connections (for shipments of live birds) and a packing plant at Fayetteville were both inducements for new growers. One of these new faces was Jeff D. Brown of Springdale who is today remembered as the "Father of the Broiler Industry" in northwest Arkansas.

Brown learned the chicken business on his family's farm near Springdale. He got married in 1921 and went into raising winter broilers, using kerosene home incubators and coal burning brooder stoves. He made and mixed his own poultry food, studied literature then available on broiler raising, and even took correspondence courses. He hatched 357 mixed-breed chicks in 1921. Experiments during the next eight years made him believe he could find a superior breed of chicken.

In 1929 Brown talked Springdale's First National Bank into loaning him $700 for the down payment on a 10,000-egg Jamesway electric incubator, which Brown installed at 126 N. Mill Street in Springdale. Brown convinced other growers that the key to making money was in using superior stock. In 1930, he doubled his hatching capacity. By 1936, Brown's original hatchery could produce 94,000 chicks, and he built new hatcheries at Fayetteville and at Centerton in Benton County.

By May of 1937, C. L. George of Springdale had a fleet of trucks to transport broilers to market. (George's Inc.)

According to the Springdale News (May 13, 1961), "The demand grew for his feed and soon after the establishment of the hatchery in 1929 he conceived the idea of manufacturing his own line of feeds and mashes. . .He would furnish the chicks and the feed to local growers and by necessity, he was forced to carry some of the growers (provide credit) until the broilers were sold. By 1930, this called for financial help beyond his capacity. So again he got help from his banker, who by agreement carried the notes he took from the growers. From this beginning evolved the financing of this new industry in the area."

Jeff Brown's story shows that the basis for today's modern mass industry had been laid by the mid-1930s. Superior lines of chicks were becoming available in quantities suitable for many poultry farms, and credit was available to those farmers who could not otherwise afford to start growing broilers.

The poultry barns common in Washington County today did not suddenly spring into existence within the confines of the dying apple orchards. Jeff Brown's first efforts were made in a converted smokehouse. In the 1920s, houses built especially for chickens were at first approximately eight feet by ten feet, or slightly larger, with a shed roof. A survey in Washington and Benton counties conducted by the University of Arkansas in 1938-1939 showed that chicken houses were getting larger, then up to about 14 by 16 feet. It wasn't until after World War II that big houses were built that approached the contemporary sizes that range 20-40 feet in width and 200-400 feet in length and typically house over 10,000 birds.

Another factor important in the development of poultry in Washington County was the control of diseases where thousands of birds were grown in close confinement. Disease affecting one flock spread to others. First efforts were directed toward control of pullorum (bacillary white diarrhea), an infection that reduces egg production and egg quality, kills chicks, and occasionally kills adult birds. Pullorum control work dates to 1926 and statewide testing of flocks to 1933.

Research aimed at improving the quality of eggs had been undertaken at the University of Arkansas as early as 1914. A new poultry research facility was constructed on the Agricultural Experiment Station farm at Fayetteville in 1931. Robert M. Smith was supervisor of the Poultry Division. Research focused on developing poultry ration formulas in the 1930s. Efforts in selective breeding resulted in hardy chicks that reached maturity in a shorter time. In the first days flocks were ready for the market in 14 to 16 weeks. By the 1950s, this time was cut to 10-12 weeks, and later yet, to fewer that eight weeks.

The 100 million white chickens grown on an annual basis in Washington County today have their ancestral roots in these breeding experiments conducted at the University as well as elsewhere. According to Robert Smith, the development of the crossbreed bird consisting of White Wyandotte male and Rhode Island Red female was a major accomplishment. By the early 1950s, White Wyandotte males were being crossed with New Hampshire females. While purebred lines of the White Wyandotte and New Hampshire Red were still popular in the 1950s, the selective breeding experiments were producing birds that matured faster, had more meat on the breasts, and had fewer of the pin feathers whose removal added to the burden of processing.

One example of the effort to produce a superior broiler bird was the National Chicken-of-Tomorrow contest which pitted prize chicks from all over the United States against one another. The event was hosted on the University of Arkansas campus in June 1951. There were educational meetings and panel discussions by poultry experts from all over the country. A street dance was held on the Fayetteville square June 11. There was a barbecue for 3,500 people and a Chicken-of-Tomorrow Queen, Miss Joan Walters of Rogers. A parade three miles long was held in Fayetteville on June 15. Eight thousand people heard United States Vice-President Alben W. Barkley's address in Razorback Stadium.

The growth of poultry farming stimulated other areas of the local economy. Early poultry shipments involved live birds sent to market on the railroad and a little later, slaughtered birds packed in ice. Long haul trucking from grower to market developed after Highway 71 was graveled in the 1920s. Two major corporate leaders in the United States poultry business—Tyson Foods and George's, both of Springdale—originated in early trucking of live chickens.

C. L. George and his son Luther of Springdale began hauling live broilers to Kansas City and St. Louis as early as 1929, the same year that Jeff Brown built his first hatchery. John Tyson, who came to Springdale from Kansas City in the 1920s, made his first haul of live broilers from Springdale to Chicago in 1935, earning $265. In the following year he took chickens to Cincinnati, Memphis, Detroit, Cleveland, and Houston—the beginnings of an empire whose worth exceeded one billion dollars by the mid-1980s.

Trucking beat out the railroads because of flexibility. Truckers could visit rural farms and haul the birds directly to markets, wherever these markets could be found. In less than a decade after the Georges, Tyson, and others entered the hauling business, trucks were carrying 97 percent of the broilers to market, often in special "poultry pullmans" that included a built-in sleeper for the man charged with keeping the birds healthy in transit.

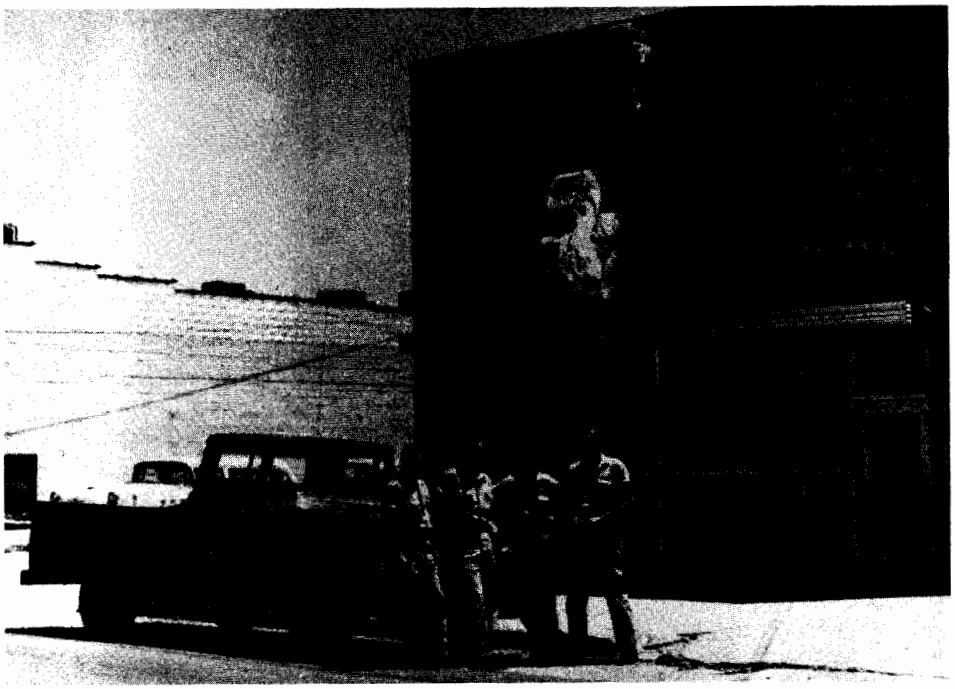
There were 5,000 brooder houses in northwest Arkansas by the late 1930s. H. W. Greathouse had 19 brooder houses and planned to build 11 more in order to bring his capacity to 25,000 birds. "H. W. Greathouse, largest Washington County producer, made a record sale recently when he loaded 8,200 broilers at one time and made a clear profit of $2,400. . ." (Arkansas Gazette, June 26, 1938, mag. section, p. 38).

Roy C. Ritter began his career as a grower in 1931. In 1936 he opened a hatchery and feed store at Elm Springs. In 1937, he moved to Springdale to become a district manager for General Mills. He opened the now landmark A-Q (Arkansas Quality) Chicken House Restaurant at Springdale in July 1942. He expanded his Quality Feed Stores to Huntsville and Rogers and had flocks of turkeys, broilers, and laying hens.

Ritter was the first president of the Arkansas Poultry Federation (APF), founded in 1953. Executive secretary of the APF was B. Hall Davis of Fayetteville. The goals of the organization included "the improvement of the quality of poultry and eggs through research into whatever factors that might affect the quality as it is present for consumption" and "an educational program designed to increase the consumption of both chicken and turkey meat as well as eggs here in our state." The organization had 1,300 industry members by 1954.



More than 50 years later, the company started by John Tyson in the 1930s has grown to be the largest poultry producer in the nation. (Tyson's Inc.)

Industrial Development

Broiler production in Washington County had spiraled upward steadily since the 1920s: from 430,000 in 1930 to almost 1.5 million by 1940, the time when it was clear the old apple empire had passed away. Over 10.3 million broilers were listed in the 1950 census. By 1959, Washington County's production more than tripled, and then tripled again—to over 91 million—by 1969. This dizzy pace of change spawned new trucking companies, scientific research, feed stores, and mills. Farms had now become units in an integrated industrial process, far removed from the days when family farms produced most of what farm families needed.

Part of the process of industry development involved a partnership between banks that furnished financing and businesses like Brown's feed stores which supplied feed, chicks, and other necessities to poultry farmers. Under early growing contracts, the farmers gave feed dealers a chattel mortgage on the birds, and the farmers assumed most risks associated with low prices or loss of birds. By the late 1940s, this credit system had been modified so that farmers provided the land, houses, machinery, and labor to care for the birds. The lenders provided chicks, feed, medicines, etc., but assumed no risks associated with low markets or loss of birds due to factors beyond the farmer's control. The farmers received a flat rate for each bird marketed under the new system and made profits or absorbed losses associated with the market place.

Researchers from the University of Arkansas estimated that the annual cost of credit to growers in the late 1930s amounted to 23 percent. Increasingly, poultry operations became more modern and more integrated, with companies controlling all aspects of production from feed to chicks to finance to trucking to markets. This credit system was widespread in northwest Arkansas, but its acceptance was not universal.

Cooperation among the farmers in feed purchases, hatcheries, processing, and trucking offered an alternative to contract growing. Poultry farmers organized the Farm Bureau Cooperative Mill and Supply at Fayetteville in 1941. By 1947, there were five co-ops in Washington and Benton Counties serving 3,000 growers, and co-op hatcheries had a capacity to handle 130,000 eggs. In 1951, an estimated 12 to 15 percent of the business in chicks and feed in northwest Arkansas was done by co-ops owned by the farmers. A writer for the United States Farm Credit Administration stated that growers who depended on feed dealers "must use his feed, whether they prefer it or not, and pay his price. . ." On the other hand, producers who used no production credit had considerably higher profits per pound of broiler produced than did those who bought feed on credit. . .Second, "the Arkansas growers with their new marketing and processing association could no longer tolerate any control over their sales outlet by the creditor. . ."

The marketplace was glutted with poultry during the 1950s. Prices fell in response to overproduction. The price paid farmers per pound of chicken skidded from 28 cents in 1952 to below 10 cents in 1961. Everyone was hurt, company and grower alike. The integrated companies had a small cushion as a result of diverse operations from sales of feeds, chicks, and finished products. Independent growers who raised chickens on contracts, and whose returns were based entirely on the market price of poultry, faced immediate failure when the price paid for finished birds fell below costs of production.

Jones Truck Lines (JTL)

Harvey Jones started his business hauling freight in a Springfield Wagon pulled by a team of mules between Rogers, Springdale, and Fayetteville. He got a truck in 1919. The business became Jones Truck Lines in 1933. By 1960 JTL had 230 tractors, 156 delivery trucks, 79 refrigerator trailers, one airplane, etc. (See JTL in the Business Profiles section of this book.)

panies organized the Northwest Poultry Growers Association (N. P. G. A.) in 1961. Eventually, about 400 farmers—mostly from Benton and Washington counties, but also from southwestern Arkansas—joined. The association affiliated with the United States Poultry and Egg Producers Association, whose goal was to limit production nationally and therefore to raise prices that would benefit growers. Another goal was to gain control over the contract dealings with the companies. The independent growers in the N. P. G. A. suspected that the companies sometimes cheated them on sales of feed and chicks, as well as in the feed conversion formula that was used to measure how well the growers had done in raising birds.

Integrated Companies

The largest of the integrated companies at that time—Arkansas Valley Industries, Tyson Foods, and Ralston-Purina—viewed this farmers' group as a threat. The farmers charged that the companies actively blacklisted certain leaders by refusing to give them grow-out contracts, effectively putting the farmers out of business. Blacklisting was illegal. In 1965, a division of the U. S. Department of Agriculture filed an official complaint about the blacklisting, noting that the three companies ". . .did subject particular persons to undue and unreasonable disadvantage" (Arkansas Gazette, April 3, 1965, p. 3A). A "cease and desist order" was issued against the companies in 1968, long after some growers involved had lost their poultry operations, and the organization had ceased to exist. A Federal court overturned the order in 1969, stating that the Federal agency involved, the Packers and Stockyards Division, had no jurisdiction.

parable to the farmers' movements of the late 19th Century in their opposition to corporations and their insistence on the importance of independence for farmers. The collapse of this organization marked the end of attempts by private farmers to exercise control over the poultry companies for whom they worked.

Pioneer poultryman Jeff D. Brown, who started with a log smokehouse and a shovel to mix feed in 1921, passed away in 1965. In 1966, the Arkansas Poultry Federation and the Arkansas Poultry Improvement Association jointly published a salute to the industry, "Feathers in Our Caps," dedicated to Brown. In 1971, Tyson Foods punctuated the poultry skyline of Washington County with a feed mill that would have been beyond belief in 1921: 185 feet in height and utilizing computerized controls to mix 100 tons of feed per hour. The old Jeff Brown feed mill on East Emma in Springdale, which had been acquired by Tyson Foods, was demolished in 1973 as part of a general renovation of the downtown area.

The two poultry giants in Washington County—Tyson Foods and George's—are owned by the same families that started the businesses. Campbell Soup in Fayetteville is a direct descendant of the company started in 1915. The magazine Broiler Industry (December 1985) listed these three companies as being among the largest in the nation among poultry producers: Tyson Foods was number two in 1985 (climbing to number one in 1986), Campbell Soup was number 18, and George's was number 30.

C. L. George died in 1969, passing the company to Gene George, who in the 1980s passed the company to his son, Gary. Broiler Industry (March 1984) recently called George's "a conservative, well-run family miniconglomerate. Interests include current production of about 30 million broilers a year, 1.2 million table egg layers, enough cattle and real estate, it seems, to surround the city of Springdale, a completely rebuilt feed mill, cold storage warehouse operation, propane gas, and outside interests in banking and transportation." Behind the George's operation are 200 farm families, whose operations have an average capacity of 25,000 to 30,000 broilers.

Tyson Foods celebrated its 50th anniversary in October 1984. Broiler Industry (November 1984) stated that Tyson's had gone from a single truck hauling live birds to Chicago to a sprawling complex that included 22 processing plants, 350 retail and food service products, and $1.1 billion in annual sales. "The senior Tyson followed the usual route into vertical integration, moving from a brisk livehaul business, later buying and selling chickens, to actually growing them." The first slaughter plant was built in 1958. Tyson issued stock in 1963 and used the revenues to purchase Garrett Poultry Company in Rogers—the first of many acquisitions that had by 1986 made Tyson Foods the biggest poultry operation in the United States.

In Defense of Water

In the early days of the county, the word pollution was unknown or was at least limited to such offenses as smelly tanyards, pig wallows in towns, or outhouses that needed some attention. Pollution became a familiar word, however, as a result of population and industrial growth. Poultry production and industrial expansion has caused widespread pollution of wells, springs, and lakes, making pollution control a major issue.

Today, thousands of jobs in Washington County, both on farms and in towns, are tied directly to the success of the poultry industry. These jobs have been threatened in recent years by water pollution problems that plague all companies that process foods and discharge large amounts of wastewater. Campbell Soup, for example, has long been one of the major employers in Washington County. In recent years, however, the company (as well as other companies throughout the Ozarks region) and the City of Fayetteville have wrestled with water pollution problems that are endemic to the food processing industry.

In Washington County, water usage to process food like chicken is high, but streams such as the White and Illinois Rivers, where polluted wastewater is discharged, have low rates of flow during certain times of the year. This makes it difficult to dilute the polluted wastewater, even when the wastewater has received pre-treatment in the processing plant as well as treatment in the municipal sewage plants. Costs for treatment of wastewater adds to the costs of the final products from plants, making poultry products from Washington County potentially less competitive in the national markets. Polluted streams and lakes are not attractive to local recreationists or tourists, adding additional pressures to solve the pollution problems.

Pollution problems came to a head in the late 1970s as a result of well-publicized fish kills in both the White and Illinois Rivers, directly attributable to pollution associated with industrial development. A fish kill that occurred during Veteran's Day weekend in 1978 covered two or three miles of the White River with dead fish.

Several Fayetteville plants had discharged "heavy metals" such as copper and chromium (used in an electro-plating plant) into the wastewater collection system. These metals poisoned the bacteria that normally help digest waste, and this made the Fayetteville plant less effective in treating wastewater. So much "heavy metal" had found its way into Beaver Lake that one Fayetteville official humorously suggested the lake might in the future become a valuable copper mine.

The metals problem was combined with pollution associated with the poultry industry—either chicken litter handling problems on the farms or huge "slugs" of pollution from processing plants that overwhelmed the Fayetteville wastewater treatment plant and the White River (see, for example, Springdale News, March 23 and October 1, 1979 and Northwest Arkansas Times, October 30, 1980). A fish kill reported on the Illinois River (June 16, 1981) near the Robinson community resulted when the levee on a poultry waste holding pond broke, flooding the river with wastes and killing thousands of fish and other organisms.

During these incidents, partially treated wastewater was discharged into the White River. So much of the oxygen that is normally trapped in the water was used by bacteria trying to break down wastes that large sections of the rivers became de-oxygenated, killing fish and other creatures that depend on oxygen in the water.

The problem is severe on the White River because it is the main feeder stream for Beaver Lake, the region's water supply. Pollution of Beaver Lake threatens the entire food processing industry and thousands of jobs, since the processing plants depend upon clean inexpensive water for their operations. A similar situation prevails in the Illinois River watershed. Several towns in Arkansas and in eastern Oklahoma draw municipal drinking water from the Illinois River. Any pollution problems in the Illinois, therefore, are viewed as a threat to the futures of these towns. In addition, the state of Oklahoma has declared its section of the Illinois River a "Scenic River," valued for recreational purposes.

Natural Gas

A crowd of 1,000 attended the February 20, 1930, ceremony marking the introduction of natural gas fuel in Fayetteville. The crowd was entertained by dances performed by pupils at Mrs. Hayden McIlroy's Nymph Dance Studio. A number of homes in Fayetteville were already piped for gas and ready for service. It was thought that natural gas would play a role in expanding industry in the area (Northwest Arkansas Times, July 16, 1978).

Campbell Soup's president told its stockholders, "the present rates of pollution. . .can be corrected to lower rates. There will be a cost to pollution control, not a small cost, and it will be charged against our economy, but there is no side-stepping this penalty" (Arkansas Poultry Times, January 6, 1971). In 1987 the taxpayers of Springdale, Fayetteville, and surrounding communities were spending millions of dollars in upgrading and expanding wastewater treatment plants in order to protect the thousands of food processing jobs in the region, as well as the environments of the White and Illinois Rivers and the future of Beaver Lake. In August 1987 improvements on the Springdale plant were estimated at $16 million and on the Fayetteville plant, at $43 million.

Conservation Efforts

Those who love the traditional feel of the Ozarks—the quiet of its woodlands, springs, rock bluffs, and free-flowing streams—have agonized over the detrimental effects caused by the tremendous growth of the region since World War II. Some people have sought to balance this growth by protecting special wild areas from commercial development. No organization has been more active in this respect than the homegrown Ozark Society. Washington County residents have always been in the leadership of this group.

The group's origins date to 1961, when Washington County native United States Senator J. William Fulbright made it clear he opposed an Army Corps of Engineers plan to dam the Buffalo River. On May 24, 1962, the Ozark Society was organized at a meeting on the University of Arkansas campus. Neil Compton, a physician from Bentonville, was the society's first president. Ozark Society member Kenneth L. Smith, a resident of Fayetteville, wrote the now classic Buffalo River Country in 1967, extolling the natural beauty of the river and exposing the beauty of the Ozarks to a national audience. Ten years later the Ozark Society published his Illinois River, A People's River. The Ozark Society's influential Bulletin was long edited by Fayetteville residents Joe and Maxine Clark. Washington County residents have always served the society as officers and members of the board. Mrs. Laird Archer of Fayetteville was the society's secretary for many years.

In 1987 the Ozark Society celebrated its 25th anniversary with a camp-out on the Buffalo River which, thanks to the society's work, remains in its natural state, much as the Indians and the pioneers knew it. Water has been an important fact of life in the county ever since the pioneers of the 1820s settled around the springs. There are still many water-related issues on the Ozark Society agenda—pollution of the Illinois River; a proposed dam on Lee Creek, which rises in southern Washington County; and others. The Buffalo River is "saved," but the work of conservation goes on.

Talkies and Sliced Bread

Fayetteville's first talking picture, "Mother Knows Best," was screened on March 18, 1929. According to the Fayetteville Daily Democrat, "Talking pictures in Fayetteville are just another evidence of the progressive spirit in Fayetteville that is heralding a new era." Sliced bread was not far behind, appearing in markets in July 1929.

The Great Depression

During the 1930s the big news in Washington County, as elsewhere, was the Great Depression. Data from the United States Census show that during the decade 1930-1939 manufacturing, and consequently jobs, in Washington County fell to the level of 1920. Simultaneously, the decade of the Depression witnessed a reversal in the trend toward urbanization. Instead of abandoning farms, people actually moved back to them, hoping to ride out the economic storm. In some ways, however, Washington County was better off than many other parts of Arkansas. It lead the state in the number of farms that were not mortgaged—1,909.

The humorist Will Rogers came to Fayetteville in 1931. The money raised during his three-day visit was placed in a fund for unemployment relief. According to Betty Lighton, "The Perennial Garden Club of Fayetteville. . .got $200 of the gate receipts from Rogers' appearance here. They used it to hire local people to plant Arkansas Avenue" (Northwest Arkansas Times, July 29, 1979). Lighton's mother was responsible for the metal marker which is attached to a block of limestone on Arkansas Avenue near Lafayette. It reads, "To The Memory of Will Rogers whose heartfelt understanding of his fellowman made possible the planning of this avenue."

Arkansas' first Farm Bureau was organized in the county in 1931. "Farm leaders were definite in their belief that something must be done to improve the agricultural situation. The Depression was deepening and agriculture was floundering. . ."—J. H. Heckman in Flashback, February 1972. The organizational meeting took place on May 20, 1931, at the courthouse. "The makeup of the first Board of Directors reflected the nature of the county's agriculture in 1931. Fruit and vegetable production and processing were predominant then along with grain farming and some livestock and dairying. . ."

Washington County was entertained during the Depression by the Fayetteville Angels (at first named the Educators), whose history is told in The Fayetteville Angels by Walter J. Lemke. The Angels, a professional baseball team, played all seven years that the Arkansas-Missouri League lasted, 1934-1940. The Angels' batboy from 1936 to 1939 was Sherman Lollar, who went on to fame in the major leagues. The first local game played under floodlights on June 25, 1937, was a great novelty. Just as novel was Frances Dunlap of Farmington, who may have been the first woman to play an entire game of professional baseball, September 6, 1936. The biggest crowd ever to see a game, 3,000, showed up on August 1, 1938, when friends of Congressman Claude Fuller—who was running for re-election—bought out the ball park and admitted everyone for free.

C. C. C. workers Eugene Cooley, Edward Arnold, and Gene Starcher posed on the sandstone dam at Devil's Den State Park in January of 1940. (Devil's Den State Park)

Civilian Conservation Corps

In 1932 the national unemployment rate for young men 18-24 was about 25 percent. President Roosevelt called for 500,000 of these unemployed youth to be hired for work in the national interest: restoration of forests decimated in the great timber boom; conservation of soil in areas with eroding farmland that was creating the dust bowl disasters; and construction in public areas. Under the Civilian Conservation Corps law passed in 1933, the men lived in military-like camps and were paid $30 per month, of which $22 was sent home. Washington County owes some of its finest recreational areas to the Civilian Conservation Corps (CCC).

A CCC camp was opened at what is today Devil's Den State Park in 1934. CCC workers first spent six months improving the road from West Fork (Highway 170). Then they built five miles of highway through the rugged country that reached the park site. Then work began on the improvements that are visible in the park today, half a century later. The park officially opened May 27, 1939.

Another recreation area, the Lake Wedington Unit of the Ozark National Forest, owes its origins to hard times. The Dust Bowl soil erosion crisis of 1934 and 1935 prompted the formation of the Soil Conservation Service (SCS) in 1935. Between 1936 and 1939, the SCS and the University of Arkansas jointly managed a project that involved the purchase of thousands of acres of eroding land in Washington County and the relocation of 163 farm owners and sharecroppers who then lived in

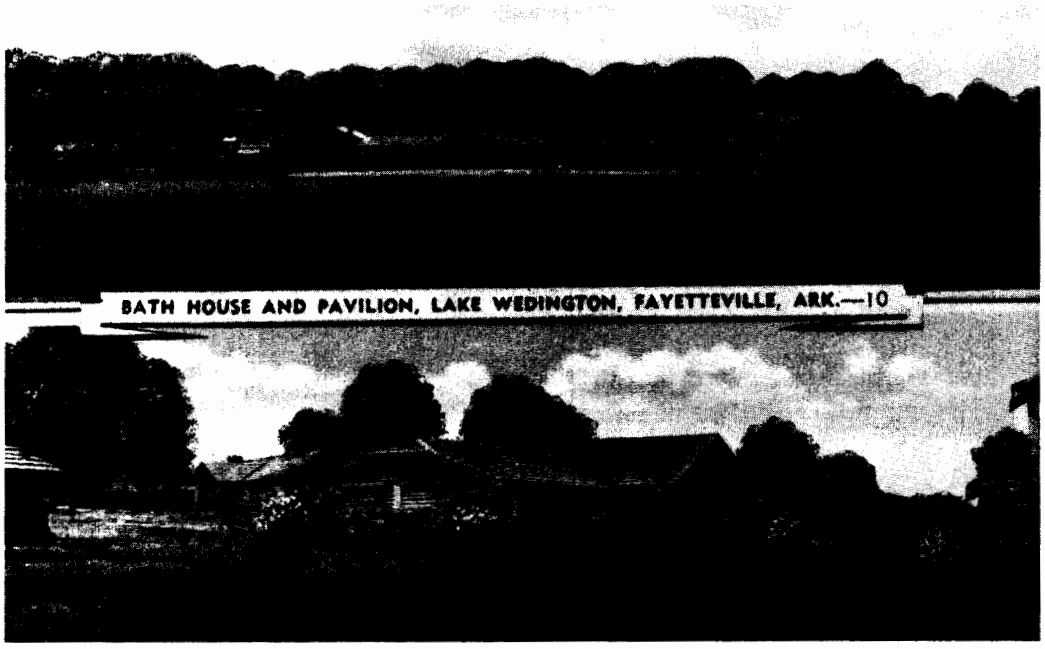
Bean Spring

In 1838 Richard Bean homesteaded a piece of land where a spring gushed forth from a hillside. This spring, located in Cane Hill, became known as Bean Spring. An important source of water to all who settled the area, Bean Spring, for many years, supplied Lincoln with water. It was only after the drought of 1954 that plans for Lincoln Lake were drawn up.

In 1924 four businessmen, N. L. Penn, S. V. Norwood, Troy Clark all from Lincoln, and H. J. Platt from Oklahoma, got together to create a resort area similar to Monte Ne, Bella Vista, and Lake Francis Park. The site chosen for this park was Bean Spring in Cane Hill.

July 4, 1925 was "Lincoln Park's" grand opening. The three days of celebration were held in the shaded hilly area and soon filled with patrons from all the surrounding towns. An eight piece orchestra was hired and dances were held all summer long. The swimming pool was a popular spot for the young people, and the American Legion, with the only concession stand, did a booming business.

Successful for a few years, upkeep



This postcard described Lake Wedington as a "125-acre lake in an 18,000-acre recreational area located on Highway 16." The bath house and pavilion were log and stone buildings constructed by C. C. C. workers.

and plans for expansion fizzled with the Great Depression. A boy died as a result of a dive from the high diving board, and with no money to hire a life guard, the pool, one of the park's main attractions, was drained. The park closed and was sold to A. J. Tull.

the Wedington project area. Projects were initiated to improve the quality of the forest land, which had been heavily cut-over in previous years, and to improve grasslands so that they could be leased back to local farmers. Over 6,200 acres were ready to be leased for grazing in late 1940. The 354 acres of shortleaf pine planted in 1938 was the beginning of the forestry program. Management of the area became the responsibility of the U. S. Forest Service in 1954.

The Federal government was represented in all levels of life in the county during the 1930s. In 1935, for example, government agencies that maintained offices at Fayetteville included the Agricultural Adjustment Administration, United States Employment Service, Emergency Relief Administration, Emergency Crop and Feed Loan Service, as well as others.

The Emergency Relief Administration had by January 1935 employed 1,100 workers in the county on a list of projects that filled an entire page in the Fayetteville Chamber of Commerce's annual report: constructing of sidewalks, painting schools, building a new school (Lincoln) for black students, working on the city water plant at Lake Wilson, and various projects at the University.

These workers also labored on the county fair grounds, rural sanitation, repairs on bridges and culverts, sanitation projects at Springdale and Prairie Grove, construction work on roads throughout the county, and repairs on schools at Evansville, Tontitown, Spring Valley, etc.

The CCC was disbanded in 1942, but not until 75,000 Arkansans had served in it. The Depression actually ended in 1941, as the United States and the citizens of Washington County entered World War II.

Growth of Towns and Industry

Family farms have been disintegrating in the county since the turn of the century. Each U. S. Census has shown fewer people on the farm except for the census involving the Depression years of the 1930s. In 1900, only about 16 percent of the county's population lived in towns, primarily Fayetteville and Springdale, but this figure rose steadily thereafter. By 1950, as many people lived in town as on working farms, and by the 1980s almost two-thirds of the county's residents lived in towns. Many of these people found work in the poultry industry, often in plants like Swanson's in Fayetteville where assembly line methods were used to kill, de-feather, cut-up, cook, package, and ship chickens to markets.

Sawmills had their greatest impact on Washington County during the era of the timber boom, starting in the 1880s and ending by the 1920s. Railroads were using 3,000 hardwood ties in every mile of track laid. Ties were cut until there were few suitable trees remaining. The forests and big mills in the southeastern section of the county had fed timber to plants at Fayetteville via the famous St. Paul Branch, which started at Fayetteville and terminated at Pettigrew in Madison County. The last spurt in the timber boom was associated with a feeder timber line built off the St. Paul Branch to Cass, in Franklin County. Millions of dollars worth of hardwoods were cut and shipped on the line to Fayetteville. The Cass feeder line ceased operations about 1924, which marked the end of the timber boom. The St. Paul Branch ceased operations altogether in 1937.

The timber boom left a huge amount of open, cut-over land. Farming was attempted on this denuded land, especially fruit production, but erosion quickly removed the top soil, making farming impractical if, indeed, Harvard and Floy Harp opened a grocery at Springdale in 1930 on $500 saved from working in the California citrus groves. The first "supermarket" in the county was probably the one opened by the Harps in 1956 at the corner of Highways 71 and 68 in Springdale. They opened a second one in 1964 at the Plaza Shopping Center (Springdale News, February 18, 1979, p. 44).

it was ever practical in this rugged, hilly area. Unsuitable for agriculture, much of this old cut-over timber land was abandoned by its owners and eventually wound up in the Ozark National Forest.

Meanwhile, industry was growing in the towns. Data from the U. S. Census show that 33 manufacturing establishments in the county in 1939 employed around 500 people; 68 in 1947 employed 1,500; 71 in 1958 employed 3,000; 93 in 1967 employed almost 7,000. As in the 1930s, most establishments have involved food processing, followed distantly by forest products and printing.

Industrialization since World War II has been marked by diversification, growing size in the businesses, and heavy concentration in the Fayetteville-Springdale complex. Development of an industrial park at Fayetteville began in 1970, and the first industry located there in 1972. The purpose of the park, located in southeast Fayetteville, was to create a planned, properly zoned industrial area, rather than scattering plants around a wide area of the city. In 1987, the park was 800 acres in size. Between 1972 and 1986, 16 companies owned property there.

In 1981 there were 41 manufacturing plants at Springdale, with five of them employing more than 500 people. Seven new industries moved to Springdale in 1980 and early 1981 (Northwest Arkansas Times, May 3, 1981, 17E).

Industrial expansion created a need for special educational opportunities. Classes started at Northwest Arkansas Vocational Technical School in Springdale on August 9, 1975. It is a state-supported, post-secondary school whose objective is to provide learning and skills needed to enter the job market. Its curriculum has been designed to meet the needs of businesses and industries in Madison, Benton, and Washington Counties (Springdale News, February 18, 1979, p. 25).

Employees on line at Jerpe's, December 1942.

The story of the growth and development of local industries has often been told. Less often told is the story of the individuals who worked in these early industries. One interesting tale from the early days of the poultry processing business was written by Ethel Edwards. She published a small collection of stories titled Bare Mountain in the 1960s.

Edwards was born in a log cabin on a mountain a few miles southeast of Fayetteville. Her family eked out a living by farming in summer, mining coal in the winter, keeping livestock, and trying specialty crops like ginseng. In 1929 the Edwards family hoped for better things and moved to Arizona in a second-hand Buick. Things didn't work out there. Soon they returned and settled in Fayetteville, where in the early years of the Depression Mr. Edwards dug ditches for a plumber. It was so bad in the 1930s that the plumber wound up digging his own ditches, and the Edwards family retreated back to the mountain.

Poultry Processing

Ethel, then 14, stayed in Fayetteville and was accepted at the University of Arkansas (the University once had a small enrollment of high school students). "Some help came from my mother's family and student loan funds, but mostly I managed by picking the feathers off chickens at Jerpe's," she wrote. (Jerpe's was later sold to Campbell Soup. It was located near the corner of Dickson and West in Fayetteville when Edwards worked there). Edwards wrote that women even below age 14 worked in the plant.

"Those who worked in the basement at Jerpe's, as I did for three years in the thirties, were the cast offs from Fayetteville society. . .Its stink could be smelled blocks away. In the basement women pulled wet feathers from the fowls as fast as they could for this was piecework. . .Handling wet chickens and standing on piles of feathers and droppings, fingers and toes would soon be covered with red and weeping blisters. . .to us it was the chicken itch. . .Killing began at seven and we might be there until ten that night.

"During the prosperous twenties any who went down to the Jerpe basement could take a number and go to work. When I was there any work was hard to find. Old-timers resented the needy respectable women, seeing every chicken they got as less money for them."

Tuberculosis (TB) was widespread in the 1930s. Some victims worked at Jerpe's. "We worked beside the victims, knowing they were infected and that their disease was contagious. Yes, we were afraid and tried to avoid close contact, but they must work if they and their children were to eat. They spat out their lungs onto piles of wet chicken feathers. . .I knew more than a dozen Jerpe basement workers who died of tuberculosis. . ."

Eventually, TB victims were sent to the state sanitorium at Booneville, and new health regulations made the plant "no worse than most such places. Respectable people began to work there for better wages than we ever got."

A half century after Ethel Edwards' three-year stint at Jerpe's, thousands of people in Washington County and from elsewhere were hard at work in poultry processing plants.

In 1978 Tyson Foods conducted a tour of its Springdale facilities for members of the local media. In the Cornish game hen processing plant, for example, there were 390 workers processing 80,000 hens per day. Of this work force, 35-40 had been employed at least 10 years. Most of the workers were women, both young and old. Dripping birds circulated throughout the area on conveyors. Some women stood on flattened cardboard boxes in order to keep their feet off the damp floor. The conveyor belts moved at waist level, where the women worked elbow to elbow or face to face, cutting and sorting parts, bagging hens, and hanging them on the lines. The roar of the conveyor was punctuated by the steady POP-POP of machines that sealed bags. The women talked as they worked, remaining on the line for two and one-half hours, then taking a break.

Relative to other manufacturing industries, the poultry processing plants have a high rate of employee turn-over. This causes problems in proper training and results in a high rate of on-the-job injuries. In 1976 the Arkansas Department of Labor conducted a survey of these plants. The report (published in 1978) provided the following information about job-related illnesses and injuries: 1) workers with less than one year of service account for half of the injuries and illnesses; 2) about one-sixth of injured or ill are between ages 16-19; 3) more than 40 percent of injuries involved violation of a safety standard; 4) lack of proper training and safeguards and improper supervision are major underlying causes of illnesses and injuries; 5) women make up 80 percent of injured or ill workers; 6) cuts, lacerations, and punctures to the fingers and hands associated with knives, scissors, shears, and saws account for most cases, and these are directly related to the work being performed.

Industrialization and Workers

Poultry processing and related food processing plants have made Washington County one of the five most heavily industrialized counties in Arkansas. The Fayetteville Chamber of Commerce's 1986 "Manufacturers and Processors Directory" lists poultry processing plants in Springdale (Simmons Industries) and Lincoln (Tyson Lincoln Hatchery). Poultry and egg processing plants are located at Lincoln (Appletown Hen Complex, Cargill, Inc., George's Lincoln Hatchery, Sunny Fresh Foods, Inc.); Springdale (Arbor Acres Farm, Cargill Turkey Processing Plant, George's Inc., Simmons Industries, Inc., Tyson Foods, Inc.); and Fayetteville (Campbell Soup).

The Chamber directory lists the number of employees in these plants in general categories. (The plus (+) sign means the figure listed is minimal; the actual number of employees is usually higher.) Plants in Washington County with 100 or more employees include the following, along with dates when the companies moved to Washington County, or in other cases, when they were founded elsewhere in the United States:

Prairie Grove: Universal Electric, 200+, 1979. Lincoln: Sunny Fresh Farms, 100+, 1966. Springdale: Allen Canning, 200+, 1979; Cargill Turkey, 300+, 1955; Easco Hand Tools, 500+, 1970; George's, 2,500+, 1932; Heekin Can, 200+, 1949; Kawneer Inc., 300+, 1980 (architectural aluminum products); National Home Centers, 100+, 1968; Northwest Arkansas Paper, 100+, 1960; Springdale Farms, 300+, 1955; Tyson Foods, 1000+, no date. Fayetteville: American Air Filter, 100+, 1979; Arka-Cola, 100+, 1923; Baldwin Piano & Organ, 200+, 1958; Campbell Soup, 1000+, (1869); Kearney Co., 100+, 1954 (electrical equipment); Levi Strauss, 300+, (1805); McClinton-Anchor, 100+, 1948; Mexican Original Products, 500+, 1951; Standard Register, 300+, 1958 (business forms); Tyson's Entree Division, 300+, 1985.

Industrialization in Washington County has included numerous organizations dedicated to the interests of workers. During the decade before World War I, for example, socialism had adherents in the county. In 1909 the Springdale News stated that J. H. Amacher of Springdale and Stanley J. Clark, national organizer for the Socialist Party, would debate socialism (Springdale News, April 29, 1937). John A. Currie, a Socialist leader from San Antonio, was scheduled to deliver an address at Bates Hall, which was over the Bates Grocery on Dickson Street, Fayetteville. The Fayetteville Daily Democrat (October 5, 1915) stated that the meeting was arranged by local Socialists and that a "large attendance" was expected.

As early as 1924, Julia Ward Pennington of Fayetteville was a member of the national platform committee of the People's Progressive Party (PPP). The politics of the PPP were similar in some respects to the farmers' and laborers' movements for social change that had swept Washington County in the 1870s, 1880s, and 1890s. The PPP opposed the financial tyranny of big financial monopolies and demanded government operated banks that would loan money at low interest rates to ordinary citizens. The PPP also called for "equal rights for women in every walk of life, and legislation protecting the child life of this Nation." In 1929 Norman Thomas of the Socialist Party asked Pennington to serve as national committeeman for Arkansas.

Labor unions have existed for a long time in the county. An ad placed by the Northwest Arkansas Joint Labor Council of the AFL-CIO in the June 14, 1960 edition of the Northwest Arkansas Times stated that a union was formed by seven painters during the 1930s. By 1960, the Council claimed there were 2,500 union members in northwest Arkansas. The nine affiliated unions listed in the ad included painters, carpenters, bakers, meat cutters, food handlers, clothing workers, moving picture machine operators, printers and pressmen, communication workers, and laborers.

In 1987 organized unions are represented in approximately half of the manufacturers and food processors in Fayetteville that employ at least 50 workers. These unions are at Armstrong Tool (Allied Industrial Workers), Campbell Soup (United Food & Commercial Workers), Hackney Bros. Body Co. (United Brotherhood of Carpenters & Joiners), Kearney (Teamsters), Levi Strauss (Amalgamated Clothing Workers), Shipley Baking (Bakery & Confectionary Workers), and Standard Register (United Printing Specialty and Paper Products). There are also unions representing communication workers, public school teachers, state and municipal employees, etc. Altogether, there are an estimated 3,500-4,000 unionized workers in Washington and Benton counties, according to the Northwest Arkansas Labor Council. A major annual event held by the unions is a Labor Day picnic, held at Devil's Den State Park.

Business Centers

Prior to the 1950s, Washington County had no shopping centers other than the traditional town centers like the Fayetteville square. In the days of horses and trains, almost all businesses were located in the centers of towns or near the railroad depots. The mobility of the automobile changed this, as did industrial and population growth. Development of Evelyn Hills Shopping Center by John D. Askew and Carl R. Ferguson was underway at Fayetteville in June 1960. It was advertised as "one of the nation's most scenic shopping centers providing for relaxation while shopping" (Northwest Arkansas Times, June 14, 1960). Northwest Arkansas Mall opened in March 1972, with the Sears & Roebuck store first, Dillard's department store next. The grand opening occurred in October 1972. The first owner of the mall was General Growth Corporation of Omaha, Nebraska.

The movement of business away from traditional downtown centers at Springdale and Fayetteville propelled town leaders into new projects. Urban renewal was underway on Emma Avenue in Springdale by 1967. Demolition of old brick buildings on the Fayetteville square began in 1972. Downtown Fayetteville has now been converted into a legal, governmental, and financial center. The First National Bank Building was completed in 1981, marking the end of one phase of the reshaping of the downtown area.

Bird Study

The residents of Washington County are conservationists. Active membership in conservation groups like the Ozark Society, Sierra Club, Ozarks Highland Trail Association, Arkansas Wildlife Society, Audubon Society, etc.—plus the sale of hunting and fishing licenses—shows that county residents have a keen interest in anything that affects the environmental quality of the area.

Washington County has played a unique role in the study of birds in Arkansas. Albert Lano, a pharmacist from Minnesota, retired to Fayetteville in 1912. He studied birds and led field trips for nature groups and became well-known locally. His ability to identify birds by sound served him well later in life, as he continued his studies even after

Public Libraries

Of course there was a library at the University of Arkansas, but where could residents of Washington County borrow a book? Nowhere, until the Fayetteville Public Library was opened June 15, 1916, with two rooms in the basement of the courthouse. There were almost 2,000 books available by the end of 1916.

In the early years, black residents were allowed to check out books from a small annex library at the black Lincoln School, but were not allowed use of the main library. The library was fully integrated in 1948 (Flashback, July 1964).

Springdale citizens organized their library in 1923, and more than 1,500 books were catalogued within the first year (Flashback, February 1977).

The Prairie Grove library began in 1935 when the community took advantage of a federal Works Progress Administration offer. The WPA would pay the salary of a librarian if the city would take the responsibility of maintenance and improvements. The first books were collected as a result of special benefit shows at the local movie theater. The price of admission was one book (George E. and Essie Wiswell, Centennial

According to Karen Duree, Director of the Ozarks Regional Library, the Washington County Library was organized in 1939, providing services to small communities. By a four to one margin, Washington County voters approved a one mill library tax in 1948. In 1965 the library systems of Washington and Crawford Counties joined to form the Ozarks Regional Library, which in 1987 had 14 branches, including the Rogers Library in Benton County.

he lost his sight. The Christmas Bird Count, which is still held annually, was initiated at Fayetteville by Lano in 1920.

The 1911 publication of Birds of Arkansas by Arthur Howell included numerous observations made by University of Arkansas Professor F. L. Harvey who contributed considerable information to national bird surveys conducted as early as 1882. A second Birds of Arkansas, published in 1924, was written by H. E. Wheeler, a Methodist minister who for years was superintendent of Sunday schools in northern Arkansas. He served as minister at Central Methodist Church in Fayetteville in 1919.

William J. Baerg, who came to the University in 1918, caused a stir when in January 1923 he deliberately forced a tarantula to bite him in order to prove the bite was not fatal. Later, he induced a bite by a black widow spider, which caused him to be briefly hospitalized. Beginning in the mid-1920s, Baerg also taught the University's first course in ornithology and published books on Arkansas birds in 1931 and 1951.

In 1953 the University hired Michigan native Douglas A. James to teach ornithology. He has continued to teach this and other ecologically-oriented courses to the present time. He and another Washington County resident, Joseph C. Neal, collaborated in 1986 in the publication by the University of Arkansas Press of Arkansas Birds.

The knowledge of birds and the conservation of bird life in the county has been greatly assisted by the voluntary efforts of hundreds of citizens. One of the most memorable is Lydia Reed Kimbrough, who served in various capacities in Springdale schools from 1902 to 1956. Although she has primarily been a teacher rather than a researcher, she found time to collect information on local nesting birds that found its way into James and Neal's Arkansas Birds. She obtained a proper permit and made scientific collections of bird nests. She has given talks about birds to garden clubs, school children, and scouts. She has also participated in the local Christmas Bird Count.

University of Arkansas

The University of Arkansas has deeply affected the growth and development of the county since the turn of the century. The University's enrollment formed less than five percent of the population of the county prior to 1940. The student body doubled in size between 1940 and 1950, reaching 4,100. By 1970, there were nearly 12,000 students, or 15 percent of the population of the county. University enrollment peaked at 15,600 in 1980 and dropped to just below 14,000 in 1986.

The University was Fayetteville's largest employer in 1986, and one of the largest in northwest Arkansas. The 2,600 employees included 813 full time faculty members. An analysis of the University's 1975-1976 budget by Professor Joseph A. Ziegler (Springdale News, August 31, 1978) indicated that spending by the University, faculty, students, and staff amounted to a whooping $161 million. This spending accounted for 7,740 jobs, or over 13 percent of all employment in the county, and over 14 percent of all revenues collected by local governments. The University spent $35.8 million, of which $22.5 million went for salaries and wages. Visitors who attended University athletic events spent almost $2 million in one year here. A more recent study by the Arkansas Department of Education indicates that each student generates $20,000 in annual business for the community, amounting to 16-19 per cent of the total annual business activity in Fayetteville.

The University's impact does not end with dollars. It contributes to the

X-Ray

On February 16, 1912, 36 University of Arkansas students were expelled for their part in the publication of an unauthorized newspaper that was critical of University President Tillman, the faculty, and the city of Fayetteville. According to Robert Leflar's history of the University, "Its motto was 'Turn on the Light,' its emblem a crossed hammer and ax, its flower the poison ivy, and it advertised itself as 'the paper without a muzzle.'" county's social, political, and cultural atmosphere. For example, Ziegler noted that in the mid-1970s three of the Fayetteville City Board of Directors were employed by the University. Many others were active in local public school systems. And, if they are not actively serving on boards or commissions, they are often found offering their expertise through lectures, seminars, and workshops throughout the county. In addition, the UA offers plays, concerts, athletic events, and distinguished speakers to the public.

The X-Ray staff had lots of support on campus, for most of the student body boldly signed a petition in support of the 36. A compromise was reached whereby the 36 were reinstated. President Tillman retired at Commencement in 1912.

Students and faculty members are drawn from numerous states and foreign countries, making the campus a melting pot of philosophies, cultures, customs, and political ideas which sometimes differ from prevailing ideas in the rest of Washington County.

Vietnam War Protests

During the 1960s and early 1970s the Vietnam War came to Washington County. As in past wars, young men were both drafted and voluntarily enlisted in service to their country. Some never came home. Unlike previous wars, however, this war did not enjoy universal acceptance at home. There was support for and protest against the war. Debate was intense, especially on the campus, and it spilled off the campus into the community.

In February 1967 Chuck Matthei and Susan Williams, non-violent peace organizers walking through the South, stopped on the campus and initiated an anti-war group that in October became Citizens Concerned About Vietnam. Money was collected to pay for display ads, such as one that appeared in the Arkansas Traveler (March 8, 1967), which called for citizen action to stop the war.

A weekly silent vigil for peace was held on the sidewalk at the corner of Maple and Storer that continued until the end of the war in 1972. A regular mimeographed newsletter called the Vietnam Chronicle was published. One of the leading lights was physics Professor Arthur Hobson. "The war is influencing American society and affecting our country's position in the world and in history. You cannot leave our country's future in the hands of a few leaders. As Senator Fulbright has said, 'It is up to you what kind of nation you want America to be.'" Fulbright, a Washington County native and former University president, was an early critic of the war.

On October 15, 1969, students, faculty, and local citizens held a peace march that started on the campus and ended on the Fayetteville square. On the campus there was a large banner with the names of Arkansas citizens who had been killed in the war. There were 600 people in the peace march, followed by 100 in a counter-demonstration pro-war march. On May 8, 1970, 750 people marched from the campus to the square to protest the killings of students in an anti-war protest at Kent State University, Ohio. This time there was no counter-demonstration. Several hundred protesters sat down in front of the Washington County draft board, and eventually 57 were arrested and taken to the city and county jails for deliberately blocking traffic.

The campus activity that seemed to capture the most attention was "the tree." The affair received considerable local, state, and even national television coverage. On April 14, 1969, 22-year-old Stephen Pollard climbed the cypress tree in front of the old Student Union. He vowed to remain in the tree until the Vietnam War ended, and "people learned to love, rather than kill, one another." Several hundred supporters gathered under the tree. The crowd soon attracted an even

Radio

Engineering faculty members at the University applied for a "wireless broadcasting" license in April 1920. Equipment was installed in 1923, and KUOA was the call signal. In the February 1985 Flashback, Robert H. Clark of Springdale recalled a radio he built from junk and parts in 1922. It was a great marvel. Sometimes as many as 50 people would gather in the Clarks' backyard to hear programs amplified by a large Magnavox horn speaker turned out through a window.

The Arkansas Razorback football team continues to draw big crowds as they have since the 1930s.

The Razorback

"Just how University of Arkansas athletic teams got the name 'Razorbacks' has never been definitely known. . .The name appear[ed] first in the student annual for the year 1911. By the yearbook of 1915, there appeared the first drawing of a razorback. By 1916 the name had become so fully absorbed into Arkansas tradition that the name of the yearbook, which before that time had been called the Cardinal, was changed to the Razorback".

—Arkansas Alumnus, October 1931, p. 19.

greater number of curious onlookers, as well as a small group of counter-demonstrators. Pollard was arrested for trespassing on April 15. Over the next several days his place was taken by a half dozen other students who kept the protest going for a week, until a heavy spring rain brought it to a conclusion.

Cultural Crossroads

The assassination of Martin Luther King, Jr. in April 1968 spurred activities by black students on the campus. A controversy erupted over a black student's letter about King's death. The letter was not printed in the student paper, Arkansas Traveler, and this caused a peaceful but unprecedented disruption of the paper's publication on May 14, 1968, by 70 black and white students.

The political protest that had begun in 1968 soon assumed a more permanent social form. Black students formed Black Americans for Democracy. The first Black Emphasis Week was held April 29-May 2, 1969. James R. Haymon was chairman, and co-chairs were Carl D. Moore and James L. Seawood. "Its purpose is to inform, expose, explain and project the culture and ideas which play an important part in the daily lives of the black man," stated the official program for the week of activities.

The existence and protection of the right to protest, even when it involves a relatively small number of faculty and students, is evidence of the general commitment of the campus community to the maintenance of a free and open marketplace for the mixture of cultures, origins, and backgrounds that makes the campus a vital force in the life of Washington County.

In the past, as in the present, George's Majestic Lounge on Dickson Street in Fayetteville has been a popular "watering hole." Walter J. Lemke wrote a history of George's for the Washington County Historical Society's publication, Flashback.

And of course the cultural differences between the campus and the county at large are not always of a political nature. One of the anti-war protesters of the late 1960s and early 1970s was Gorton D. Hitte, who came to the University as a freshman in 1966. He finished his degree in Social Welfare after the days of protest passed. In Fayetteville he organized a crisis center called the Fayetteville Free Switchboard which provided a variety of social services to the county's poor and homeless, complementing the work of existing agencies like the Salvation Army.

"During these times of transitions, people are becoming more isolated and need someone who will hear their problems out. Unemployment, drug problems, loneliness, problem pregnancies, suicide, venereal disease, family crisis, alcoholism, runaways—these are but a few of the problems," he wrote. He went to graduate school in Little Rock after taking his degree in Fayetteville. He was executive director of the Crisis Center of Arkansas at Little Rock before his accidental death in 1977.

The University is the cultural crossroads for Washington County and for much of the wider area of northwest Arkansas. It is a place where new ideas—ranging from poultry raising to political protesting—make an appearance. It is a place where anyone can sample the rich cultures beyond the confines of the county. There aren't many natives of Washington County who can cook a fine banquet of foods from India, but there are University faculty and students who can. Every year, more than 500 people buy every ticket available for the now famous Friends of India Banquet, prepared by students and faculty members from India.

George's

On February 1, 1927, the Fayetteville Daily Democrat *reported the opening of the Majestic Cafe in the new Lewis Building on West Dickson Street in Fayetteville. The proprietors of the business, which is now called George's or George's Majestic Lounge, were George S. Pappas, his brother John, and George's cousin, Theodore Kauntas. According to W. J. Lemke, in the days before World War II "the Majestic was a sort of student hangout, chiefly because nearly every U of A student could get credit from George. . .When Bill Fulbright became a U of A faculty member, he frequently came down to the Majestic for lunch. Bill distrusted the highly seasoned Greek dishes and always ordered Campbell's tomato soup, out of a can. . ." (*Flashback, July 1965, p. 29).

Photographers

Photographs contribute greatly to our understanding of the past as well as of our own times. In preparing an exhibit on early photography in 1983 the Shiloh Museum staff identified 53 photographers in the county between 1850 and 1915. The earliest the museum could identify by name was Mrs. M. A. Henry who had a studio on the Fayettteville square from 1856 to 1859.

Mrs. S. J. Young had a studio on the west side of the Fayetteville square in the late 19th century and specialized in portrait work. The building that housed her studio still carries her name and is a local landmark.

According to Bob Besom, the photographer Burch E. Grabill came to Fayetteville in 1901, after service in the Spanish-American War. Grabill had a studio on the Fayetteville square. According to Besom, he "took an enormous quantity of pictures of activities in and around the community. Picture postcards became the rage during those years, and no northwest Arkansas photographer produced more postcards than Grabill."

Another photographer, Julius H. Field, settled in the county in this period. Field was attracted here by the writings of William R. Lighton, whose Saturday Evening Post article, "The Story of An Arkansas Farm" (January 1910), concerned Happy Hollow Farm at Fayetteville. Field arrived in 1913 and established a studio on the Fayetteville square. He became famous as an art photographer. According to Besom, "His hard work, innovative spirit, patience, and his ability to find beauty in ordinary things were most often mentioned. The artist made his reputation with a 'soft lens' approach to his subjects at a time when most photo-artists were seeking sharp clarity in their prints" (Flashback, November 1986).

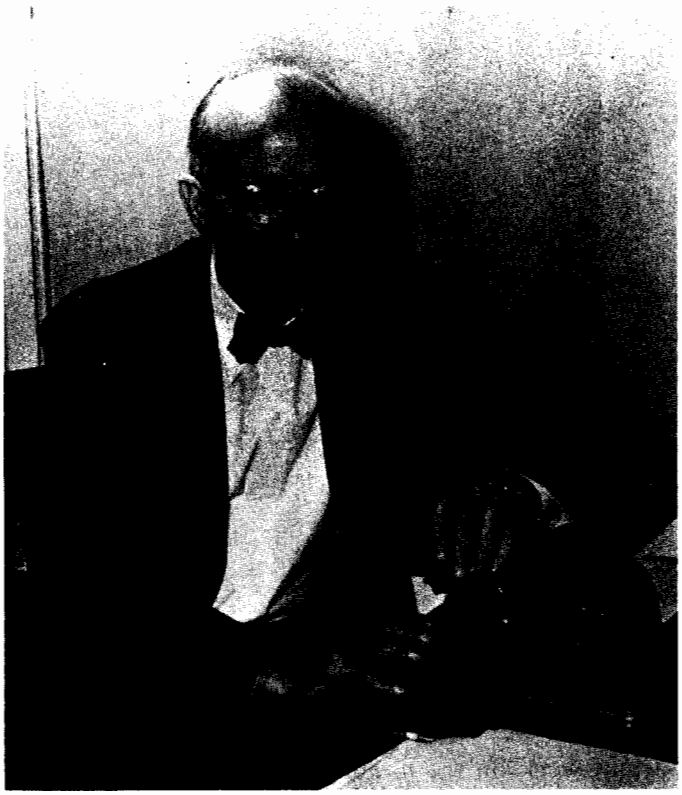
From the "Fayetteville Townfolk Portfolio Project." (Andrew Kilgore)

Andrew Kilgore moved from Texas to Washington County in the 1960s. He learned photography while living here. In 1977 he launched an ambitious project titled "The Fayetteville Town Portfolio Project." The portfolio included more than 500 photographs by spring 1979, when Kilgore opened the first showing. Leslie Parr Sutton, a photographer who grew up in Fayetteville, said, "Kilgore is interested not only in documenting the various people who make up the Fayetteville community, but as he says 'patiently and affectionately' exploring the special qualities that make each person unique." The project brought him a number of awards. Copies of the photographs are now part of the University of Arkansas's Special Collections Department.

Leslie Parr Sutton was employed as a writer and photographer at the Northwest Arkansas Times during the 1970s. In 1979 August House of Little Rock published her photographs in Visits With Ozark Country Women, a series of intimate photographs made in Washington County and elsewhere. Text with the photographs was written by Maribeth Lynes. In 1981 the Winthrop Rockefeller Foundation supported publication of Sutton's photo-documentary entitled Ozark Elders, a study of elderly people. Sutton left Washington County for New Orleans, where she has pursued interests in journalism and photography.

Walter J. Lemke

Washington County has long possessed a sense of its own history. The Old Settlers Picnic at Prairie Grove in 1883 was a celebration of the county's history. In 1889 the Goodspeed's history of Northwest Arkansas included a long section on Washington County. There were 100th anniversary celebrations commemorating the first settlements at Cane Hill and Fayetteville during the 1920s.



Walter J. Lemke was the catalyst and driving force behind the effort to preserve the county's history. In 1951, he reorganized an old county history society. He wrote hundreds of articles and edited the journal, Flashback, until his death in 1968.

Orphan Train

The Children's Aid Society of New York shipped about 150,000 orphans from cities in the eastern United States to foster homes in the rural midwest from 1854 to 1929 (Smithsonian, August 1986). On January 30, 1912, orphans were put on a train in New York bound for northwest Arkansas. These children were placed in homes at Springdale and in the vicinity.

According to Mary Ellen Johnson, who has carefully researched the subject, "Advertisements were placed in newspapers where the Orphan Train would stop, describing the physical attributes of the boys and girls. At scheduled points along the route, selected orphans were lined up on the railway station platforms to be viewed by prospective parents" (Springdale News, January 4, 1987).

The West Fork News, June 21, 1913, stated, "The Children's Aid Society of New York will have a party of children at Prairie Grove June 20. . ."

The Orphan Train Heritage Society of America, Inc., (OTHSA) was organized in 1987 to preserve the history of these unique children. Its founder and director is Mary Ellen Johnson of Route 4, Box 565, Springdale, Arkansas, 72764.

The second important work on the county's history appeared in 1928. Written by William Campbell, One Hundred Years of Fayetteville filled 121 full-sized pages with close-set type. Campbell lived at a time when many old pioneers were still alive. His book vividly portrays the past as well as the bustling town of his own times. Kent R. Brown's Fayetteville, A Pictorial History filled in many visual gaps in the county history upon its publication in 1982.

Was there anything left to say about this land we call Washington County, Arkansas, after Goodspeed and Campbell? Apparently, for on Sunday afternoon, February 18, 1951, Mrs. Lessie Stringfellow Read served as chairman of a meeting whose purpose was revival of the Washington County Historical Society. Those who attended the first meeting were a mixture of natives and new arrivals, county residents and University people—the same potent mix that has made Washington County an interesting place to live.

According to Flashback, Volume 1, Number 1, future plans for the society were presented by Walter J. Lemke, secretary. "These include pilgrimages to historic spots, erection of markers, essay contests for the public schools, and a monthly bulletin" which became the journal, Flashback. It has been published regularly since the first issue in March 1951. The bound volumes fill a shelf three feet wide.

Writer Ernie Deane, who studied journalism under Lemke, published a sketch of Lemke's career in Flashback (August 1979). Lemke was born in 1891 in Wausau, Wisconsin. He came to Washington County in its centennial year of 1928. University President John Futrall brought him here "to expand the scope of the University News Service, and to teach journalism and establish the school's first department of journalism." He accomplished these goals in a short time.

Tom Feathers was a figure in the early years of the Washington County Historical Society, collaborating with W. J. Lemke on the society's many projects.

"A chance stroll through the Federal cemetery at Fayetteville, and discovery of the graves of Civil War dead from Wisconsin and other northern states, aroused his considerable curiosity. Why were these soldiers from so far away buried in northwest Arkansas? From that question in his mind came nearly 40 years of study. . ." Lemke died on December 4, 1968. According to Deane, "His grave is next to that of his wife, Marie, whose assistance to him—including 'cranking' of a mimeograph machine to produce the Flashback—never received the recognition some of us should have paid her."

Lemke's enthusiasm spawned a generation of writers and researchers in local history. Tom and Mildred Feathers, for example, were there at the first meeting in 1951. Tom Feathers and Lemke ran the affairs of the society in its early years. Tom served as the society's secretary-treasurer, editor, vice-president, and president. According to Lloyd McConnell, Feathers and Lemke "combed through many early cemeteries, scratching the moss from the weatherbeaten stones to decipher a name or a date. . .Tom devoted much of his time to ferreting out bits of local history and making them available to the public. . .Tom's work was newspapering, his hobby history and genealogy. He loved to visit with older residents and gather legends and stories told them by their parents and get the material into print" (Flashback, August 1973). Tom organized the campaign that resulted in the acquisition of the Tebbetts House into which the society moved in January 1968. Mildred Feathers gave Tom's books and papers to the society's library, now the Tom Feathers Memorial Library.

In his summary of the society's first 18 years, Lemke wrote that an informal group met each month at the Lemke home, 231 E. Dickson, Fayetteville. "Among those who attended most of the meetings were Miss

Northwest Arkansas Festivals

(This story is taken from a longer article that was written by Bill Lonin and appeared in the April 1988 issue of the Northwest Arkansas Business Journal*).*

April in northwest Arkansas signals more than the peak season of dogwoods in bloom. April also marks the beginning of the area's seven-month festival season—prime time for tourism worth $220 million last year to the economies of Washington, Benton, Carroll, and Madison counties.

At least 22 festivals are slated through October in Washington and Benton counties, with roughly triple that number scheduled in other communities throughout the Ozarks.

The first festivals in the area were started either as artistic and commercial outlets for their participants, or simply as a way for townspeople to gather for celebration. Some, such as the 90-year-old Tontitown Grape Festival, are both.

The Prairie Grove Clothesline Fair is now a function of that city's Lions Club with coordination of the crafts exhibitions handled by Springdale's Arts Center of the Ozarks.

Among the most successful large-

Grace Albright, Mrs. Lessie S. Read, Allan S. Humphreys, Mr. and Mrs. Ralph Shreve, Prof. F. S. Root, H. E. Buchanan, J. E. Bunch, Robert Logan, Dr. Fount Richardson, Cornelia McIlroy Stuart, D. D. Deaver, L. W. Searcy, and many others, of course."

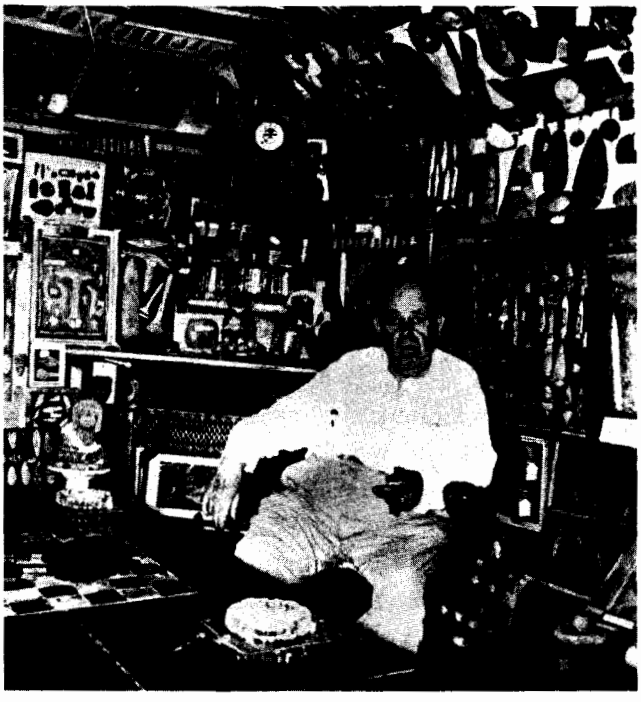
Past president of the society, Pat Donat, began her career in local history when in 1960 she was employed by the Northwest Arkansas Times. She wrote numerous pieces that appeared in the Times' special history dated June 14, 1960 and contributed regular historical features to the Times until her retirement in 1985. She has specialized in editing diaries, letters, and other historical documents. These have been published in the Times and in serial form in Flashback. Her most recent project is a comprehensive index of Flashback.

Robert G. Winn, who was born in the Winslow region in 1903, has frequently contributed historical writings to local newspapers and to Flashback. He graduated from University High School, but even before graduation he had a teaching job in a country school. He graduated from Asbury College in Kentucky, took a masters degree at the University of Florida, and pursued further studies at the University of Southern California. During World War II he served in the Army Air Corps. After living 35 years in California, he returned to Arkansas in 1970.

In October 1972 the Washington County Observer published the first of what has proven a torrent of his writings on local history. For more than 15 years he published a minimum of one historical article each week (and often up to three). His writing has been concentrated on the history of southern Washington County. He has specialized in interviewing older residents of the region and getting their memories of the old days in print. Winn and members of his family took many photographs of the

The Shiloh Museum

Originally built in the 1920s to house the Springdale Public Library, this building at Johnson and Main streets became the first home of the Shiloh Museum in the 1960s.



The late Judge Guy Howard sold his vast collection of Indian artifacts to the City of Springdale in 1965. The collection formed the basis for the Shiloh Museum, which opened its doors in 1968.

Winslow area in the early part of the century. These carefully preserved photographs have matured into a treasure trove, furnishing images for his stories and books like the recently published Railroads of Northwest Arkansas.

Shiloh Museum at Springdale opened its doors on September 7, 1968. The featured exhibit was the Howard Collection of Indian artifacts (Flashback, November 1968). In 20 years, Shiloh Museum has developed a wide-ranging program that features all aspects of the history of northwest Arkansas, including outreach programs that carry history to the public schools. Under Director Bob Besom, the museum is raising funds for a new, expanded museum complex.

scale community events are two held each year in Springdale—the four-day Rodeo of the Ozarks ending each year on the Fourth of July and the Albert E. Brumley Sundown to Sunup Gospel Sing, held the first weekend in August at Parson's Stadium.

Two area festivals are held in Fayetteville—Springfest, a day of fun in late April sponsored by the Pride In Dickson Street organization, and Autumnfest, a three-day event held the weekend prior to the War Eagle rendezvous. Fayetteville's third festival is the area's longest lasting (17 days) and most unique—the Music Festival of Arkansas scheduled for June.

Walter Lemke would have appreciated the growth of the Shiloh Museum. Had he lived into the 1970s, he would have been pushing for preservationist causes like the Big Spring Historical District established at Fayetteville and the Shiloh Historic District at Springdale, just as he pushed for preservation of the Tebbetts House, now home of the society he revived. He would have appreciated the crowds that turned out at the new home of the University Museum when it opened there in November 1986. He would have been proud of the fact that workers, researchers, and officials of museums and libraries throughout the county serve as officers or board members of the Washington County Historical Society.

Walter Lemke's eyesight was failing in the months before his death. He asked his former student Ernie Deane to take over editing Flashback. Deane, then teaching at the University's Department of Journalism, agreed while noting that "Nobody can really take 'Uncle Walt's' place as the editor of Flashback."

According to Deane, Walter Lemke "was ever mindful of what he considered every current generation's responsibility—to preserve what is good from the past so as to pass it on for the benefit of generations of the future. This theme became almost a religion with him."

CASH PAID FOR WHEAT, HIDES &

Business Profiles

Introduction

From early times businesses have grown and prospered in Washington County in spite of three wars and the Depression.

The natural beauty of the area, the wildlife, the climate, and the friendly people have attracted both young and old — university students, retirees, and tourists — all of whom are important elements in business development.

The University of Arkansas in Fayetteville, as well as business, industrial, trade, and technical schools, provide business and industry with educated and trained workers. The College of Agriculture at the university is very important in the development of improved agricultural practices, a superior poultry industry, and modern food processing plants. Health care facilities and private professional practices have experienced the growth necessary to care for the increasing population. The trucking industry has provided the transportation so necessary for trade.

Contributors to this section of the book have expressed pride in their accomplishments and, in doing so, made it financially possible for the History of Washington County to be published. From the early general store to space age industry, the evolution of the county's business and industry is told in these pages.

AQ Chicken House

Springdale's Landmark Restaurant

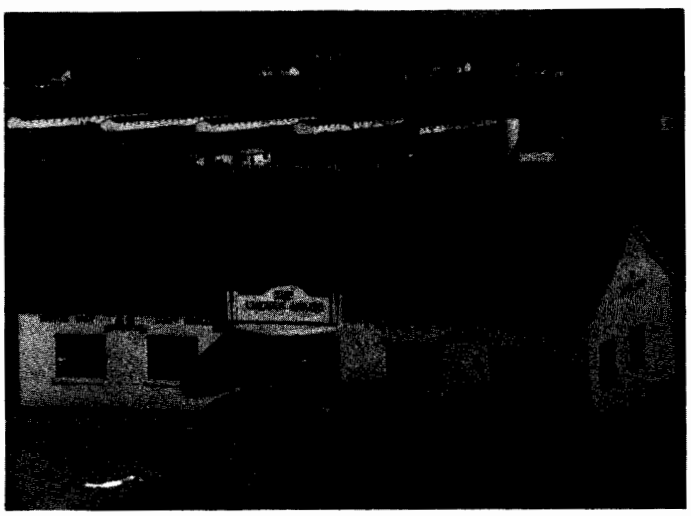
Ron Palmer, owner of the AQ Chicken House in Springdale, is planning to celebrate the 41st anniversary of his restaurant on July 20, 1988. AQ is a Springdale landmark eating establishment located on Highway 71 at Sanders. Set right on a hill, you can spot its green roof as you drive into Springdale from the north.

AQ's forty years of service is noteworthy as only a few food establishments live to see their first anniversary, and less than 5% see their fifth birthday. Such statistics serve to increase Palmer's appreciation at being able to celebrate AQ's long term good fortune.

Roy C. Ritter is the original owner and founder of the AQ which opened it doors in 1947. "Roy was a pioneer in the poultry industry as well as a noted civic and community leader. He served as mayor of Springdale for two terms and on the Board of Trustees of the University of Arkansas. He began with his own AQ Poultry Farm and the customer's chicken dinner came from just 'down the hill' in back of the restaurant.

If you doubt things have changed, Mr. Ritter's original 1947 menu priced a half-chicken at 65 cents, a cup of coffee was five cents, and you could mail AQ's menu to a friend for three cents," Palmer said.

Palmer purchased the business on April 13, 1981. There had never been a thought that one day he'd own AQ or any restaurant. He attended Southern Illinois University in Carbondale and obtained a Doctorate Degree in psychology. He was a professor at Northern Illinois University for 12 years. He married Marlene Mandich (children Allison and Lindsey) and proceeded to design, build and sell houses as an avocation.

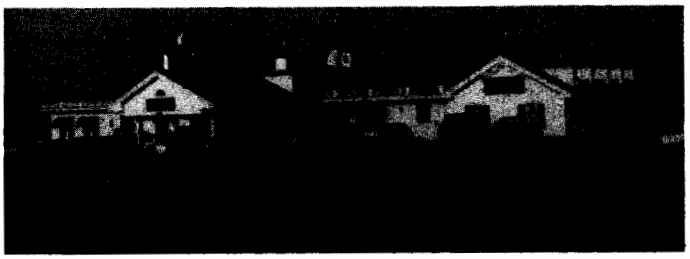


1947 - A. Q. Chicken House.

After visiting northwest Arkansas in 1980, he realized that if he owned AQ, he could combine a successful business with a strong sense of history along with his building interest. "AQ lent itself perfectly to renovation, and the Georgian Farmhouse look complements the exterior. Total renovation of the interior was undertaken in 1987, and several additions were completed bringing the seating capacity to over 400.

"Norman Barker, a creative Springdale building contractor, remodeled the entire AQ building inside and out during the mid 1980s. His Victorian fretwork interiors have won the admiration of all and serve as a testimony to Ozark craftsmanship. He is presently building an addition to the south side of the building to house two additional dining rooms," Palmer said.

"We've begun to matte, frame and display all the memorabilia from AQ's past: menus, awards and numerous magazine articles," Palmer added.



1988 - A. Q. Chicken House.

It is Palmer's feeling that you cannot replace AQ's 40 years of history, and he feels the ongoing responsibility to preserve it for generations to come.

In the center of the lobby your eyes are drawn to a sculpture of "Ozark Red" done by Keith L. Black, a widely known artist from nearby Prairie Grove. The large rooster, in bronze, has become a tradition in northwest Arkansas. It is widely believed "Ozark Red" has mystical qualities. By rubbing its wattles, fame, fortune and maybe just a little "good luck" will be yours.

No self-respecting resident of chicken country dares admit not knowing what wattles are. But, for the record, wattles are the loose, red skin that hangs in folds on each side of the neck of a rooster.

The AQ's long term goal has remained "To be what an old fashioned dining experience should be." The restaurant prides itself on the fact that it still makes most everything from scratch. Four decades later the word "Homemade" remains very much a part of AQ Chicken House. Food is prepared by people who have been in the kitchen forever. Joe Blasi, AQ's very capable general manager, has over 25 years experience in the food service industry. Jerri Broyles, dining room manager, has eight years of service and is known by all who frequent the AQ on a regular basis. Belva Axton, Irma Larkins, Sheila Porter and Nell Freeman also contributed greatly to the growth of the AQ during the 1980's. Marshall Bowerman has managed AQ's kitchen for over 28 years. Raymond Clardy just completed 25 years, and his wife, Lela, spent 33 years making AQ's famous cloverleaf rolls. It is estimated that Mrs. Clardy has "pinched out" over 20 million rolls during her tenure with AQ. Palmer fells that kind of long-time commitment could be rarely achieved by his "giant" corporate competitors, and the AQ is very lucky indeed to have such dedicated personnel. Therein lies the "secret" to AQ's longevity—local people dedicated to making a business work.

Fresh chicken, pan-fried in a big ol' iron skillet, old time chicken and dumplings, real butter and bread—these simple and honest foods remain the real reasons why people from all 50 states have found their way to AQ Chicken House. Believe it or not, the things that worked for AQ in the 1940s, works just as well in the 1980s.

"Back then we used to peel potatoes and bake fresh bread daily, and that's exactly what we're still doing today. We believe our customers want good food and friendly small-town service at a fair price and not a parade of coupons and other media hype," Palmer pointed out.

The guest register shows that yearly the AQ is visited by travelers from all 50 states. While the AQ enjoys a large tourist following, the majority of its business comes from northwest Arkansas families that began eating here many years ago and continue to do so but now bring their children and grandchildren. One customer, Mac McCarty, an independent insurance agent, has rarely missed a day coming to the AQ in the last 28 years. The AQ has been featured in the Ford Times, Chicago Tribune and over 20 other publications.

Over the years the AQ has managed to gather its share of awards. The restaurant is especially proud of the "People's Choice" award given yearly by Arkansas Times Magazine. Year after year, the people of the state of Arkansas have chosen the AQ as having the "Best Fried Chicken" in Arkansas.

"We value this award because it is the people of the state who recognize us as being good at what we do," Palmer commented.

Serving over 300,000 meals a year is no horse and buggy operation, but Palmer never wants to grow beyond the individual care and personalized service that his restaurant has always given. He claims that this is the most important difference between his restaurant and other franchised food establishments who bow to the pressure of fast, frozen and microwaved foods along with a standardized limited menu.

Palmer feels there will always be a place for the independent restauranteur with a real sense of attachment to the community. When you say "Springdale" to out of towners, they usually ask you if the good ol' AQ is still there. Being around for forty years makes us inseparable from Springdale. The restaurant and the town sort of grew up together.

For nearly twenty years AQ advertised only by word of mouth, one of the few restaurants that could survive without a marketing plan. No money was spent to promote or sustain its growth, and still it continued to grow. AQ occupies a niche in the history books as being one of the "First" in the restaurant industry to specialize in fried chicken.

"We were around for about 20 years before "the Colonel" and all the rest," Palmer said.

With a little luck, the AQ just may make it into the next edition of this history book, although Palmer says he will settle for another 40 years.

To answer the question most asked regarding the AQ logo—What does the AQ logo stand for? It's "Arkansas Quality."

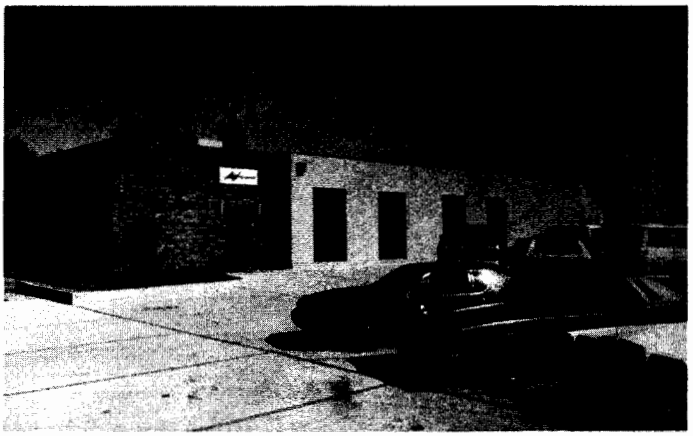
Aero Tech United

Aero Tech is a growing aircraft turbine (jet) engine repair and manufacturing company that was relocated in Springdale, Arkansas, by its owners in 1980. The company became the only business of its kind in a region dominated by poultry processing and trucking industries.

The idea of Aero Tech originated with Calvin (Cal) Conrad and Robert (Bob) McGee who were employed by F. A. G. Bearing Corporation in Joplin, Missouri, in 1979. McGee was in charge of the services building and Conrad was the plant manager. While there, the two men, along with Walt Bridges of Oklahoma City, decided to start their own turbine engine repair company. After extensive research Conrad and McGee moved their families to a site in Oklahoma City and started Aero Tech United with Walt Bridges. Their first job was the J57B series turbine support repair for Tinker Air Force Base in Oklahoma City.

In 1980, T. K. International (T. K. I.), the Tulsa based turbine engine parts repair company that bought Aero Tech in 1981, was searching for an area to reduce the costs of repairing turbine engine parts for military and commercial engines in the United States because of increasing competition. T. K. I. hired Cal Conrad, a graduate metallurgical engineer and former T. K. I. employee, as a consultant to investigate the Springdale-Rogers-Fayetteville area as a possible expansion site for the company.

While McGee and Bridges continued Aero Tech operations in Oklahoma City, Conrad came to the Springdale area to study possible building sites and manufacturing information for T. K. I. In addition, Walter (Bud) Catron, acting manager, and Carl Hall, T. K. I. president in 1980, flew to Springdale and completed surveys on employment with the state and local agencies, housing and real estate availabilities, all inclusive with the conceivable financial gains of expanding the repair portion of its business.



Home of Aero Tech United.

After Conrad had completed his location and manufacturing survey, he was so impressed with the Washington County area that he decided to move Aero Tech United to Springdale in 1980. Walt Bridges remained in Oklahoma City serving as a salesman for Aero Tech. Continuing the company as a family business, Conrad and McGee leased approximately 1,000 square feet of the present Aero Tech building from Joe Edwards, a local builder at the time, and moved their equipment from Oklahoma City. The original eight family employees consisted of Cal Conrad, his three sons, Bob McGee and his two sons and Walt Bridges. After their move Tinker Air Force Base contracted with Aero Tech additionally to repair the J57C series turbine support repair.

T. K. I. bought Aero Tech United from its original owners in 1981, and Aero Tech became a subsidiary of T. K. I. Conrad remained as Aero Tech's general manager until March of 1985, when he left to work for Teledyne, an aircraft-related company in Neosho, Missouri. His sons, Curtis and Kevin, are still with Aero Tech as a quality control manager and an inspector. McGee is currently the manufacturing manager. His son, Bruce, is a welder, and Kent is the supervisor of the machining department. Walt Bridges left T. K. I. in 1984 and is employed by Teledyne.

Don Webb is a machinist using a "T-Lathe" to remove excess metal from the forward flange just replaced on an Air Force J-57 Exhaust Case.

NORDAM, an aircraft-related company, based in Tulsa, Oklahoma, bought T. K. I. in 1983. Aero Tech United with its initial corporate parent joined the NORDAM family. Upon the NORDAM purchase, Aero Tech United adopted "A Tradition of Excellence," the theme of its new owner. At the home office in Tulsa, NORDAM occupies a 500,000 square foot facility, and engineers repair flight control surfaces as well as other commercial, helicopter and military aviation parts. Its range of capabilities is extensive on an international level, and among its affiliate companies are Lori, T. K. I., Aero Tech United and World Aviation Associates.

Upon Cal Conrad's departure from Aero Tech in 1985, he was replaced by Bud Catron, who now serves as the company's vice president and general manager. At the time of Catron's arrival, the Aero Tech facility was primarily in the military aircraft engine repair business. It has since added commercial airline repair accounts, increasing that portion of the business to 30 per cent. "The nature of our business is such that we do process engineering and repair development work on the parts of turbine engines used by the military and commercial airlines," Catron Said.

He explained that Aero Tech engineers will develop and write a repair process for a particular engine part for an airplane and then produce a prototype of the repaired part. It is then remanufactured or repaired, depending upon the nature of the repair needed. They also produce new parts for turbine engines.

Another recent manufacturing capability for Aero Tech United is luxury seat design and production for private executive jets. A patent is pending on this mechanism. Installed, the seat rotates 360 degrees and the back folds down to the full horizontal position. Falcon Jet Company in Little Rock, Arkansas, is one of an increasing number of original equipment manufacturers and completion centers in these luxury seats. Aero Tech does not sell this product directly to consumers, but to original equipment manufacturers and completion centers such as Page Avjet Corporation in Orlando, Florida. Another commercial addition to Aero Tech is an executive-type divan for the same luxury aircraft.

Jeff Maggard is a machinist operating a computer-programmable lathe. He is working on the replacement detail for an Air Force TF-30 Turbine Air Seal.

Aero Tech and NORDAM share members of the board of directors. Aero Tech still works closely with T. K. I. and both are part of the NORDAM group. The chairman of the board of directors for Aero Tech United and NORDAM is Ray Siegfried, II, and Charles Ryan is president of both companies. Catron is the only member of the board at the Springdale plant, although Mr. Siegfried and his family enjoy Springdale and annually attend the Rodeo of the Ozarks.

Since its inception as a family business in 1979, Aero Tech facilities have been enlarged to 35,000 square feet and have grown into a multi-million dollar corporation in seven short years, generating large amounts of revenue into the Washington County area. In 1990, at the end of the present three-year lease, Aero Tech plans to move to its own 50,000 to 100,000 square foot building to be built on property owned by the company located east of Springdale airport. Presently Aero Tech provides employment for 90 area residents and also utilizes community businesses whenever possible for their product support and supplies. A few examples of the many local firms used by Aero Tech are Tri-Bar Tool and Supply, M & F Office Supplies, Sun Ray Sanitation Services, Southern Supply, Inc., and C. Mayo Sheet Metal, Inc.

Although Aero Tech does not service any customers in Springdale, it does contribute financially to numerous charity organizations. The company's employees often devote their free time to participate in charity sponsored events. Among those organizations that Aero Tech generously supports are Shiloh Museum, The Arts Center of the Ozarks, and Springdale United Way Fund. The company was awarded the United Fund's Bell Ringer award in 1985 for the most improved employee contribution rate in Springdale, and in 1986 Aero Tech United received the United Fund President's Trophy for the highest average individual employee contributions in Springdale. The company matches employee contributions.

Aero Tech was one of the first financial supporters of a video produced by the Springdale Chamber of Commerce. Catron, representing the company, serves as a board member on both the United Fund and Chamber of Commerce boards of directors. He is also Co-chairman of the Employee Division of the United Fund for 1987. In his words, "We don't sell anything in the area, or take out revenue, but contribute to the community by providing employment, participating in charity events and community affairs and utilizing local firms whenever possible. We also pay taxes."

Antaeus Institute

"Committed To The Evolution of Medicine"

In 1958 there were no local pathology laboratory services available to northwest Arkansas. Hospitals and doctors in private practice awaited results from laboratories in St. Louis or Atlanta.

It was to this need that the doctors Nettleship expanded their dream of "the evolution of medicine" and made the decision to return to Fayetteville and provide such a service and to offer a teaching facility that would make possible the growth and insure the availability of modern medical space age technology.

It had been 10 years earlier, in 1948, that Dr. Anderson Nettleship had founded the Antaeus Lineal Research Associates in Little Rock. Its purpose was to encourage a greater interest in biological research by offering a program for exceptional students who desired a career of medical excellence.

Nettleship accomplished the nearly impossible. At a time when fellowships, scholarships and grants were scarce, he worked through Pulaski County to obtain the needed funding for students from 1948 through 1958 and offered a program through his institute.

It was in 1952 that Mae Banwell and Anderson Nettleship were married. Both had been pre-med students at the University of Arkansas and had gone on to Johns-Hopkins to receive medical degrees and to pursue their specialty field, pathology.

Mae Nettleship had been born in Windsor, Ontario, but fell in love with Arkansas as well as Anderson Nettleship. That same year (1952) she became an American citizen.

Anderson Nettleship had been born in Fayetteville, and Fayetteville was an academic center ideally suited to teaching and research, so in 1958, they decided to expand the laboratory operation to this area and maintain an affiliation with the Little Rock institute.

The ideal location (a wooded, natural environment tucked away from the main road) had been made possible through Anderson Nettleship's grandfather, Judge Hiram Davis. It was from the land first homesteaded by his grandfather, that Nettleship deeded the city of Fayetteville 14 acres on which the Antaeus Institute and Laboratory (located at 2740 North Gregg) is built.

"Anderson was born within hundreds of feet of this lab. People in the area will remember the house. For a while it was a well-known restaurant called "The Farmer's Daughter," Dr. Nettleship said.

Often asked about the choice of name for the laboratory, Dr. Nettleship explained that her husband had been the dreamer in the family, the romanticist. The Greek God Antaeus had been known to have the same qualities, but his feet were firmly planted on the ground just as her husband's dreams had always been firmly rooted in basic medical research.

The dream of an Antaeus Laboratory in Fayetteville was realized in 1959 when Lichlyter and Company constructed the original one room that was used by both doctors and their two laboratory technicians. It has expanded twice since then in 1963 and in 1971. Antaeus now employs between 25 and 30 divided almost equally between lab and clerical employees.

From the beginning, it was Mae who traveled back and forth five days a week to their first customer, Harrison Hospital in Boone County. Those days she and Anderson put in 10 and 12 hours a day, seven days a week.

City Hospital and Washington Regional Hospital were next to use the lab's services. Dr. Mae Nettleship still speaks with the same enthusiasm that was a part of their dream thirty years ago.

"Every case, every specimen, is an unsolved mystery. Research still holds the same excitement today as it did then. We have better equipment, computerized readouts and medical technology developed mainly through NASA and similar space programs that enable us to work faster and with a greater degree of accuracy," she said.

Anderson Nettleship's devotion to research and study was recognized throughout the United States. In 1969 his recognition included appearing on the front cover of the official journal published by the American Association of Cancer Research.

Mae Nettleship plays down her own achievements but does point with pride to one accomplishment hitherto unknown in the annals of Rotary Club history. She became the first female Rotarian and was received into the Fayetteville Rotary membership in 1988. It was because of the Rotary Club's work with alleviating worldwide hunger and disease, that Nettleship decided to buck the (men only) system and become active in Rotary and offer them her services.

Not primarily "joiners" both doctors were more involved with developing study programs to be offered through Antaeus. Studies included pre-medical and medical student fellowships and post-doctoral studies in pathology and other medical specialties. All programs offered were designed to stimulate the students' own interests and abilities and were not structured to keep them from pursuing their own ideas but encouraged them to use the gifts that had enabled them to qualify for the program.

A specially designed lab has areas for gross examination, microtechnique, diagnostic cytology (A full-time cytotechnologist is employed who specializes in Pap smears.), routine chemistry, special chemistry and toxicology, radioassay, microbiology, and virology. An excellent library was available to the students while they studied.

At present, Antaeus works closely with the Northwest Arkansas Radiation Therapy Institute (NARTI), monitoring their oncology patients closely.

Nettleship claims that the patient consultations are one of the most rewarding areas of her job since it affords her the opportunity to continue teaching and reassuring the patient in regard to his or her own body and its recovery.

Another affiliation with the University of Arkansas is in the area of research on retro-viruses found to cause malignancies in chickens. This study has become even more important these last few years, since the discovery that this virus is a cousin to the AIDS virus.

Anderson Nettleship died in 1981, and Mae Nettleship continued with their work. In addition to being director of Antaeus, she is medical director of Washington Regional Medical Center Laboratory, Fayetteville.

"I think the greatest misunderstanding about operations such as ours is the skepticism so prevalent in a world of materialism. It's hard for the average person to believe in an institute that is devoted to study and research and not in dollar figures on a ledger sheet," Nettleship said.

Upon her retirement (not yet imminent), Dr. Mae Nettleship wishes to continue her work on a voluntary basis combining it with travel to countries in need of new research methods and procedures but can ill afford them. Continued study will remain a part of her future with such rapid improvements and discoveries in the field continuing to be made.

From birth to death, laboratories like Antaeus perform and fulfill a vital service for humanity. Blood and tissue specimens answer medical questions today that were unthought of even ten years ago.

Antaeus was ahead of its time when it started originally in 1948. It still looks to the future. It is in just such laboratories that new developments are made to improve the quality of life. From examination of embryonic tissue to post-mortem tissue examination, come answers for which questions have not yet been voiced.

Anderson Nettleship's own words express it well: "Medicine sticks it out whether through wealth or depression, whether through intellects or anti-intellects, whether through political storms or wars. It sticks it out because the values which derive from the patient himself and his cure have their own basic meaning. The success of medicine depends entirely upon its attack and cure of disease; American medicine does this superbly. A new and effective medicine is reaching out in this country, a new comprehension of just what medicine is. This is not tied to the individualistic, dogmatic, fire-breathing physicians of old (for heaven's sake, that was often all they had to go on). Tomorrow's medicine is instead a new acculturation phenomenon. Our hopes are that the better qualities to be found in our society are to also be found in medical practice."

C. Stanley Applegate, M. D.

For more than 100 years the family name Applegate has been a familiar one to residents in Northwest Arkansas. It was first associated in the area with Applegate Drug which was founded in Rogers in 1881, but more recently with Dr. C. Stanley Applegate, Jr., of Springdale and the Springdale Clinic.

Following the Applegate family line, however, takes one thousands of miles away from northwest Arkansas and hundreds of years from the late 19th century. In fact, one can reach back 12 generations from the Applegates of Springdale in 1987 to John Applegate who lived in Butterwick on the Isle of Axholme in England in 1500.

John had a son, John, who fathered six children, the youngest of whom was Thomas, who had a son also named Thomas. It was this Thomas Applegate, born about 1600, and great grandson of John Applegate of Butterwick, who sailed to the English colonies around 1635.

Thomas made a home for himself in the New World, gaining a license from the Massachusetts Bay Colony to operate a ferry between Weymouth and Braintree. He married and produced a son, Bartholomew, who then settled with his family in Middlesex, New Jersey.

Applegate Family.

The Applegates dug their roots into the New England soil and stayed put for a couple of centuries—through Bartholomew's son, Daniel, and his son, Bartholomew, and his descendant, Jacob, and his son, William, and his son, Jacob Irons Applegate, and his son, Timothy Page Applegate.

Timothy, however, married Eliza Clark, a woman from Johnson County, Indiana, and began to move west. Timothy and Eliza took up farming, settling near Lawrenceville, Illinois. The farm, unfortunately, wasn't large enough to support a family of eight children, so two sons, J. E., (also called Joseph) and Fred packed their bags in 1881 and headed even further west, lighting first near Joplin in southwest Missouri. Finding no work, they boarded a train on the Frisco Railroad and disembarked at Brightwater, Arkansas; from there they caught the mail hack into Rogers (then known as Escalaypia). And in Rogers they found a business opportunity which became the anchor for the Applegate family in northwest Arkansas.

In late 1881, the two men, both trained as pharmacists, bought the Pennington and McNese Drug Store, a one-story frame building fronted by the only board sidewalk in town. The business, renamed Applegate Drug, was one of the first businesses in Rogers.

A romantic sidelight to this story underscores the difficulties in long-distance communication during those years. Before leaving Illinois, J. E. asked Fred to carry a message to Anna, a proposal of marriage. Fred put the letter in his coat pocket and promptly forgot about it for several months. Not until he donned his good coat again to attend a wedding did he remember the letter, and meeting Anna at the wedding, presented it to her.

J. E. Applegate Home in Rogers, Arkansas.

When J. E. did not hear from Anna for so long a time, he began courting another girl in Rogers. Likewise, Anna, hearing only silence from J. E. in Arkansas, began seeing another young man. That is, until she received his proposal. Then she acted quickly, writing him immediately. When J. E. got Anna's letter, he also responded with haste, catching the train to Lawrenceville and marrying Anna on December 3, 1884, more than three years after having left.

Anna and J. E. had eight children born during the late 1880s and early 1890s, all of whom were trained as pharmacists, except one daughter who died at 13. Of the remaining seven offspring, four had children, five of whom survived childhood.

And of these five, one was Charles Stanley Applegate, Jr., born June 23, 1920, at Ft. Smith and raised in Rogers. He attended public school there and graduated in 1938 after quarterbacking the state championship football team in 1936 and playing on a team that went to the State Basketball Tournament in 1937.

The summer after his graduation, during the last years of the Depression, Applegate worked on a farm in Clarksville for his cousin J. B. Puterbaugh. He was paid $2.50 a day, one dollar of which he set aside for his college education. Those saved dollars, each one matched by his father, amounted to enough to send him to the University of Arkansas at Fayetteville that fall.

Jeanne and Stanley Applegate

He graduated from U of A in 1942 with a bachelor of science degree, after having worked summers at the Welch Grape Juice Plant in Springdale as a chemist. During the school year he jerked sodas at the university student union, a job which entitled him to a free lunch. Transportation between home and school each day cost him a quarter.

Applegate entered Medical School in Little Rock where he spent the remaining years of World War II, in the Army Specialized Training Program, graduating in May 1945. The next month he married Jeanne Lanahan of Hot Springs, daughter of Col. Charles R. and Martha Walker Lanahan. Their children, Jo Anne, born in 1946, and Charles S. Applegate, III, born in 1948.

During those years immediately after the war, Applegate seemed constantly on the move. After a year's internship in Little Rock, he was assigned as a First Lieutenant in the Army Medical Corps at the Army-Navy Hospital in Hot Springs working in orthopedics. Following that was a year in Korea at the 71st Station Hospital, also in orthopedics.

In 1948, he was discharged from the service. Dr. Applegate returned to northwest Arkansas and opened a general practice office in the old labor camp on East Caudle Avenue in Springdale.

The year 1953 was a major one in the life of the Applegate family. In March, both Jeanne and an infant son died in childbirth. A few months later, during the summer, a poliomyelitis epidemic broke out in Springdale. At the time there were just four doctors practicing in the area, including Applegate. Of those four, Dr. John W. Dorman and Dr. Ed Wheat both came down with polio and ended up in the hospital. That left Applegate (who believed he had polio as a child) and Dr. Friedman Sisco to handle the crisis. Dr. Applegate called on Dr. John Ralph Power of Nashville, Arkansas, recently discharged from the Army, to help out in the emergency.

After the epidemic passed and Dr. Dorman recovered, he, Dr. Power and Dr. Applegate joined in forming the Springdale Clinic. They moved the practice into a new building on Meadow Avenue in February of 1954.

A year after the death of his wife Jeanne, Dr. Applegate married his first cousin, Annabel, daughter of Timothy Page and Maggie Floyd Applegate.

Annabel raised Jo Anne and Charles, as her own. Jo Anne later married Chester Vogt and had two children, Michael Charles and Emily Ann. Charles married Jan Boyd; their son Jason Andrew was born in 1975. In 1984, at age nine, Jason received a "Recognition Plaque" from the Boy Scouts of America for "quick thinking that enabled him to save a life." He had performed the Heimlich Maneuver on a friend who was choking on a piece of butterscotch candy.

Annabel and Stanley Applegate.

Dr. Applegate continued in general practice at the Springdale Clinic until he semi-retired in 1986. During those years he found much to do in the community. He served as president of the Washington County Medical Society, the Arkansas Medical Society and the Springdale Chamber of Commerce; he was co-founder and president of the Springdale Savings and Loan; he served on the boards of Ozark Guidance Center, the Springdale Housing Authority, the Shiloh Museum, the Arkansas State Medical Board, the Springdale Industrial Commission and the Arkansas State Chamber of Commerce. He was president of the Springdale Medical Staff on three occasions and has served as elder at the First Presbyterian Church.

Barnes' Livestock Trucking

Local Trucking Operation Specializes in Livestock

Barnes' Livestock Trucking Company, Fayetteville, is one of a handful of such specialized hauling operations in the United States. Howard Barnes, owner and founder of the company, made the giant leap from trucking produce to hauling livestock in 1958.

Barnes wasn't one to sit around waiting (and spending money) from one delivery to the next pickup. Instead, he chose a seven day a week business that doesn't require waiting over the weekend, until Monday, between pickups.

Barnes' Livestock Trucking hauls purebred cattle from Angus to Zebu and even livestock as exotic as llamas. The rarer the breed, the more profitable it can be. Barnes hauls between 10,000 and 12,000 head of cattle every year.

"Looking back, 1954 and 1955 was a pretty good time for me. I bought my first truck to haul produce, and then in February of 1955 I married a Springdale girl, Barbara Hilburn. I've gone through a lot of trucks since then, but I still have the same girl," Barnes said.

"Those first 15 years, I was on the road, and it was a longer haul for Barbara than for me. She practically raised our three children alone. Neither of us miss that time. I have six Peterbilt Trucks and hand picked drivers to do the hauling now," he added.

A map on Barnes' office wall is dotted with red, white and blue push-pins that criss-cross the entire map. These colors indicate where livestock was sold, to be picked up and the delivery points. Barnes was quick to explain that six trucks logging over six hundred thousand miles a year have to rely on a marking and tracking system from the first contact by phone over the WATS line to the final delivery.

Colored pins dot the map as far north as Canada, east to beyond Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, west to California and south to the Mexican border.

"We don't go into Mexico, but we're permitted to haul in the 48 continental United States and five Canadian provinces. Let me tell you, that's why I handpick my drivers. I insist that they all come from ranching or farming backgrounds. I tell my drivers that they have to be able to think like and outthink the cow," Barnes said.

"A cow may drop her calf while you're halfway to your destination. The driver better be able to pull off the road and handle it, or find a good vet that can," he added.

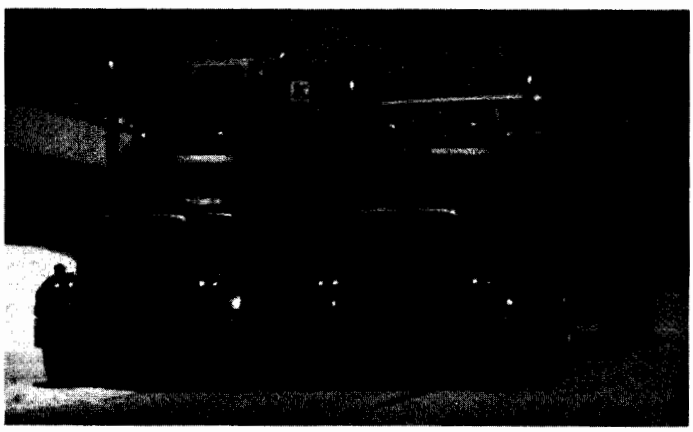
One driver that Barnes trained himself has been with him for 21 years. His name is Billy Tomlinson. He's clocked more miles hauling livestock than any other driver in North America (according to Barnes), and Barnes doesn't doubt his ability to handle any situation that might come up.

On the lighter side, a business dealing with rare breeds of animals affords Barnes and his drivers to meet celebrities that might otherwise never cross paths. On more than one occasion, Barnes has done business with such notables in the music world as Mel Tillis, Teddy Gentry and Randy Owens. Others include: David and Peggy Rockefeller in New York, Bunker Hunt of Texas, Sammy Davis, Jr., and Barnes even found a bull for Johnny Carson a few years ago.

Barnes and his wife look forward each year to attending the big rodeo held in Calgary, Canada. It's held every year during the second and third weeks in July, and they go as often as they can. Livestock auctions take place at this time, and it is an ideal way to spend time visiting with good customers.

Repeat business with customers like Wesson Farms, Inc., Koshkonono, Missouri; Schweitzer Simmental, Geyser, Montana; and Worrell Land and Cattle Company, Charlottesville, Virginia; is responsible for a big part of the Barnes' hauling business, but new customers are sought and welcomed too.

Howard Barnes



Barnes Livestock Trucks

Barnes mentioned that formerly good ranching areas in Texas and Oklahoma have been hurt by depressed oil prices and have cost his company some business the last couple of years.

According to Barnes, fall is the busiest time of the year for cattle hauling, and everyone in his company is expected to be on call at that time. They haul from one to six loads a month (each load requires a week). All six trucks and drivers are pushed at this time of year to handle the animals, some of which are worth up to six figures.

One way the company helped insure trucks a full load for such long hauls, is the recent expansion of its 4,000 square foot facility in Fayettevile. They, only recently, constructed a building with holding pens that can feed and water up to 70 head of cattle. These cattle can wait in the holding area until a truck pulls in that is headed in the right direction to add them to its load.

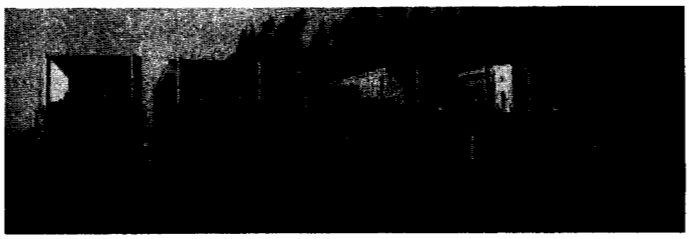
Barnes' two sons, Bobby and Steven (Bo), are active in the business, while daughter, Karen, has a career as a physical therapist and lives and works in Tulsa. Both boys can and do drive trucks, but Bobby prefers to remain at the office where he does all the purchasing of trucks and equipment and oversees the maintenance of trucks and equipment. Bo, on the other hand, enjoys filling in for a driver on a long haul. When in the office, Bo is the dispatcher.

Barnes commends both, saying they make a good team. He never hesitates to leave the business completely in their hands when he and his wife are away. "Bo can figure the weight on a load of cattle to the ounce, and Bobby has this office running without me with no problem. That isn't to say that I'm ready to retire just yet," Barnes adds.

"Did I mention that much of the cattle we haul are from quarantine stations at Newburg, New York and Key West, Florida? That's one reason our trucks have to be kept as clean as we keep them. As a service pleaser, I'd keep them clean anyway. Customers like to know that their animals are going to arrive at their destination healthy and in good condition," he continued.

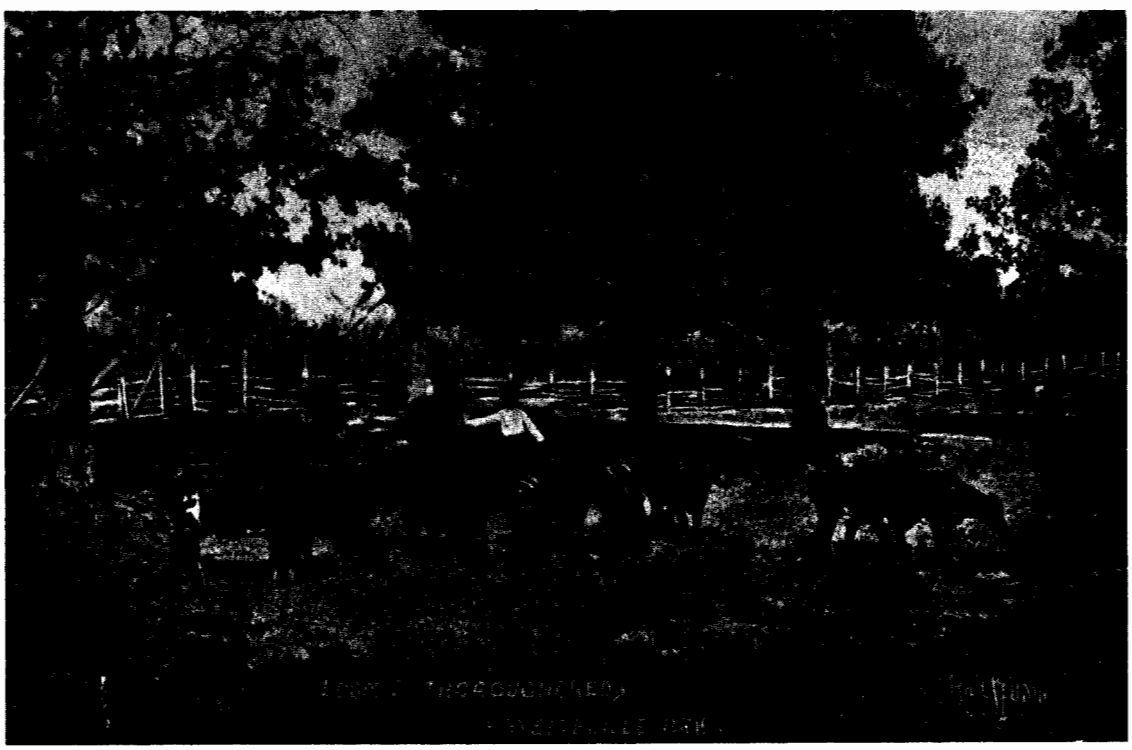
Another customer pleaser was the addition of custom built trailers with portable partition gates to separate any amount of cattle to be hauled as they are being loaded or unloaded. The gates are particularly good for separating animals that are incompatible.

However, the one system that best assures a smooth ride for the cattle is an air-suspension system installed for their safety and comfort throughout the entire ride.



Barnes Livestock Trucking Fleet

Barnes claims to have no plans to expand, at present. If and when he does, it will be to meet the customers' needs. "I guess I've thought about the customers for so long that I don't have the chance to think about retiring. If I ever do retire, I'll raise some of that purebred cattle we haul. Barbara and I will have more time to travel, too. But for now, I like coordinating business from my desk here in the office. I can't think of a better life. Either way, hauling them or raising them, it couldn't be better," Barnes concluded.



Beasley's Fruits and Vegetables

Three Generations of Family Business

Families like the Beasleys did what they could and what they had to in order to feed their families during the "Great Depression." It was a time when you traded foodstuffs for services, for goods, for livestock and for labor. Money may as well have been obsolete, there was so little to be seen. The Beasleys did not go hungry.

Alf Beasley about 1938.

Alf (short for Alpha) and his twin brother Cash, as the youngest, were the last of the Beasleys to leave home and remained there until their father's death. The family home and acreage were left to the twins.

Cash married first. He married Gladys Neal, a cousin to the girl his brother Alf would later marry. Cash kept the family home for his new bride, and Alf took his share of the property in 20 acres of apple orchards and 10 acres alongside what would later become Highway 71.

Alf had planned to build his own house on the property before the crash of 1929 occurred (Black Monday on Wall Street).

Apples grew in abundance over the acres of orchards Alf inherited, and he tended them and the grape vineyards. He shipped out the harvested crops to canning factories by the carload. He loaded and hauled and wholesaled and retailed, and times were good until after 1929 when the bottom fell out of the stock market.

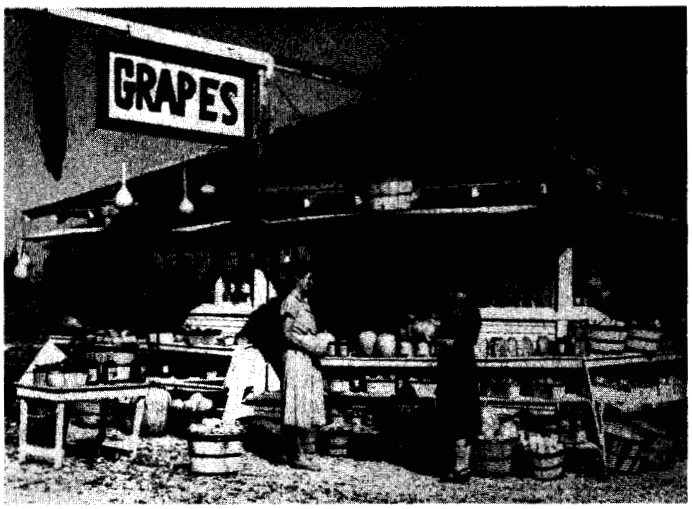
Alf married Minnie Parham, cousin to Cash's wife, and built a large barn he'd patterned from his older brother, Bob's barn, built a garage for his truck, a brooder house and chicken house, going into debt for $600, no small sum for the times. He would later acquire his brother Bob's property, but shortly after his marriage, paying off the $600 was uppermost in Alf Beasley's mind.

Never one to think negatively, Alf simply proceeded to remodel, and finish the inside of the garage he'd just built, added wiring, had a phone installed, dry stored his apples and vegetables in the barn and reworked a plan to earn his living.

"Alf gave me my first job in Springdale. I'd come over from Oklahoma, at 18, and needed work. He put me to work right away picking and sorting apples. He was really particular about the sorting, but I always did a good job for him," Minnie Beasley recalled.

"When we married, he knew how much having a nice home meant to me, because I'd been an orphan—always living in someone else's home, wearing someone else's clothes. He'd promised me a big, beautiful home. I knew he'd keep that promise, and I didn't mind working alongside him in order to make that promise come true," Minnie Beasley (now in her 80's) added.

Norma the oldest daughter, was born in that converted garage in 1931, Imogene in 1934, postponing that dream of a larger home a little longer. The girls were never a regret to either parent, they simply fired greater ambition in their father to provide for them.



Mrs. Howard Clark and Minnie Beasley (1960).

In 1931 before Norma was born, part of Beasley's acreage was needed for the completion of Highway 71. The timing seemed right for Alf to open a permanent business place to sell his produce. He opened his roadside stand north of Springdale alongside the new, well traveled Highway 71.

"Times were so bad that Mom used to tell us how people would pay them with saddles, clocks and even hunting dogs. Dad was in business year around. When fruit and vegetables weren't in season, dairy (he had his own cows) products and eggs were sold. People had to eat, and Dad could use about anything anyone brought in for payment. He even sold from the back of his truck, door to door," Norma Beasley said.

According to the Beasley sisters, they remembered the first fruit and vegetable stand well. It consisted of four posts in the ground, some two by fours with tarps stretched across them. It was after Imogene was born that the tin shed and later the "square market" were built.

"Once we had a store building with floors and a roof, we began selling a line of pottery, some china (from Japan before the war started), baskets, souvenirs, and we were licensed to sell souvenir beer and wine. The Arkansas wine was mostly from Tontitown. We had to be careful to see that 'souvenir' beverages were not opened or consumed on the premises," Norma recalled.

According to the Beasley sisters, Alf was never one to put all his eggs in one basket. When his own apple orchards played out, he simply sold apples from neighbors and surrounding orchards. Most times he didn't have to pick up the fruit and vegetables to sell, it was brought to him.

By 1938, he had bought an additional 40 acres from his brother, Bob, and added another 60 to 70 head of cattle to those he had. He kept a horse or two, some hogs and, of course, still had chickens and cows.

Alf was ready to build the house he'd promised Minnie. The next promise he made was to buy her a new car. The war (World War II) came along before he could keep that promise. But within three years Alf and Minnie had earned enough to pay off the house and the acreage he'd bought from his brother, Bob.

Minnie Beasley, in addition to doing the purchasing, opened and closed the market seven days a week. Still, she managed to find the time to make apple cider and grape juice to sell.

All this time, through fruit, vegetables and souvenirs, Norma was learning how to run a business at her mother and father's side. "I always had a business sense and learned how to count and make correct change before I started school," Norma said.

"I milked cows every day from the age of nine until I was a senior in law school. I do not miss the frustration of having the cow kick over the milk or the sting of its swishing tail filled with cockleburrs. I prefer corporation board rooms. There may be a few cockleburrs to remove, but it's air-conditioned, and if there is spilled milk I don't cry, I've learned to work it to my advantage," Norma added.

Beasley's Fruits and Vegetables

The girls remembered the war years as a time when soldiers (traveling to and from Fort Chaffee and other U. S. bases) stopped at their roadside stand to buy souvenirs. Norma learned about supply and demand watching her mother choose merchandise during these years. Once the war ended and demand changed, the Beasleys went back to the original business of selling fruits and vegetables produced by them and their friends and neighbors.

Imogene remembered how she avoided working at the stand whenever she could, preferring to wash dishes and make beds at the house.

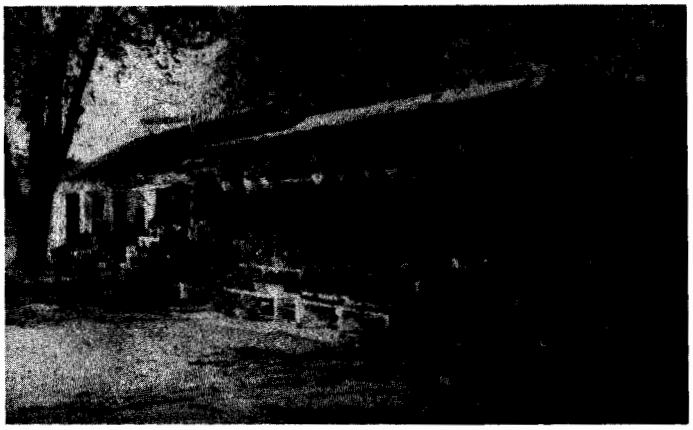
After the war Alf Beasley bought a new truck as soon as automotive production started up again. His old truck was falling apart. Norma remembers being dropped off at school and having to unwire the passenger door in order to get out of the old pickup.

True to his word, once the truck was paid for, he bought Minnie a new car. Times became tight once more when Norma finished high school, at 16, and went on to the University of Arkansas, Fayetteville and began her pre-law studies.

"To make matters worse, Dad had arthritis and used a cane to walk, but after that he was struck down with a series of strokes. Mom and I worked hard at the business during those years, but once I'd entered my senior year of law school, I had to knuckle down at my studies. So I sort of left the business to Imogene and her," Norma said.

Norma Beasley received her law degree at age 21 and took a job with an oil company in Tulsa before going on to graduate studies at Southern Methodist University in Texas.

The business continued to prosper through the years while Norma was away in Dallas (earning her first million before age 40) and while Imogene married and raised a family. Alf died in 1961 and Minnie carried on alone at "Beasley's Market."



1976, the old shed.

Rod's Produce, 1986.

In 1974, Minnie decided she was ready to retire and turned the business over to Roderick (Rod) Mayse, Imogene's son. Imogene worked with her son in the Beasley family business. She managed to develop more interest in the business than when she'd been a child, and she pitched right in to help Rod expand the business. Rod and she updated the market and added refrigerated coolers and modern showcases. They expanded their selection to include fruits and vegetables from all over the United States. They added flowers, flower pots, flowering plants and vegetable plants to their inventory of produce and made up baskets of fruit and other specialty Christmas items for Christmas trade each year.

Rod's expansion and changes included changing the name "Beasley Fruits and Vegetables" to "Rod's Produce." The once small tarp-covered makeshift stand had grown to a produce business that required 4,500 square feet of space under a roof. Rod Mayse kept Rod's Produce in operation until March 1986.

Imogene, her husband, Bill Mayse and her sister, Norma Beasley, own acreage on Beaver Lake at Hickory Creek. They plan to develop it together.

Both Beasley sisters have watched the growth and development of northwest Arkansas and believe that they will be able to find business opportunities to develop regardless of financial times to come.

In hard times or in plenty, the Beasleys will set goals, fulfill dreams and make it possible for each succeeding generation to make a better life in Washington County.

Bell International

A True Arkansas Success Story

W. L. Bell, Jr. wasn't new to the trucking industry or International Harvester. He had worked for International for 30 years. But, he was ready for a greater challenge.

W. L. Bell, 1972.

In 1969, he decided to tackle the truck business on his own so he purchased the Motor Truck Factory Store in Springdale. When he bought International Harvester's company store, he became one of the first cooperative dealers for International in the United States.

Bill Bell was no stranger working with International, having served as the company's branch, zone and assistant district manager in Oklahoma City, and as district manager in Little Rock and Kansas City, Missouri.

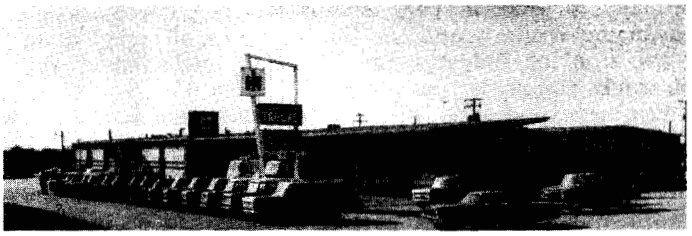
As a young man, Bill worked in his father's International dealership in Illinois in the 1930s.

Bill and his partner, Joe Helf, began their new company, Bell International, with a line of light farm equipment, some industrial equipment, and medium to heavy-duty trucks such as Scouts, pickups and four-wheel drive vehicles. In its first nine months, the company grossed $1,619,325.

By the early 1970s, the company had dropped its industrial line of equipment. The firm concentrated instead on its line of medium and heavy-duty trucks and lawn and farm equipment. Eventually, Bell international discontinued handling lawn and farm equipment.

At the time, the average cost of a pickup was $5,000, while a heavy-duty model could be purchased for $8,000.

During his years with International Harvester, Bell often took his son, Mike, with him on the job. Mike is now president of Bell International. As a high school student at



Bell International, 1971.

Putnam City High School in Oklahoma City, Mike traveled extensively with his dad on his trips for International. The positive influence of his dad and the International company stuck with Mike.

In 1966, after a year at the University of Arkansas, Little Rock, Mike joined the Navy Sea-Bee's and shipped out for Viet Nam. As a member of construction Battalion 301, he built roads, working on Road HW-1, Dang Ha Quang Tri from 1968 to 1969. It was during this time that Mike developed the leadership philosophy which he now practices at Bell International.

"I learned early in life from my dad that I had the choice to either lead or follow," Mike said. "When I was in the service, I definitely decided to be a leader."

After finishing his tour of duty, Mike moved to Loveland, Colorado, and drove a truck for Wonder Bread. He quickly realized the position was not in keeping with his career goals, so he moved to Memphis, TN. He worked in the parts department of Memphis Factory Branch. Mike also resumed courtship of his Little Rock sweetheart, Polly Kinsel and they were married in August of 1969.

Working in Memphis for International was like going home, even though times were lean for Mike and his new bride. By the end of the year, they were managing to make ends meet. Meanwhile, his father's new company was also beginning to make ends meet.

Bell International, Inc.

In 1971, Mike accepted his father's offer to join the company and started as a salesman. When Mike joined the dealership, the firm had just over $2 million in gross sales. Mike remained in the sales department until 1977—he seemed to have found his niche in his father's company.

By the mid-1970s, Bell International borrowed enough money to retire its debt to International Harvester. Sales were booming. Joe Helf sold his 20 percent interest in the company to Mike in 1977. It was Jimmy Carter's second year in the White House and the beginning of deregulation of the trucking industry. In 1979, Bell International sold 450 trucks and gross sales topped $17 million.

But recession was just around the corner. And a workers' strike against International from 1978 to 1980 spelled near-disaster for International and its dealerships. For almost 10 years Bell International had a solid, steady growth, but by 1980, the company's sales had dropped to 35 trucks and $7 million in sales.

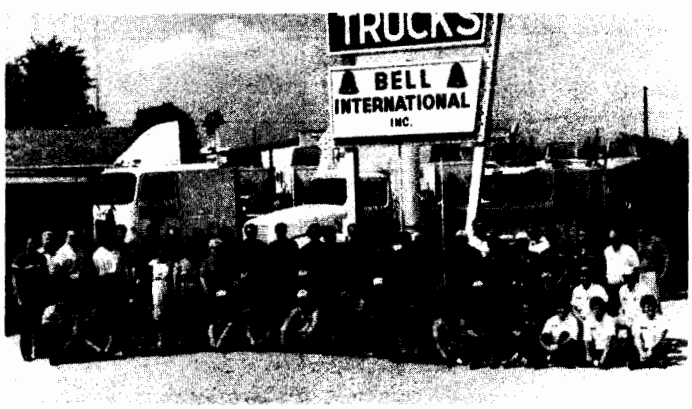
Bell could not get the trucks or parts it needed from International. The entire trucking industry was in chaos, which affected businesses from coast to coast. Some of Bell's customers went under, including Big Three Transport, Inc.

"There were occasions when we had to repossess equipment." Mary Wright, vice president and business manager, said. "It was a bad time for everyone. But when times were hard, Mike was very loyal to the employees and to our customers. Loyalty to each other is what not only made us successful, but it also got us through the hard times."

"Mike has always kept the employee's welfare in mind when making business decisions," Wright commented. "Because of this loyalty, we have had a low employee turnover, and in fact we have had two generations from several families—fathers and sons working together," Wright added.

By September of 1981, some corporate restructuring was in order for Bell International. W. L was 63 years old and suffering from diabetes. He had turned the management of the firm over to Mike. Since the firm was suffering from the effects of the recession and the strike, it was decided the dealership should reorganize as a single proprietorship.

Because International felt that single ownership of the firm was essential for Bell to weather the crisis and acting on his philosophy of leadership and the principle, "He who hesitates is lost," Mike borrowed enough money to purchase his father's interest in the company. W. L. Bell had the satisfaction of seeing his son take control of the company he founded and guide it out of its crisis.



Employees of Bell International, 1987.

Despite the strike and the recession, International Harvester had developed a new, efficient truck in response to yet another crisis: the fuel shortage of the 1970s. The trucking industry in northwest Arkansas was changing in favor of more non-union companies and general freight carriers. Bell International saw an opportunity in the new trucks.

In the early 1970s, Bell International's growth was primarily a result of selling refrigerated units to the area's poultry industry. It was time to expand that base with International's new line of fuel-efficient, general freight trucks.

J. B. Hunt Transport, Inc., of Lowell, was one of the first major trucking lines to recognize the value of the trucks. In 1982, Bell sold 300 trucks to J. B. Hunt. The sale to Hunt represented most of the 500 trucks Bell sold that year.

By the end of 1983, the company sold another 500 trucks, the parts and service departments came out of their slumps as well, and the company was back on its feet.

In 1984, the president of International Harvester visited the Springdale dealership that had gone from the bottom of the performance list to number one in sales for the entire nation.

Bell International was the top International Harvester dealership in North America that year, remaining in the top position every year thereafter. W. L. Bell was able to witness his company's tremendous success before his death in 1984.

Later, Mike Bell saw another opportunity. He expanded corporate services in northwest Arkansas in 1985. Under Bell Investment Corp., Mike added a truck-leasing division—Bell Rental and Leasing Corp. Mike, as sole owner of Bell Investment, selected Larry Barnes to manage the truck-leasing division. The corporation has experienced steady growth during the past two years and is now a million-dollar company.

Bell expanded once again in 1986. Mike negotiated with Jim Harrell to purchase Harrell Motor Company of Russellville, AR. The new satellite dealership, which handles International trucks by Navistar, is run by Dennis, one of Mike's brothers. The Russellville dealership is housed in a 12,000 square-foot facility which was built in 1981.

Since 1984, "growth" has been Bell International's watchword. Growth not only in sales, but in services and now, facilities. "When you sell 250 trucks in one month and they have to be routed from our facility all over the area, you have a dilemma," Bell said. "Although we're in a good location for visibility on Highway 71B, the traffic is so heavy it's murder getting on and off the highway."

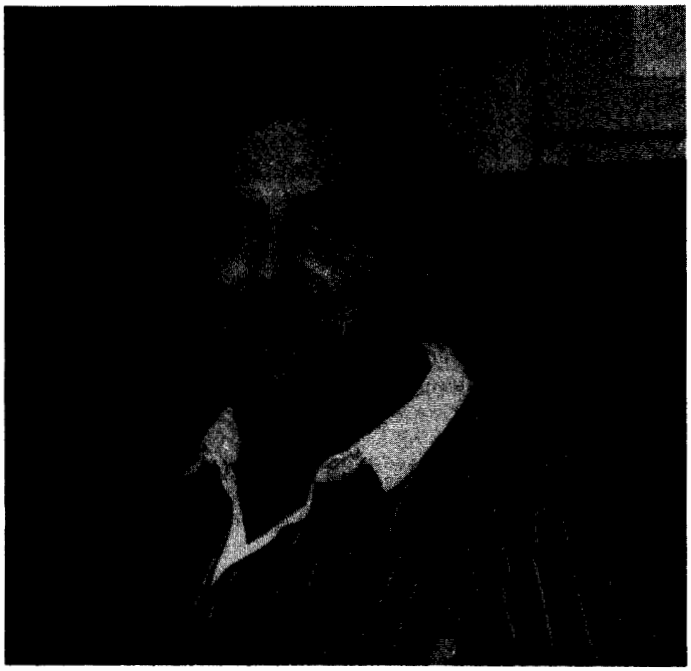
The firm's location is the original 20,000 square-foot facility located between Highway 71B and a shopping center. To ease the space problem, Bell rented the old Tyson Foods' facility across the highway, but it still isn't enough for the burgeoning business.

Bell International recently purchased 22 acres on Highway 68 West in Springdale in order to build a new facility. "We have to build," Mike pointed out. "We're out of room. Plans are already on the drawing board, and we hope to begin construction with the new year."

From boom to bust to boom, Bell International has seen it all.

The need for more space also stems from the fact the company now has 105 employees, up from the 29 it had during the dark days of the early 1980s. Bell believes his employees are one of the major reasons the firm survived the recession and the strike. "We surround ourselves with good, honest people," he said. "You don't do it all alone, you have to have people you can trust working for you. We're continuing to add top notch employees as we continue to grow."

Max Gilmore and Doyle Reynolds (1986).



Mike Bell, President of Bell International, Inc.

Bell International and its owner have attracted many loyal, competent employees. Mary Wright has been with the company for 20 years, starting before W. L. Bell bought it in 1969. She has been a business manager for the dealership for ten years and is considered the "brains behind the company," according to Mike Bell.

Bill French, who also joined the company when it first began, is vice president of parts and sales, while Ralph Bookout, a 10-year veteran, is vice president of maintenance.

Doyle Reynolds began as a lot boy with International Harvester and worked with W. L. Bell. He joined Bell International when it began and is now vice president of sales. He has also been the top truck salesman for Navistar in the United States for the last three years.

Max Gilmore is another top salesman with Bell. Gilmore, who has been with Bell International for 11 years, has been the number two salesman in the U. S. for the last three years.

In January of 1987, Ten Mundy retired from Navistar as regional manager of the southwest region, which encompassed Oklahoma, Arkansas, Louisiana, Colorado, New Mexico and Texas. After 30 years with Navistar, Mundy began a second career as vice president and general manager with Bell International.

Mike's four brothers are also members of the firm. In addition to Dennis, vice president and manager of the Russellville dealership, Bill works in the parts department, Tim is in the sales department, and Pat works in the service department. Pat is planning a teaching career in Colorado in the near future.

The firm's capacity for pulling through hard times and its ability to expand is attributed in part to the overall growth of northwest Arkansas, according to Mike. The trucking industry and northwest Arkansas have changed, and so has Bell International. Today, almost 95 percent of the trucks Bell sells are for general freight hauling.

"There's a great demand for good truck drivers and mechanics now," Bell said. "That, coupled with the growth in this area and deregulation of the trucking industry, has really boosted our deliveries."

Last year, Bell sold over 1,500 units, some of which sold for as much as $60,000, a far cry from the $8,000 average per unit when the firm began in 1969. The company sells trucks ranging from two-ton models to heavy-component models with 80,000 pound capacities. Bell ranked fourth in the western region in parts alone for 1987.

"When you have $100 million-dollar in total sales a year and a $15 million inventory in any given month, it's big business," Mike commented.

From a million-dollar gross in 1969 to a project $100 million in 1987, Bell International serves northwest Arkansas, and the nation, as one of the largest franchise dealers for International trucks, parts, and service.

Brown's Dry Wall and Supply

Dennis Brown's successful business career has been built on a foundation of belief in himself, his ability and his willingness to work hard.

Growing up in Walnut Ridge, Arkansas, Dennis Brown came to Fayetteville in 1960 to attend the University of Arkansas and major in Business Administration. A year later the 19 year-old Brown decided the best way to put himself through college was to put his construction skills, learned while working several summers for his step-brother Buddy Phillips in Chicago, and his classroom learning into practical application by starting a dry wall business. This was indeed a bold and daring decision for someone not yet old enough to vote.

At first Brown had to drum up business by going door-to-door, taking calls at home and working out of his car. With such a relentless desire to succeed, he has built Brown's Dry Wall & Supply into the largest and oldest dry wall business in Washington County.

Brown's Dry Wall and Supply Company.

In his first year, Brown made about $8,000—a healthy sum in those days. By 1963, Brown, a senior at the U of A, had established such a solid reputation for doing quality work at competitive prices that he got the sheet rock job for the largest largest apartment complex in Fayetteville, the Skull Creek Apartments. To do the job he hired eight people.

With the volume of work rapidly increasing by '63, it became necessary and possible to find a home for the business away from home. So Brown moved to Springdale and rented the old concrete plant on Christian Avenue. By 1968, he was able to hire a manager, Clarence Du Rell, who stayed with the company until he retired in 1983.

Then in 1970, only nine years after the business began, Brown purchased some property at 1507 West End St. in Springdale and built a 4,800 square foot warehouse. With this acquisition, and with the business experiencing a steady growth, Brown decided to broaden the business into retail sales, and began to sell dry wall tools and materials. Thus, the name of the business became Brown's Dry Wall & Supply. In 1974, Brown had his best year ever, this despite the recent oil embargo and the recessionary shocks it sent through the national economy. Certainly, he had chosen wisely in establishing his business in the fast growing northwest Arkansas area.

During the early seventies, Brown not only did many jobs in Washington County and region as a whole, the company also worked jobs in Oklahoma, Louisiana and Texas. On one job in Oklahoma City, he had over 100 employees. The pace of the business, however, was becoming so strenuous, and the growth of Washington County and the surrounding area was becoming so strong, that between 1975-76 Brown quit bidding on jobs in other states and worked solely in northwest Arkansas. In 1978, Brown incorporated the business and built another 4,800 square foot warehouse.

Getting ready for a day's work.

After Du Rell retired in 1983, Brown hired Stanley How to manage the business. The duties of the manager encompass bidding jobs, scheduling oversight and retail sales. The company's secretary and treasurer is Mary Linda Brown, Dennis' wife of 25 years. Her dedicated involvement has been instrumental in the company's success. Looking back on where he started from, Brown takes great pride in the fact that today he is able to provide his employees with medical insurance, holiday and sick pay, and a profit-sharing plan. In a business which sees many companies come and go almost overnight, the stability and longevity of Brown's Dry Wall & Supply is indeed a significant achievement.

Today the company is a $2 million business, with a 50/50 split between contract business and retail sales. For the first ten years, Brown said he could seal a contract with a handshake. Today everything about the business is larger, faster and requires the necessary legal trappings of a formal contract. While he maintains active control over the business, Brown is now able to dabble in investments, handle rental properties and spends a lot more time with lawyers. The latter is the price of success.

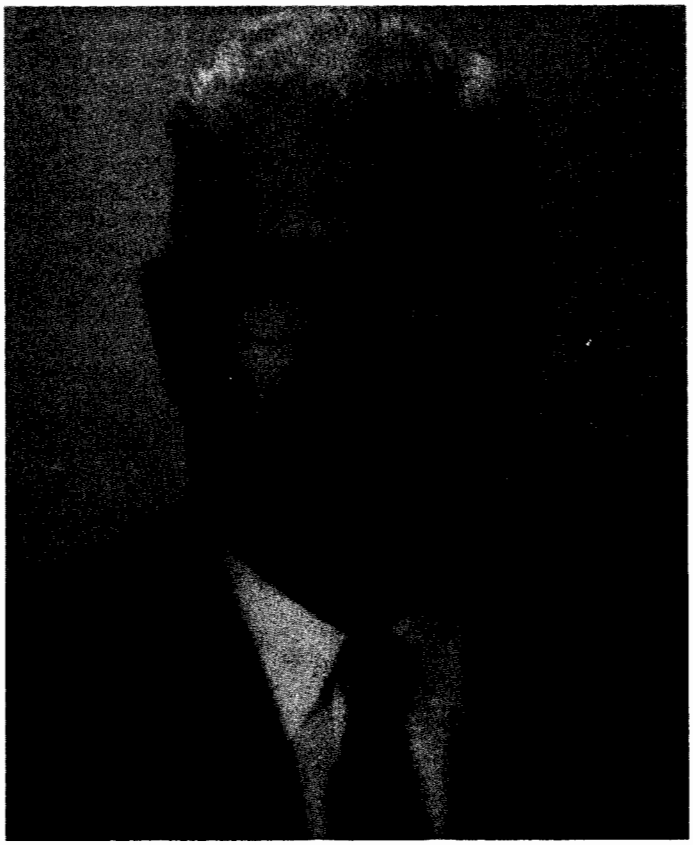
Over the years, Brown's Dry Wall & Supply has grown in conjunction with the steady growth of Springdale and Washington County. Going into it's 26th year of operation, the company has never finished in the red. This is remarkable considering some of the difficult economic times in the recent past for the construction business. Likewise, it is a testimony to the hearty economic climate of northwest Arkansas.

While his company has been a force in the Washington County construction industry, literally working on thousands of homes, apartments and commercial buildings, Brown does not attribute his business success to any genius on his part. He considers himself to be a typical working man who has been fortunate enough to work with hard working and generous people.

"There is no way I can thank all the people who I owe so much to in building my business," Brown said. "Everyone had a real willingness to work hard and work together. I don't think I could have done this in a place like Los Angeles or Chicago. I have a deep appreciation for the people of Washington County and northwest Arkansas."

Jeff D. Brown
Poultry Pioneer

In northwest Arkansas it was the hatchery that came first, and the first commercial hatchery in Springdale was the result of Jeff D. Brown's hatching chickens in the old 1921 oil-burning incubator that he acquired.



Jeff D. Brown

Anna Eva Guest Brown

It was often pointed out by Brown that the apple worm came first, before chicken or egg, putting an end to the apple growing business in northwest Arkansas. This made it possible for Brown to help bring in the poultry industry to replace the dying apple trade.

Brown met his wife, Anna Eva Guest, in the little Mt. Hebron Church. According to Brown's daughter, Earlene, her mother thought him the best looking boy with the cleanest overalls of all the young men attending services. They married in 1921. They went to Springdale in a horse and buggy with $40. Brown purchased some acreage and went into the apple orchard business.

Jeff Brown had been one of the farmers affected by apple worms and disease, but since he was from a family of nine children, had spent most of his childhood helping his mother raise chickens on a farm between Cave Springs and Lowell. He knew he would be able to make a go of the chicken business.

No novice, he experimented with feeding and hatching chickens in his effort to develop a superior bird. At the time, Springdale had a population of 2,263 (1920 census).

After eight years (from 1921 through 1929) of perfecting feeding and hatching techniques with the old oil-burning incubator, Brown applied for a $700 loan from "Tip" Deaver with First National Bank, Springdale.

"Tip" was convinced by Brown that the broiler industry could mean big business for the area. The money was a down payment on a 10,000 egg capacity Jamesway Electric Incubator. This would be the first time electric incubators were to be used in the state of Arkansas.

After selling "Tip" on the idea, Brown then had to convince poultry growers to use the methods he'd developed to produce better chickens from eggs hatched in an electrically heated, controlled incubator (with forced air ventilation) from selected stock.

Brown opened Springdale's first commercial hatchery for business in 1929 at 126 North Mill Street (later moved to East Emma Avenue). Never one to back off from a challenge, Brown convinced the chicken growers to try his methods of increasing production and growing better birds. By 1930 he had doubled his hatching capacity. His wife, Anna, worked beside him helping in any way she could.

He continued to increase production again in 1935 to 58,000, and by the fall of 1936 added Brown Brothers, Fayetteville, co-owned and managed by Earl Brown. His DeQueen hatchery was opened in 1938 with Burnie Hill, managing it. By 1936, Brown was producing 94,000 chickens of superior quality.

Brown was the first hatchery man in the area to test his flocks for disease and infection. He'd cull out the weaker chickens, continually improving the stock.

Convinced that his chickens were a product of both special care and feeding, he hand mixed the feed for his flocks until the demand for his special mixture grew to the point where he had to manufacture his own line of feed and mashes.

This meant another trip to the bank, but nothing succeeds like success, and it took little convincing to obtain the money from "Tip" to carry some of the growers until they were receiving a return on their investments and could pay for the feed.

It wasn't long before other mills and hatcheries were popping up all over the area. Arkansas soon began attracting interested poultry growers from other areas trying to learn from Springdale experts how to improve the poultry industry in their states.

While Jeff was building a poultry business, Anna was very busy with community and church work. She served as chairman of the local migrant ministry, served as president of the Women's Society of Christian Service and held several offices at district conference level of the United Methodist Church.

The poultry industry continued to grow, and with it came many other related industries. Cattle and grape farming improved, and chicken litter was used for fertilizer.

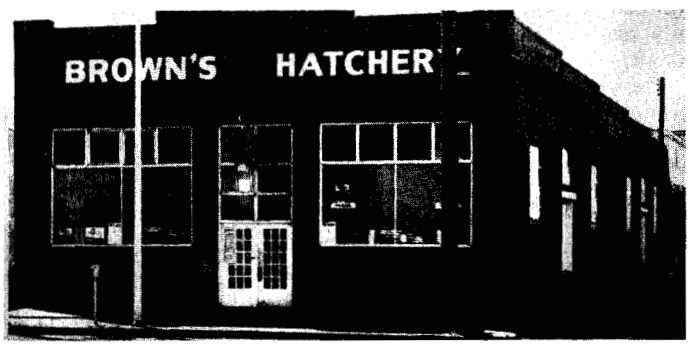
The Brown Hatchery in Lincoln was added in 1941 and managed by Dean Good. The Jeff D. Brown Feed Mill was in operation in 1945 (the home of Jeff D. Brown's choice feeds) in Anderson, MO and was a three story building covering 140,000 square feet.

In 1947, the parent company was called Jeff D. Brown and Son. Gail Brown went into the business with his father after having finished his tour of duty in World War II. Gail had earlier graduated from Hendrix College, met and married Leatrice "Lit" Buis, a girl from Little Rock. They have a daughter, Sherry and two sons, Larry and Chris.

In 1946, Jeff Brown had introduced a broiler chick called Brown's Eureka chick. It was, for many years, the leading broiler sold in Arkansas.

Gail Brown brought many ideas to Jeff Brown and Son and loved to experiment with breeding just as his father did. It was through him that an outstanding breeder cockerel, he called the Brown's LedBrest, was developed. This was a Cornish type male broiler, quickly grown and produced.

The development of the LedBrest started in 1948. To develop the ideal bird required much trial and error testing. After four years, a combination of genes were together making it quite apparent that an outstanding bird had been bred.



February 24, 1952 - Jeff D. Brown Company.

It was in 1958 that the bird was finally introduced to the broiler industry and readily accepted. By 1965, the LedBrest was producing nearly 40% of the broiler chicks in the United States and distributed to 52 foreign countries.

Jeff D. Brown and Son became Jeff D. Brown and Company, Inc., in 1950.

As the hatcheries multiplied to four with two feed plants supplying growers, Jeff Brown found himself serving his community in more than the poultry industry.

He became director in the Arkansas State Economic Council, served on the State Chamber of Commerce, two-time president of Springdale Chamber of Commerce, president and director of Midwest Feed Manufacturing (seven states) and of Springdale Industrial Foundation Association, Chairman of the board of stewards, First United Methodist Church; Springdale, served on the Executive Committee of Boy Scouts of West-Ark Council, and was Director of the First National Bank of Springdale.

Brown's daughter Earlene married Pat Henry from Conway, Arkansas in 1950, and he joined Jeff D. Brown & Co. as vice-president for six years, executive vice-president for two years and president of the company for four years.

Henry and Earlene had both attended Hendrix College in Conway, and that's where they met. Pat Henry joined the Jeff D. Brown Company in 1950.

Brown's Hatchery on Emma Avenue, Springdale, Arkansas.

After seeing the growth of his own company as well as the growth of the entire poultry industry, Jeff Brown suffered a fatal heart attack complicated by diabetes in 1965.

The family sold the firm in 1979 to the Wilson Laurel Farms.

Anna Eva Brown, died in a fire at her home in Springdale, December 24, 1982, on her 81st birthday.

While others may carry the title of Chicken King, Brown is acclaimed "father of the chicken industry" in northwest Arkansas by the Arkansas Poultry Federation. The sales and continued growth of the poultry industry has consistently changed the American pattern of eating over the last two decades and has literally put Springdale on the map.

Poultry and poultry related industry are the heart of the northwest Arkansas population today. When remembering that first northwest Arkansas hatchery, we need to remember the man who "layed" the foundation for the poultry industry to come into the area.

Cannon Express, Inc.

Return to Family Roots Sparks Cannon's Success

Born in Fayetteville and reared in California, northwest Arkansas roots ran deep in Dean G. Cannon. It brought his parents back for family reunions and vacations with regularity. To paraphrase: You can take the boy out of northwest Arkansas, but the man will return.

In 1972, when Cannon returned, it was to start a construction business. Forming Cannon Construction, he was the contractor, his wife the bookkeeper and support staff. His years in supervision of construction at Disneyland (in California) prepared him well for the construction business. Climbing interest rates and a slow down in building made Cannon look to other business opportunities.

Transportation was totally new to Cannon. Unaware of the difficulty of starting a trucking business, in 1974, he bought three trucks and, together, with Cliff Riggins and Cliff's nine trucks operated a shop on Maple Street in Springdale.

Soon, it became obvious that a larger shop was needed to handle the truck storage and maintenance. This led to Cannon building his own place on Elm Springs Road giving him 5,000 square feet of shop space in which to repair his trucks.

Rose Marie and Dean Cannon.

By 1981, Cannon acquired C. R. Kidd Produce, Inc., changing it from a produce carrier to a carrier of general commodities. Hauling territory was broadened to include the entire continental United States.

As his business continued to grow, Cannon purchased three and a half acres at 1901 Robinson and added 45 more trucks to the operation at that location.

Cannon Trucking is primarily a transporter of paper products, perishable and non-perishable food products, wholesale and retail goods, automobile parts and supplies, it isn't unusual to find its trucks hauling for Walmart, K-Mart, Tyson or Safeway.

Cannon's company experienced growth from the start. Increasing yearly at a rate of 30%, it continues to do so. It's first year Cannon grossed over two and one-half million dollars. At the end of the last fiscal year (June 1988), it had grossed more than 12 1/2 million dollars.

From a staff of two (his wife, Rose Marie and himself), Cannon's diversification and growth enables him to now employ more than 200. His office staff alone numbers 39.

Cannon Express, Inc. is a holding company. Stock can be purchased on the open market. It's operating subsidiary is C. R. Kidd Produce, Inc.

On February 26, 1987, common stock was offered to the public resulting in the sale of 690,000 shares netting the company almost three million dollars.

This made it possible for Cannon to purchase 100 tractor rigs early that year and add an additional 50 by December of 1987.

Cannon Express has common carrier authority granted by the Interstate Commerce Commission to transport a wide range of general commodities (dry, refrigerated, non-hazardous chemicals). The company chooses not to haul dangerous explosives, hazardous chemicals or toxic waste.

Ronnie and Annette Battershell with Bryan Cannon.

At present, 99% of company revenue is derived from dry hauling with only one percent coming from refrigerated freight hauling which proves to be more cost effective than buying and maintaining refrigerated hauling equipment. Their goal is to eventually phase out the refrigerated hauling part of the business.

Dean G. Cannon is Chairman of the Board and Chief Executive Officer but claims that Rose Marie, as Secretary-Treasurer and one of the directors of the corporation puts in almost as many hours a week as he does.

"She doesn't come in on Saturday, but otherwise we drive together to and from work. Of course, it's better now than when we first started. At one point I put in over 80 hours a week, and I know Rose Marie had only intended to work part time in the beginning," Cannon said.

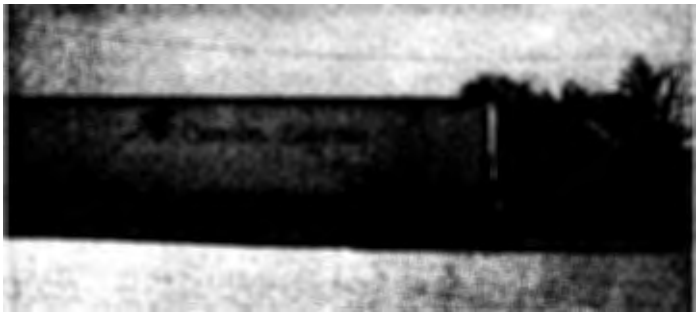
"Making a company successful requires a great deal of management and a lot of hours. It's rewarding, but if you're not willing to commit yourself to the kind of time it takes, you're not going to make it a success," Cannon added.

In 1987 an additional 16 1/2 acres of property was purchased from Ryder (franchised truck rental operation, Highway 68 East) and 13,000 square feet of shop were added to Cannon's holdings.



Cannon Express

The competition in the trucking industry today is greater than ever due to trucking deregulation. Private carriers and trucking companies throughout the United States have felt the effects of increasing costs of insurance, the unpredictability of fuel costs and turnover in personnel.

It is precisely because of these and other factors that make the continued and phenomenal growth of Cannon Express so incredible. To parlay a family investment into a multimillion dollar corporation listed on Wall Street is a modern day Horatio Alger story.

The success of this company is due to the support of the entire family. Rose Marie and Dean's 23 year old son, Bryan, works in receivables and orders supplies. Their daughter, Annette Battershell, computes fuel use and figures mileage for scheduled trucks. Her ease at the computer has made her job invaluable to the company. Annette's husband, Ronnie is in charge of on the road repairs. Annette and Ronnie have not yet put daughters, Jennifer, age 6, and Melanie, age 5, to work, but both are looking forward to the day that they will be allowed to "help."

Cannon's mother, Frances Rankin Cannon, is a genealogy buff and quite interested in history. She has contributed several histories to the Washington County History Book (on family, schools, etc.) and has only recently learned of the Cannon relationship to the family of Robert E. Lee.

Dean was quick to point out the whole family's interest in history. They have in their possession a land grant issued in their family (from the Homestead Act) signed by Ulysses S. Grant. An interest in the Civil War, at least in part, resulted in the cannon logo painted on Cannon Express trucks. This colorful cannon is a familiar and welcome sight to Arkansans when traveling the highways.

From the dream factories of California and Disney's fantasy land to northwest Arkansas and the good life, the Cannons have come home. They love the life that's offered here and take advantage of the weather every weekend they can to spend time on Beaver Lake in their yacht. They work and play together as a family. It has kept their interest and their business a family affair.

Springdale, indeed, has proved to be the springboard for the Cannons' success. Their family business is not a bad legacy to leave for the grandchildren when it comes time for them to "help."

However, at present, Dean G. Cannon shows no sign of slowing down in managing the business or in the acquisition of related businesses. The word for today and for the next few years to come is "growth".

E & E Parts and Equipment

Trucking Parts Are Big Business

In 1973, Earvel E. Fraley saw potential growth for a business located on Highway 68 East, Springdale. That business was S & H Parts and Equipment. Truck parts were sold and serviced by S & H, and Fraley felt he could buy the company, expand the operation and increase service and sales.

Fraley first consulted with Carl Carpenter, and together they made an offer, as partners, to buy out S & H. The business had been in operation since 1967, (co-owned and operated by Keith, Quinton and Lena Skelton in partnership with John Hamilton). S & H had three other employees on staff at the time and had grossed $27,000 in their best month to that date.

After purchasing S & H Parts and Equipment in May, 1973, Fraley and Carpenter saw immediate results in response to their sales efforts and projected expansion of service and sales. Their very first full month of business, showed an increase of $13,000. over the previous $27,000 gross, bringing the figure to $40,000. This inspired greater effort to continue expansion.

E & E's (formerly S & H) present location at 1101 Schmieding now employs 22 and covers 18,700 square feet. Since moving to this location, more offices and a warehouse have been added to accommodate its larger staff and increased inventory.

Four states are serviced by E & E: Arkansas, Missouri, Oklahoma and Kansas, and a new branch of E & E was added after conducting a survey throughout the Texarkana area to ascertain the need for an additional branch. The Hope, Arkansas branch opened its doors in January of 1988 to extend business to include trucks in that region, many of which haul chickens and timber. The new site shows promise for the few months it has been operational.

One of the changes to have come in the last few years has been E & E's installation and use of the computer.

"With the amount of inventory we have, we decided to go to a computer system, the Triad System. It does everything but payroll. I have two secretaries that do payroll and keep up with the computer. Sue Northup has been with us for about 12 years, and Vonda Wright for about five," Fraley said.

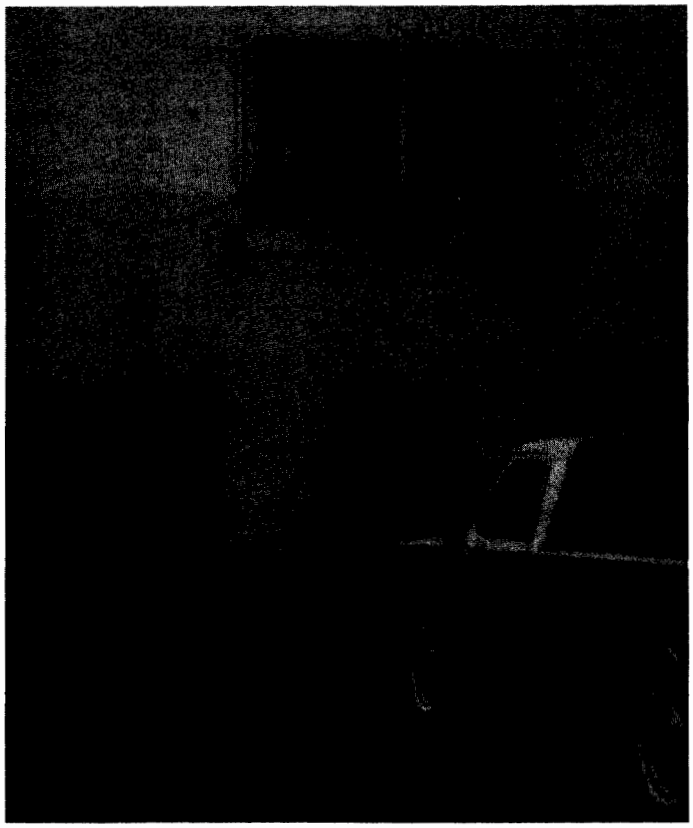
Fraley bought out his partner, Carpenter, in 1977, but still didn't change the original business name from S & H to E & E until after his son, Todd, came into the business in 1985. It became a family operation, and the name was changed from S & H to E & E in July of 1987.

The initials stand for Earvel and Earvel, a name Fraley and his 21 year-old son, Earvel Todd, share. Todd has recently increased the Carpenter family. In the summer of 1988, Terry Lynne Posey became Mrs. Todd Fraley.

Todd started working at the bottom. No job was too small or too dirty, and when the time comes for his father's retirement, Todd will be well prepared to take over the management of the company.

Starting at the bottom is a family trait. Fraley, like his son, started as a young man in 1961 working for International Harvester. He swept the floors, made deliveries and was the all-around gopher (go-fer) for the company, gradually working his way up.

Fraley saw that if he wanted to provide for his family, on the road sales could be the answer. His persistence in sales was rewarded, and for the next several years he sold for several companies. For a while he even sold for Welch's Foods and worked in sales for John Norman (Northwest Arkansas Truck and Equipment).



E & E Parts & Equipment, 1989.

After having job experience in everything from stocking the shelves, inventory control, and inside sales to calling on businesses, the seed had been planted to establish a business of his own.

"I grew up in and around Hazel Valley, east of Springdale. My goal never was to get rich. It doesn't take a lot of money to make a good life for your family in northwest Arkansas. Other things have to be considered. At first I worked 70 to 75 hours a week to make this company go, but I've cut back to where I put in about 40 to 45 hours a week," Fraley said.

"Golf, hunting, even a little fishing can be worked into my schedule now. Now that the kids are grown, my wife, Carolyn, and I can travel," Fraley added.

"Carolyn can even join me when I attend the national conventions in Dallas or Houston or out to Anaheim, California," he added, "something that was impossible when the kids were growing up. She was the ideal mother, always there to support whatever project they were involved with," he added.

Having good people working for him in sales and management is considered by Fraley to be the reason for the success of his business.

Fraley's brother, Vernon Fraley, sells for E & E, and Dan Ritthaler completes the sales force.

In management, Fraley commends his Springdale manager, Max Stevenson, and his Hope, Arkansas manager, Wesley Mann.

"We brought Wesley here to Springdale for training, and sent him on the the road before we put him in charge at Hope. We feel we made a good choice," Fraley commented.

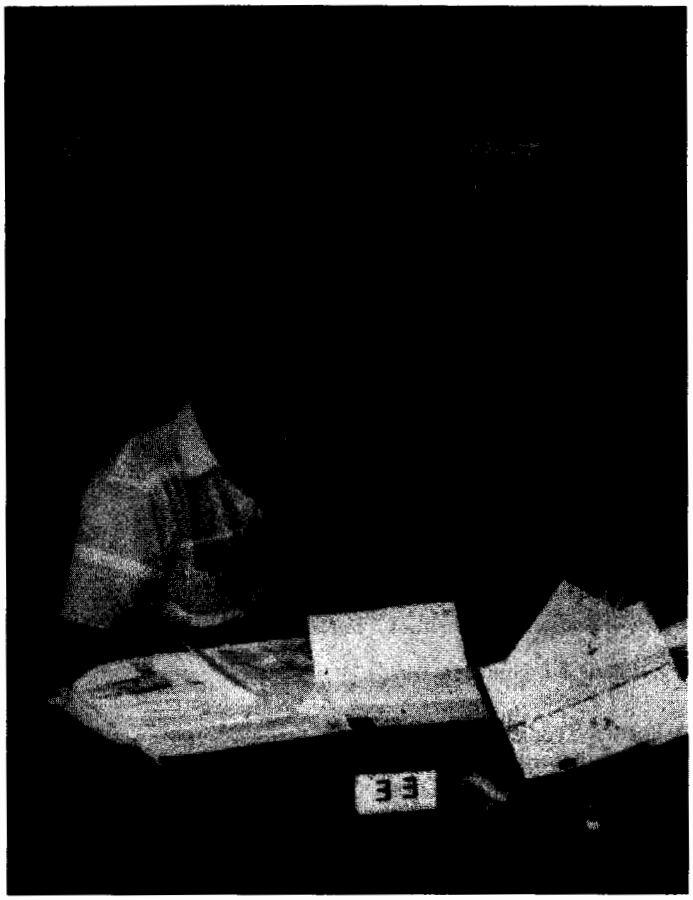
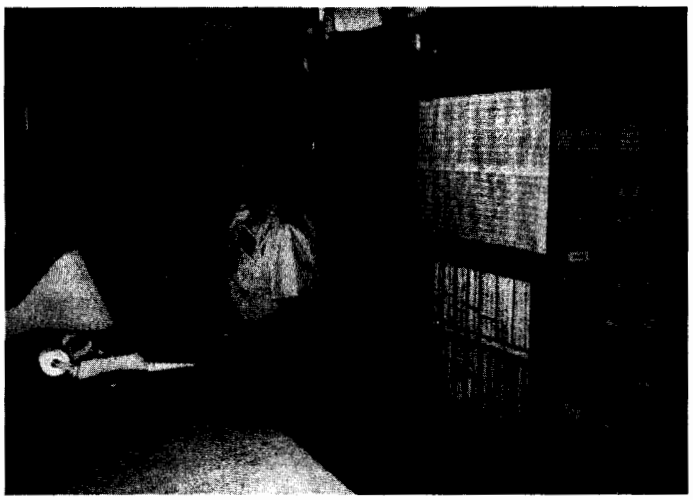
"We have good luck keeping our employees. Kevin Dickard, my counter man, came straight out of high school six or seven years ago. If my employees are aggressive and honest workers, I help them any way I can. They can move up or out to sales when they feel they're ready," he added.



Earvel E. Fraley, 1989.

E & E supplies too many parts products to mention them all, and service and parts aren't confined to truck maintenance but include parts for farm equipment (building of hydraulic hoses is just one of the services provided to farm owners) and industrial equipment such as backhoes and bulldozers.

Carrying an original parts inventory and servicing them includes some well-known brand names (well over 60 brand names appear on parts throughout E & E warehouse): Stemco Seals, Grey Rock Brakes, Midland brake parts, Gates, Rockwell, Webb, National Seals, Bower Bearings and Fram Filters are just a few of the better-known products sold and serviced at E & E.



Busy workday for E & E Parts and Equipment staff.

Fraley's business supports many community projects and organizations. One of his favorite sponsorships includes Little League Baseball. "It isn't really for advertising purposes, I just like to see the kids play ball. I'll have to admit my chest swelled just a bit when our team came in first place in 1987," Fraley said.

Jaycees, Lions Club, Rotary Club and serving on the Board of Education for seven years in Greenland (where his daughter, Kemmey Ann January teaches school) have all been included in Fraley's support of community projects.

"I suppose my attitude is simply that whatever is good for northwest Arkansas is good for me, my family, my business. I'll further the goals of worthwhile community projects or goals set by my employees, because I see it, in the long run, as a benefit to all of us who live and work here," Fraley said.

Fraley's business cards read: Rebuilding-Brakes-Clutches- Electrical-Walking Beams, but what cards don't express is the family feeling of service the customer receives the moment he or she steps through the door to be greeted by a smiling face giving the kind of northwest Arkansas business welcome Fraley's employees have always given and will continue to provide.

Easco Hand Tools, Inc.

First in Hand Tools

From Springfield, Massachusetts to Springdale, Arkansas and from bicycle parts to wrenches, ratchets and sockets, Arthur L. Moore founded a Massachusetts business in 1900 that has grown to become the largest domestic producer of general purpose mechanic's hand tools and specialized automotive service tools for the professional and serious do-it-yourself markets.

In 1901, Arthur L. Moore Manufacturing Company was founded in Springfield, Massachusetts for the manufacture of bicycle parts. This continued as the company's primary focus until 1909 at which time the business expanded to include a new product commonly referred to as a Stillson wrench. The manufacture of this wrench line laid the groundwork for the evolution of the business into specialization in hand tools.

The Moore Company, as it was to be commonly called, shifted its resources and energy in 1914 to making forgings for automobiles and aircraft. Subsequently in 1917 the company also started forging firearms. The Moore Company, during the 1914 to 1917 era, tooled up and supported the war effort (WW I) of the United States.

The Company continued to grow with its varied capabilities and in 1938 began producing wrenches for Sears and Roebuck Company under the brand name Craftsman. After more than 50 years, Easco still proves to be Sears' leading supplier today.

Four times Sears has recognized Easco by presenting the "Partners in Progress" award for outstanding service and dedication to quality and innovation. In 1987, this coveted award was bestowed on Easco, as one of 75, out of 10,000 Sears' suppliers.

In 1941 (after the onset of WW II) the Moore Company once again began forging machine parts for aviation. The ability to forge metals and support the war effort was once again a factor in the business.

During the years following 1941 the Company continued to maintain growth in hand tools and decided that expansion was in order. A search of potential sites around the country revealed that northwest Arkansas had the right mixture of needed elements. The area offered land at reasonable prices, ample water resources, adequate gas and electrical facilities, and a large skilled workforce who demonstrated a proven work ethic.

The search narrowed to Springdale, Arkansas, due to the fact that it best fulfilled all the factors mentioned as well as having a favorable community attitude. Springdale wanted new industry with the accompanying jobs it would be bringing to the area.

Construction of the Springdale plant began in 1969. The plant site consisted of 53 acres in the Springdale Industrial Park. Construction concluded, and operations began during 1970.

In 1968 the Moore Company was acquired by the Easco Corporation which was domiciled in Baltimore, Maryland. The name of the company was changed to read "The Moore Company, Operating Division of Easco Hand Tools, Inc."

During 1978/79 a significant portion of Easco's hand tool manufacturing moved from an older plant in Springfield, Massachusetts, to the newer and more efficient facilities in Springdale, Arkansas and to Gastonia, North Carolina. The moves were accomplished to lower operating costs. The concept became known as the Resourcing Program. The end result was to distribute product lines of like processes to each of the southern plants to allow specialization which would add to productivity, better quality, and overall lower costs.

Easco employees gathered for a communication meeting in the packing area to hear a message from President, Jack Geary, 1976.

The Springdale plant was targeted for producing the "flat line" wrenches which equated to basically open end, box end, combination, and ignition wrenches.

1978 Expansion of Springdale plant nears completion.

In 1982 the Company once again changed its name. This time the company name became Easco Hand Tools, Inc.

During 1982, the company made another major acquisition that would contribute to greater market share and job security for all Easco employees. K-D Tools, founded in 1919, was acquired by Easco Hand Tools, Inc. K-D brought to the company a line of automotive aftermarket specialty repair tools. This acquisition provided a much needed diversification of the total business. Other acquisitions during 1984 included the Oxwall Tool Company which was an importer of low cost tools. The company had a demand for a low cost line of tools that could be filled by this imported product. Once again, Easco Hand Tools, Inc. saw a way to expand and diversify.

Easco Hand Tools, Inc., became the largest producer of wrenches in the world in 1984. This distinction continues to hold true today.

The growth of the business resulted in the Springdale facility being expanded in 1973, 1976, 1978, 1984, 1987, and 1988. The size of the plant had grown to over 220,000 square feet, housing over 100 pieces of manufacturing equipment. Production had increased to a level of 147,000 units of product per day for a transfer value of approximately $129,000 per day.

By 1979 the Springdale plant, the same as all Easco Hand Tools and American industry in general, had started to experience problems. Imported wrenches were showing up with significantly improved quality and dramatically lower cost. The far eastern countries were overcoming the stigma of "Made in Japan equals inferior product." Market share was beginning to slip to the competition.

Some of the reasons for this trend had to do with total management philosophy in America. American industry had grown up with conventional management philosophies of "We-Management and They-Workers." This autocratic approach to managing was no longer successful. Modern day workers had a need to be involved in the business, to be respected for ideas on how to improve the business and, most of all, they needed to be heard.

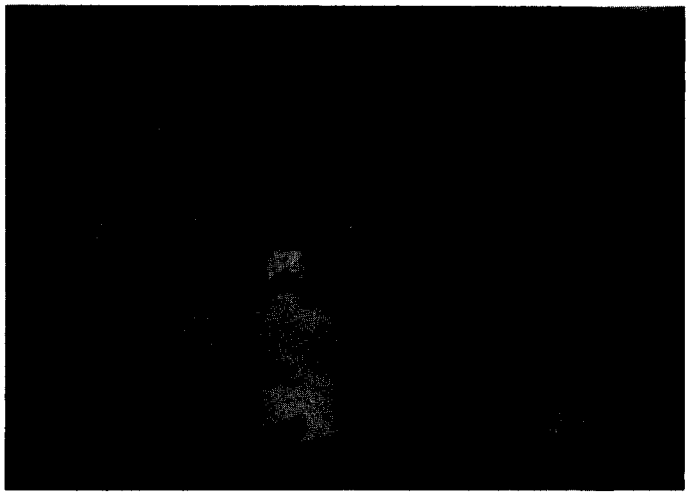
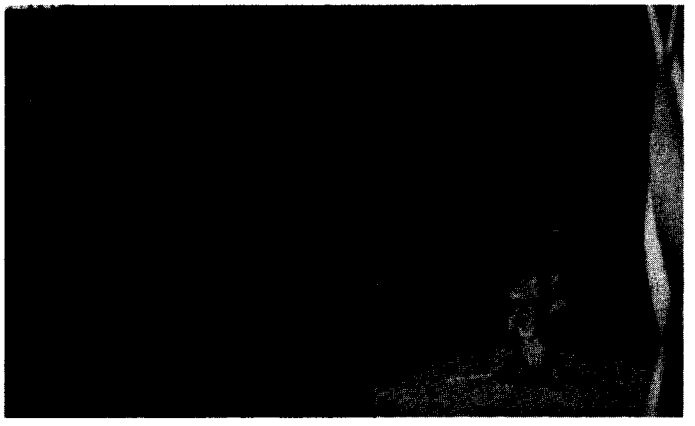
Easco-Springdale had fallen into the classic American mold, and as a result, by 1979 turnover was high, workmanship was poor. There were unsafe conditions, and the cost of production was too high to be competitive.

In 1979/80, the Springdale plant engaged a program to turn the business around and become successful against foreign and domestic competition. The key was forming a partnership between labor and management called participative management. This concept was designed to increase two-way communication, inform all team members about the state of the business, and receive the opinions and suggestions from all of the team.



Easco sponsors first on-site industrial blood drive held in northwest Arkansas November, 1981.



Easco holds Open House Celebration in 1983 for community viewing and participations.

This new management style would see the development of participative groups such as Productivity Improvement Groups (PIGS) and Positive Action Committees (PACS). The main objective of these groups was to improve productivity and quality. Another program, Make-It-Right-The-First-Time (M. I. R. T. F. T.) was implemented in 1982 bringing a 14 step quality improvement plan to the manufacturing floor. Participation of all team members in these programs began having a measurable effect.

1983 awards presentation (L to R) Fred Turrentine, Manufacturing Manager, John Klovanich, Operations Manager, Linda Russell (award recipient), Troy Wyatt, General Supervisor, Manufacturing; and Josie Light, Manufacturing Supervisor. Klovanich was promoted to Vice President of Manufacturing for Easco in 1983 while Turrentine moved up to position of Operations Manager. Both team players were instrumental in providing the leadership that turned production around in the late 1970s and early 80s.

The Company also established a Red Shirt Program. This program selected highly motivated individuals who wanted the challenge of improving communications and setting positive examples for their peers. The original group was composed of twelve members who received extensive off site training in subjects such as safety, communications, problem solving, quality control, coordination, organizing, etc. The program became very popular with the number of Red Shirts growing to 45 in 1984.

The Springdale Division made a major turn around as a result of changing to a participative style of management. Workers compensation costs, lost time through accidents, turnover, and scrap loss were reduced dramatically. The cost of the product, correspondingly, went down and market share started to grow. The company was regaining market share lost to foreign competition. From 1979, through the 1986 period, the cost of wrenches was reduced by approximately 50%. This achievement was unmatched anywhere else in the economy. Easco-Springdale had regained its competitive edge in a highly competitive world market in hand tools.

Easco Hand Tools, Inc. was acquired from Easco Corporation by senior management, and a group of outside investors on August 13, 1986. It now had become a company that could stand alone.

The new company quickly set the major objective to become market leader as a low cost producer of quality hand tools. The new management would focus continually and consistently to increase both quality and quantities of new product introductions while reducing the lead time required to deliver them to market.

Forge Shop expansion gets underway. The addition of forge hammers was necessary to meet the customers growing demand for product, 1984.

The new Company reflected on its background as well as current objectives outlined in the following profile: The Company has been the principal manufacturer of Sears, Roebuck and Co.'s Craftsman line of mechanics' hand tools for over 50 years; in 1987, the Company delivered over 100 million pieces of Craftsman tools to Sears. Approximately 80% of these pieces are sold in mechanics' hand-tool sets that include from three to 900 pieces. Over the past two years, the Company has worked with Sears to reconfigure the components of the mechanics' tools sets throughout the entire Craftsman line, resulting both in increased sales and profitability to the company and in enhanced consumer value. The Craftsman line is principally sold to the serious "do-it-yourself" hand-tools user, as well as to professional automotive mechanics and industrial users. During 1987, the Company introduced the new, premium line of Craftsman Sears best mechanics' hand tools which contain patented features. Craftsman tools are one of Sears' more heavily-promoted products, and the promotions frequently emphasize that the company's Craftsman products are American-made. Sales to Sears constituted 59% of Easco's 1987 net sales.

The Company has been a primary supplier for over 30 years of specialized automotive service tools to the National Automotive Parts Association ("NAPA"). Since 1983, the Company has also been NAPA's designated supplier of general purpose mechanics' hand tools, including sockets, ratchets, and wrenches. The company supplies over 2,300 different tools to NAPA members, which are distributed through 74 distribution centers to more than 6,500 outlets. It is believed that NAPA is the largest independent automotive parts distribution network in the country. NAPA's largest member, Genuine Parts Company, owns 63 of NAPA's distribution centers and purchased 91% of the Company's 1987 sales to NAPA members. In the aggregate, sales to NAPA constituted 17% of the company's net sales.

Fred Turrentine, Operations Manager, presents Frank Stratton with a gold watch commemorating his retirement. Frank was the first hourly employee to retire from Springdale Division. April, 1984.

The Company is one of the largest domestic manufacturers of specialized automotive service tools, which are sold through NAPA, as well as under the company's K-D Tools brand. The K-D Tools brand include over 1,000 different tools that are marketed nationwide through a network of approximately 1,000 distributors that service over 15,000 retailers and jobbers. The company also markets Easco general purpose tools in the do-it-yourself, automotive, commercial and industrial markets.

The Company had rising sales and had operated profitably for many years prior to 1980. Several weaknesses in its operating strategy, however, resulted in slight operating losses in 1982 and 1983 and culminated in a substantial operating loss in 1984. In late 1984, a new senior management team, consisting of six persons with an average of over 20 years of experience in the tool industry, was formed to restore the company to profitability. The new management team's strategy was to temporarily deemphasize sales growth and concentrate on reversing the decline in the Company's operating performance. This strategy was to be implemented and ultimately achieved through a series of programs including: production and Easco wins the coveted Partners-In-Progress Award from Sears Merchandise Group. This represented the fourth year that Easco won the award. The award was presented to only 75 companies out of 10,000 Sears' suppliers. The award recognizes the company's contribution to the "quality triangle" which relates to how well a product performs, how a product looks, and new or exclusive features which add real value to the product. materials cost reduction; plant consolidations; inventory reduction; improved capital asset development; improved production control and working capital management; engineering innovation and product design; and selective price increases.

Today Easco-Springdale employs approximately 550 area residents. Major forge shop expansions are planned for 1988 and reconfiguration of a large majority of production processes have been moved into Cells as Cell Technology continue to be implemented.

Costs of the product continue to be reduced as quality is improved. Market share continues to grow and most competition today is foreign, not domestic. The Company contributes in excess of 16 million dollars annually to the local economy of Springdale, making its impact of great importance to the community today and for years to come.

In May of 1987, the Company sold 3,000,000 shares of its Common Stock. This initial stock offer netted over 26 million dollars after deducting underwriting fees, insurance costs, and including retirement of certain stock warrants. These monies were used to repay existing debts. Also offered were 100,000 shares of Class B Common Stock with a par value of $.01 and 10,000,000 shares of Preferred Stock with a par value of $.01. No shares of Class B Common Stock or Preferred Stock were issued or outstanding as of December 31, 1987. This, together with acquired tax benefits resulting from Easco's acquisition, has greatly strengthened its financial position and cash flow. According to Wayne M. Myers, vice-president of finance, stockholder value and return on stockholders' equity showed a 23.0 percent return for 1987.

The Easco Hand Tools team, the World Class Leader in the production of hand tools, joins with other area industries in wishing the greatest success to the capturing of our local history and recording .their contributions to Washington County through this book.

It is Easco's aim to continue to be a partner with Springdale and northwest Arkansas in forging the history of this region and in continuing to make it the ideal place for family life and recreation by providing jobs and contributing to the economy and growth of the area.

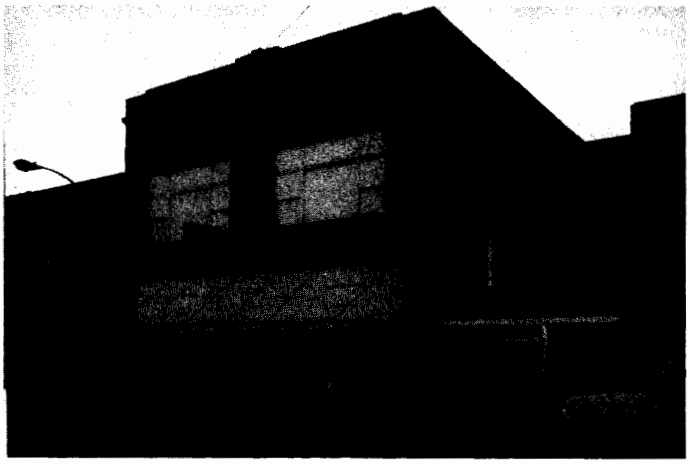
Famous Hardware Company

"The Quality Store Where Most People Trade"

In 1907 E. B. Cummings, R. C. Clark, J. W. Curtis, and J. H. Hawn formed a company and purchased a business from the Lewis brothers and W. T. Farrar that is now known as the Famous Hardware Company.



Famous Hardware, Emma Avenue, Springdale, Arkansas.

The building originally housing this business is located on the northeast corner of Emma Avenue and Mill Street. In 1886, W. T. Farrar purchased the store from the current hardware owner and Art and Bert Lewis became partners in the business in 1897. In later years this building was to be known as the S. R. Wilson Merchantile Store. The building has now been partitioned into smaller businesses and office space.

In March of 1907 Famous was opened for business at the corner of Emma Avenue and Mill Street. At this time Springdale had been a town for twenty-nine years. The population was approximately 1,500 and the first electric light system was not to be installed until 1908. The dirt streets were yet to be paved.

There was a young employee working at the store from its beginning who was to become a vital member of Famous. He was Earl F. Simons. Mr. Simons was with the store for 55 years—later becoming a partner in the business, retiring in 1962.

Sometime around the year 1909, Famous, by way of advertising, gave its customers a booklet called The Expansive File. This booklet measured 4-1/2 inches in width by 10-1/2 inches in length. It had a heavy cardboard back and front covering with a binding of clothlike material that expanded when the booklet was opened— expanded much like an ordinary file. Inside the booklet were six envelopes, 4-1/2 inches, with old-fashioned, fancy printing on the outside file of each envelope naming the purpose for which each envelope was to be used. There was an envelope for Notes, one for Deeds, one for Insurance, one for Bills Payable, one for Receipts, and one for Miscellaneous items. The advertising on the front of this booklet read: A Useful Remembrance From The Famous Hardware Company Wholesale and Retail Springdale, Arkansas—The Quality Store Where Most People Trade.

On the back cover it read: Famous Hardware Company—We have built a large and prosperous business by liberal treatment and are going to stay by the people who have made this Springdale's Greatest Store. Buggies, Wagons and Implements—Also carry a full line in builders' supplies—Furniture and Undertaking— It matters not what your requirements may be, come to see us. We're here with the goods. One Price—the Lowest—Do Your Business With Us. (This was to become the business policy of the store from then on.)

Famous Hardware survived World War I. About 1917 (the year the United States entered the war) E. S. Thompson became a partner in the business. It could be that Mr. Hawn and/or Mr. Curtis entered the service in 1917 and a new partner was needed for the business. Mr. Simons was a partner at this time. In later years Mr. Thompson retired, but what happened to Mr. Hawn and Mr. Curtis is not known.

R. C. Clark died on Christmas Eve in 1925, and Howard Clark came into the store to handle the Clark part of the firm. In 1928, Mr. Cummings persuaded his older son, Paul Cummings, to become a member of the firm.

Famous Hardware also weathered the Great Depression in the late twenties and early thirties. In 1934, Famous bought the Springdale Cash Hardware building on Emma Avenue, located midway between Holcomb and Main streets. This is the present location of the store. Just as the country was coming out of the Great Depression, Famous Hardware had its formal opening on December 22, 1934 in its new location.

In 1936, Famous Hardware Company was converted from a corporation to a partnership. Marion H. Bell, the Certified Public Accountant from Fort Smith, came to set up the books. By the time this partnership went into effect, Mr. E. S. Thompson had resigned, and Howard Clark had left the store to form a company with D. D. Deaver called the Clark-Deaver Hardware. Mr. Cummings brought his two sons, Paul Cummings and Edward Cummings, into the partnership. Now the hardware had four partners again: E. B. Cummings, R. P. Cummings, E. S. Cummings, and E. F. Simons. At this time Edward Cummings was still in school.

In the thirties the poultry business was growing and would continue to grow until it replaced the fruit and farm produce industries as Springdale's main source of income. In the early days the farmers brought their fruit—apples, peaches, strawberries—and other farm produce in wagons to town. The wagons were parked across the railroad track and the produce was sold on the street. Springdale was then known as a Farmers Market. When the poultry industry began to grow, the street produce gradually dropped. Springdale was now reaching out to all the advantage modern progress had to offer; the streets were lighted and the roads paved; the buggies and wagons had been replaced by cars and trucks. As the poultry business grew, so did Springdale.

In Famous Hardware, at its new location, undertaking was no longer a part of the business, and, of course, buggies and wagons had been dropped. Now the hardware sold Eclipse Lawnmowers, Oliver plow shares, Sims saddles and harnesses, Sheffield fencing, a full line of plumbing from Harry Cooper, Dupont paint (Devoe would come later), poultry equipment, leading brands of furniture, garden seed, fertilizer, dynamite and numerous other items but above all good hardware. Most of the good hardware came from the Belknap Hardware & Mfg. Company in Louisville, Kentucky. Belknap was represented by a man named John Massie who came to the store once a week long before World War II and continued to come until the seventies when he retired. During the war his beautiful red-headed wife, Hazel Massie, took his place and filled in for him until he returned from service. The store appreciated this man's excellent service and he was considered a personal friend.

Mr. Cummings was a 'communicator'. He was outgoing, friendly, pleasant, and he was kind and honest in dealing with his customers. The policies he implanted in the store would be carried on by his sons. Famous was lenient with its credit. There were some farmers who paid their accounts twice a year. The poultry growers ran their charge accounts for three months at a time and paid off when the chickens were sold. The painters also were allowed to run their accounts until a job was finished.

Famous became concerned with the welfare of the people and tried to meet all their needs. This was good business, but it was also caring.

In the mid-thirties, Paul Cummings left Famous and entered Government Soil Conservation Service in Fort Worth, Texas. This left E. B. Cummings to manage the hardware.

About this time Famous acquired a large warehouse across the alley behind the store. Later, Urban Renewal cut this down to a much smaller warehouse that now faces Main Street. Also, an additional building west of the hardware building on Emma Avenue was purchased; this would become the Famous Appliance Center.

Our country was now headed toward the second World War. Business in the hardware was good. Mr. Cummings, with the help of his faithful employees and Mr. Simons, as the receiving clerk, was making it all right. Then as the United States entered the war in 1941, business started booming. Mr. Cummings was operating the store alone, the work load became heavier, he was growing older. In the early forties he had a stroke. There was no one to operate the hardware. Paul Cummings was in Fort Worth. Edward Cummings was in training in the Army Air Force. Before Edward Cummings left the states to fly transports in China, the father and his two sons agreed to sell the store. Mr. Cummings sold the Famous Hardware to Lewis Bros.

Shortly thereafter, one Saturday evening in July, the telephone rang in Fort Worth. When Paul Cummings answered, his father told him: "Son, I have put my life in that business. I can't part with it now. I want you to come back and take it over."

Paul Cummings resigned his position in soil Conservation and came back to Springdale to operate his Dad's store.

Lewis Bros. were kind. They understood how much Famous meant to Mr. Cummings and they let him back out of the deal.

The first month for Paul Cummings in the hardware was rough. He had transferred from a "white collar job" to walking on cement and lifting heavy hardware when waiting on customers. He lost 32 lbs. in weight and four inches off his waistline. Some mornings his muscles were so sore, his wife had to help him out of bed. But the adjustment was made, and with Mr. Cummings sitting on the sidelines to offer advice, business continued as usual.

People felt "at home" in Famous. They shopped on week days while their children played up and down the balcony stairs and in the saddle department where the aroma of leather filled the air. The hardware was a favorite place to browse and loaf on Saturday nights until closing time at 10:00 p. m.

July 4, 1945 Famous gave its first saddle to the first Rodeo of the Ozarks.

In Christmas of 1945, Edward Cummings came home from service. Gaudy Christmas decorations (that had been there before Thanksgiving) hung across Emma Avenue; the store windows down the street were decorated with various Christmas displays. There was moisture in the air from snow flurries. Inside the hardware a small portable phonograph (a hard to get item so soon after the war) on the counter in the front of the store played: "Kiss me once, Kiss me twice, and kiss me once again; it's been a long, long, time." As the haunting strains drifted through the store, groups of customers wandered in and out Christmas shopping. Christmas spirit was in the air. Christmas sales in the forties made December one of the biggest months in the year. Now Edward Cummings would join Paul Cummings in operating the business.

In 1946, Mr. Cummings had another stroke. He died in the Fayetteville City Hospital on June 6.

His widow, Mattie Cummings, now took his place as a partner in the hardware. She was never active in the business and had no voice in the operation of the store. The management of Famous was given to Paul and Edward Cummings.

The two brothers worked together through the fifties and the sixties selling hardware. By 1950 the smaller building on the west had been completely remodeled—there were large, doorless openings made from the remodeled part to the older part which made the hardware all one building—and Famous Appliance Center was open. The store would now sell Zenith, Frigidaire, Magic Chef, Maytag, and Amana in the appliance room. In the early fifties there were black and white TV's; colored television would come later. The sales were good in the Appliance Center.

In the hardware side, the store sold wholesale and retail: hardware, plumbing supplies, automotive and house paint, and furniture—the furniture would later be dropped. At this time Famous was furnishing the poultry industry with much of their needed material—Tyson's, George's, Jeff Brown. This was a large volume of sales for the store. Later these companies would out-strip Famous and buy their merchandise direct. The paint sales increased as house and commercial construction grew in Springdale. By the seventies the paint sales would be as large as the hardware sales.

In 1962 E. F. Simons retired. In 1964 Mattie Cummings died and Paul and Edward Cummings became total owners of Famous Hardware.

By the sixties Famous no longer stayed open on Saturday nights, and in the seventies it closed at noon on Saturday.

In June of 1973, Edward Cummings died. At this time the business was changed from a partnership to a corporation and Golda Cummings, his widow came into the store as co-owner. The officers of Famous Hardware Co., Inc. were now: R. P. Cummings, president; Golda L. Cummings, vice-president; Rema Cummings, secretary-treasurer. This corporation would stay in effect for ten years.

Business in the hardware was good through these ten years. The town's growth helped contribute to this. By the time Springdale celebrated its 100th anniversary in 1978, the population was approximately 22,000 people.

On April 5, 1982, Paul Cummings died. In November of 1983 the hardware was sold to a new owner—John Graves. Famous was happy and proud to have Mr. Graves in the store. And, so. . .Famous Hardware passed from the Cummings family in its 77th year. There was a day when everyone knew where Famous Hardware was—when you could almost truthfully say that anyone who had ever been anybody had worked at Famous—when you were told, if you can't find it any place else, go to Famous Hardware. These aspects began to phase out in the seventies when the bigger corporations moved into Springdale. The store had passed through many "stages and phases".

Famous Hardware Company still operates at 113 West Emma Avenue, Springdale, Arkansas.

Farmers and Merchants Bank of Prairie Grove

May 1, 1929, I was employed by the Farmers and Merchants Bank of Prairie Grove. The bank board consisted of R. D. Bogart, E. C. Carl, J. P. Harris, Dr. W. H. Mock, D. N. McCormick, J. C. Parks, Ewing Pyeatt, and R. E. Pyeatt. Mr. Bogart was president and served in that capacity until 1951, at which time I was elected president and served as president until 1980, at which time I was elected Chairman of the Board and in which capacity I still serve. At the present time my son, James C. Rieff, is president having been elected to that position in 1980.

At the time I became an employee of the bank, there were four people working; I made the fifth, and soon after I was hired, Jasper Pyeatt was employed. The assets of the bank at that time were $450,814.65. The employees consisted of Gilbert Shafer, cashier; John Baggett and Wayne Stone, assistant cashiers; and Edith Pace, bookkeeper and secretary.

In September 1929, John Baggett left the bank to be superintendent of the Prairie Grove Schools. That cut the number of employees back to five. In January, 1930, Jasper Pyeatt was laid off. On April 30, 1931, I was the next one to go.

In June 1931, I went out to Western Oklahoma and helped harvest, probably the largest wheat crop they had ever produced there. Elevators were all full and combined wheat was stacked on the ground in most of the larger fields. The market was $.18 to $.22 a bushel delivered to the railroad. High test wheat was bringing $.38 to $.40 in Kansas City and other wheat market centers. The next year was when the "Dust Bowl" hit and it was my understanding that they did not have another good wheat crop until 1938 or 1939.

We were producing a lot of grain in this area during the first forty years of the 20th century. Wheat, corn, barley and oats were the main crops in northwest Arkansas. There was a lot of wheat being exported from this area as late as the middle thirties. Most of it went out through the Port of Galveston, Texas. Apples and strawberries were the main fruits being produced in northwest Arkansas, with a fairly large acreage of grapes in the Tontitown area.

On December 31, 1931, Wayne Stone left the employment of the Farmers and Merchants Bank to become assistant cashier of the American National Bank of Rogers, Arkansas, which is now the First National Bank of Rogers. On January 1, 1932, I returned from Guymon, Oklahoma to become assistant cashier of the Farmers and Merchants Bank at a salary of $75.00 per month with the understanding that at the end of six months the salary would be increased to $100.00 per month. Between January 1 and July 1, the Depression became much more severe and I, along with the other two employees, took a reduction of ten percent in my salary. I continued to draw $67.50 per month until Mamie and I were married in June of 1935.

On August 1, 1938, Gilbert Shafer left the employment of the Farmers and Merchants Bank to become a state bank examiner. At that time, I was made cashier. We hired Jack Barnett. The other employee was Ruby Wilson. On December 1, 1941, we hired Lorene Jones as bookkeeper, teller and secretary. On December 9, 1946, we hired Wilford H. Thompson as bookkeeper and teller. On November 6, 1950, we hired Geraldine Parks as bookkeeper and teller. September 1, 1953, LaVonne Phillips became an employee of the Farmers and Merchants Bank. When the bank had its 50th Anniversary in August of 1954, the bank's total assets were $1,602,105.35. The Board of Directors consisted of: W. H. (Bill) Bartholomew, Dr. W. H. Mock, J. C. Parks, W. E. N. Phillips and D. E. Rieff. I had become a board member in 1941.

When we doubled the size of our building in the fall of 1959, the employees were: D. E. Rieff, president; W. H. Thompson, cashier; Lorene Jones, secretary and assistant cashier; Mildred Broyles, assistant cashier; LaVonne Phillips, assistant cashier; Betty Beeks, bookkeeper and teller. The Directors were: Dr. W. H. Mock, Barry Parks, D. E. Rieff, Dr. Frank Riggall.

In 1974 we added an additional 10,800 square feet. We also added two drive up windows.

We opened a branch in Farmington in December, 1977. The day we had open house, there were 1,162 people registered. This branch has four drive up windows.

Present members of the Farmers and Merchants Bank, Farmington Branch: Lucille Dyer, Carol Acker, Deloris Wallace, Lorinda Schader, Tommi Featherston, Nora Taylor.

At one time Prairie Grove had three banks operating at the same time. This was from August, 1912 until August, 1914.

The first bank organized here was the Bank of Prairie Grove in 1901. Officers were: J. S. Edmiston, president; E. C. Carl, vice-president; and W. G. Collier, cashier and secretary.

Other stockholders were: J. E. Franklin, I. H. Ford, R. L. McCoy, F. H. Carl, C. L. Cummings, G. W. Nixon, J. H. Brewster, D. N. McCormick, J. P. Edmiston, G. O. D. Moore, Jonathan Wilkison, W. W. Moore, Fannie Woody, J. B. Pearson, J. T. Carl, W. T. McCormick, L. C. McCormick, W. H. Simpson, W. D. Moore, W. R. Wallace, Van W. Carl, D. N. Edmiston, and J. H. Marlar.

The bank of Prairie Grove opened for business in a frame building, 107 East Buchanan, where the Southern Mercantile is now located. Later it was moved to 121 East Buchanan, the present site of Neal's Dry Goods. It continued in that location until 1905 when it sold to the newly organized First National Bank which occupied the same building until it was destroyed by fire in 1914.

The second bank organized was The Home Bank, founded in August, 1904 and located at the present site of the Prairie Grove Telephone Company warehouse which is located immediately north of the present Farmers and Merchants Bank building. The name of the Home Bank was changed to Farmers State Bank in 1913. It operated under this name until January 1, 1929.

In December, 1905 the third bank was organized under title of First National Bank. Officers were: J. H. Marlar, president; E. C. Carl, vice-president; T. L. Hart, cashier and secretary; and W. R. Pearson, assistant cashier.

Other stockholders were; W. H. Simpson, D. N. McCormick, J. B. Pearson, J. S. Edmiston and J. P. Harris.

The fourth bank in Prairie Grove was the Citizens Bank, organized in August, 1912. Officers were: W. H. Mock, president; W. W. Carl, vice-president; and M. M. (Mel) Collier, cashier and secretary.

Other stockholders were: E. C. Carl, S. R. Wilson, Oscar Dearing, J. H. Zellner, D. N. McCormick, James C. Parks, F. H. Carl, L. C. McCormick, Oliver Phillips, W. R. Dodson, May Hannah, W. J. Maddox, L. L. Baggett and R. O. Hannah.

This bank built a new building at 116 East Buchanan Street. After operating there two years, it was purchased by the stockholders of the First National Bank, at which time the First National Bank moved to the new building where it continued in business until consolidated with the Farmers State Bank on January 1, 1929 when the name was changed to the Farmers and Merchants Bank.

The Citizens Bank name was engraved in a cement slab close to the top and across the front of the building. After the First National purchased the building and moved into it, they had their own name painted on a metal sign and attached to the building covering up the Citizens Bank name. After this building was not being used to house a bank and the building was sold, it was occupied by Clark's Jewelry Store for a number of years. Mr. Clark took the metal sign down and to his, and many other people's surprise, they discovered the name of the Citizens Bank engraved in the cement. This building was used for a Post Office for a number of years and was also a flower shop. The building is owned by Charles Knowles and the name of Citizens Bank is still plainly engraved.

The Farmers and Merchants Bank was robbed April 1, 1932. by three men from Crawford County. Two of them came in the bank and the third one stayed in the car. They had parked by the side of the bank. Ky Courtney and Earl Long were the ones who entered the bank. Albert Howell was the one that stayed in the car.

The Farmers and Merchants Bank had three employees in 1932 Gilbert Shafer, cashier; D. E. Rieff, assistant cashier; and Jimmie Bell Geiger (now Delap), secretary and bookkeeper. Both Mr. Shafer and Ms. Geiger had gone to lunch. There was a customer, Mr. Beaty, in the bank when the robbers came and another customer, George Mobley, came in during the robbery.

The robbers took $4,168.35 before leaving the bank. They went south by the way of Hogeye, Onda, Zinnamon and 86 School House. They abandoned the car in Crawford County.

Howell was arrested several days after the robbery and put in the Washington County Jail where he stayed until convicted later in the year.

Long was arrested during the summer in Holdenville, Oklahoma and was brought to Fayetteville where he likewise was confined in the Washington County Jail. Both pleaded guilty. Howell was sentenced to a seven-year term in the penitentiary and Long was sentenced to fifteen years.

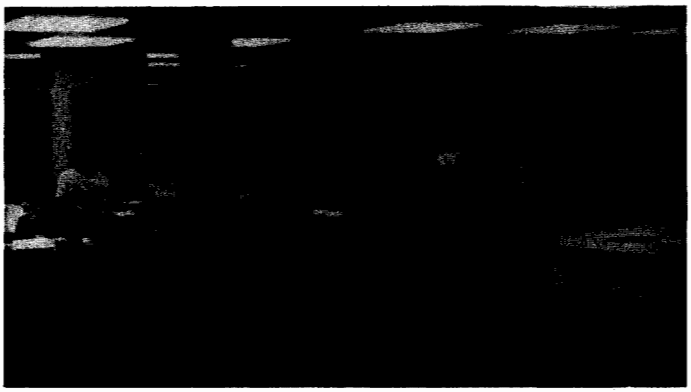
Later in the fall of 1932, Courtney was captured near Figure Five in Crawford County. During the exchange of fire between him and the officers who made the arrest, he was hit in his right knee by one buckshot, after which he surrendered. The officers had his brother with them when they made the arrest. They immediately started to the hospital in Van Buren and he died en route. The doctor at the hospital said he died from shock.

From a small beginning great achievements have been made. During the history of this bank. Through six booms, five panics, fifteen presidential administrations, two world wars—over an 84 year span including good times and bad, the bank has experienced continuous operation during the early Thirties when many banks were failing and able to pay depositors only a few cents on the dollar, the Farmers and Merchants Bank remained stable and no loss was sustained by a depositor.



Interior F and M Bank, Prairie Grove.

The Farmers and Merchants Bank did not pay any cash dividends during the Thirties. We paid a 20 percent cash dividend each year since. On May 7, 1969, in addition to the cash dividend, we paid a five for one stock dividend, increasing our capital stock from $30,000.00 to $150,000.00, and again we paid a two for one stock dividend on December 20, 1977.

A message from the Chairman of the Board. . .To our Customers, Directors and Stockholders: I am pleased to announce the Farmers and Merchants Bank posted good gains in 1987. Deposits were at their highest level, total resources reached a new peak as shown in the year-end published statement.

In addition to the many types of loans that we have made, we also have been a heavy buyer in municipal bonds as well as school bonds. In years past, we have owned school bonds on every district in Washington County and most all districts in northwest Arkansas. One of the larger issues was Fayetteville School district $1,500,000.00 bonds which we purchased in 1982.

The officers of this institution have always been deeply interested in the problems of the farmers and businessmen and in the growth and development of Prairie Grove and Washington County and much of the prosperity of this area is tied in with the growth and service of the Farmers and Merchants Bank. We are particularly proud of the contributions of our energetic staff, whose skills and abilities in recognizing and assisting the different needs of our customers have played a major part in our growth. They are prepared to give quick, knowledgeable assistance to our customers, serving them as individual people, deserving individual attention and service. In large measure, they are why the Farmers and Merchants Bank is a good bank.

As we enter 1988, we are aware of the many economic uncertainties which face the nation. Nevertheless, we firmly believe that Northwest Arkansas presents attractive opportunities for stable business and profitable banking activity.

We are grateful for the support of our employees, our directors, our customers and friends. They deserve most of the credit for our success. We look forward with confidence to 1988 knowing that we will continue to receive a great response from all of those who have been such a great help to us.

I have served on many boards and commissions. I was elected City Treasurer of the City of Prairie Grove in 1933. In the early thirties, during the time that I was serving as treasurer, the city water and sewer plants were built. In the late thirties, I was elected to the City Council and served in that capacity for some thirty years. During the thirties and forties, the City had many problems and very little money to help solve them. I served a number of years on the local school board, also the Washington County Fair Board, the Washington County Democrat Central Committee and the Washington County Election Commission. I served on the Washington County Hospital Board of Trustees for 20 some years. At the time I retired from the board, I had served more years than any other trustee up to that time.

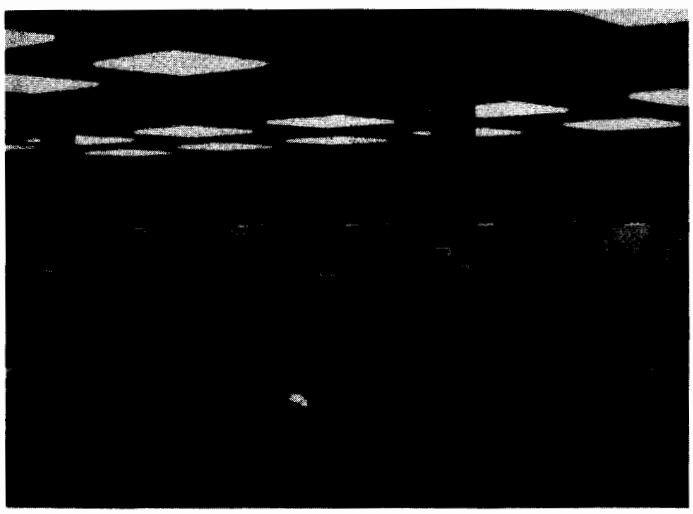
I am a Charter Member of the Prairie Grove Lions Club which was organized November 1946. I am a member of the Prairie Grove United Methodist Church. I served as treasurer of the church for a number of years and at the present time, I am one of the trustees of the church. I am a member of the Masonic Lodge No. 436 of Prairie Grove, serving as treasurer of the lodge for many years. I am one of the trustees of the B. H. Harrison Estate which owns the brick building at 114 North Mock Street.



F & M tellers work area inside main bank.

The first floor of this building is occupied by the Prairie Grove Enterprise and the second floor is used by the Masonic Lodge and the Order of the Eastern Star. I am presently serving as a member of the Prairie Grove Battlefield Commission. My five-year term will expire June 13, 1991. I have served on this commission since my first appointment by Governor Orval Faubus on February 9, 1962. As treasurer of the commission, I handled all the finances including the $100,000.00 gift from the Bisco Hindman Estate, also, both state money and local money, while the park was being developed and before it was made a state park in 1971. I am presently serving on the Washington County Soil Conservation District. I was appointed to that position in March of 1966, to fill a vacancy created by the death of Hugh Williams. I have been reappointed each three years since then.

I first became interested in soil conservation in 1924 when O. L. McMurray was serving as County Agent of Washington County. He served as County Agent from 1923 to 1927. Mr. McMurray came out to the McBride Farm, which my father owned and where we lived, and surveyed lines so we could build terraces. This ten-acre field had sheet erosion. My father built the necessary equipment to put up the terraces and we used our horse power to do the terracing. Floyd Cantrell owns and lives on this farm and this is one of the better fields on this 80-acre farm today.

In 1932, President Franklin D. Roosevelt inherited a bundle of problems, including a critical topsoil crisis. Severe water and wind erosion was robbing the country of its capacity to produce food and fiber. Rivers were running thick with silt and windstorms were scooping up the soil of the Midwest and dumping it like tumbleweed seed all the way to the East Coast and out into the Atlantic Ocean.

After a few false starts, Congress passed public Law 46 authorizing the creation of soil conservation districts that would enable landowners to make use of programs designed to slow the erosion of their land.

Within a week after Mr. Roosevelt notified the governors that the Standard State Soil Conservation District Act had been passed, the Arkansas Legislature came through with the enabling bill. Governor Carl E. Bailey signed the measure March 3, 1937, and Arkansas became the first state to authorize creation of districts for the purpose of saving the topsoil, protecting the purity of the water, and restoring the vitality of the rural environment. The NACD, formed in 1946, evolved after other states followed the Arkansas lead.

Even though the county-size soil and water conservation districts have the pragmatic purpose of serving as a link between the landowner and Federal Soil Conservation Service (SCS), their members possess the zeal of missionaries in preserving the nation's soil and water resources. The realities of their task are well understood.

There are no undiscovered reserves of productive land. ("What you see is what you've got.")

Soil is one of the few natural resources that must be used and maintained simultaneously. Other minerals—ore, petroleum, coal—are taken from the earth, separated from their impurities, and used. Soil must be managed wisely while it is used and used again. If it is destroyed or carried away by water or wind erosion, it can be restored only after generations of careful management.

Silt, the product of erosion, is the most damaging of all water contaminants. The quality of streams and reservoirs is degraded when fields are allowed to lose their topsoil.

Members of the NACD may not always agree on bureaucratic details of their programs, but they understand their mission. They are dedicated to the preservation and improvement of the nation's most valuable resource—its soil and water—as a guarantee that future generations will inherit the capacity to produce ample supplies of food and clothing.

History is littered with the relics of nations that lost their capacity to feed their people.

Harp's IGA

From Corner Grocery to Supermarket Chain

Harvard Harp and his wife, Floy, went into the grocery business in 1930. The chain of super markets known today as Harp's Food Stores, Inc., are as far removed, cosmetically, from that first Harp's Cash Grocery Store as 1930 Springdale is from the Springdale of 1988.

Harvard Harp was born and raised on a farm just two miles east of Springdale. He married a Clarksville girl named Floy Ferguson and began planning for the future, one that didn't include farming. After the birth of their son, Don, Harvard left for California, sending for Floy and the baby after he'd found work and a place to live.

In a little less than two years in California, Harvard Harp managed to save the $500 stake needed to begin a business in Springdale. When he and his family returned from California, the "Great Depression" was just beginning. Harp, however, didn't let that stop him from opening Harp's Cash Groceries. This small grocery store was on the corner of Emma Avenue and Water Street. Harvard made his own deliveries in a truck with the store name and phone number hand lettered on the door of the truck.

Together, he and Floy worked in the store, putting in long hours those first years to prove hard times won't keep a grocery business from succeeding. His feeling was people had to eat, even if times were hard. He knew, because he had a family to feed. Two more sons, Reland and Gerald were born and one daughter, Judy.

After eleven years and before the start of the second world war, in 1941, he moved his store across the street on Emma Avenue to a larger building. He bought Head's Grocery at the corner of Emma and Spring streets and renamed it Publix Market. It was in the late forties that he tried partnerships with both Marion Crowder and Dwight Thornsberry (grocery on the corner of Holcomb and Emma) later buying each of them out.

By the late 40s, Harp was ready to try his hand at farming again. He was tired of the long hours in the grocery business and wanted more free time for fishing and to spend with Floy.

Instead, he found himself putting in longer hours and ended up employing a full-time hand to help him. The farming venture lasted about five years.

His oldest son, Don, (who graduated from U of A in 1950 and then entered the Air Force) was discharged from service in 1953. Don's letters to his family, during his tour of duty, had made it clear that he was ready to try the grocery business if his dad was ready to go into partnership with him.

Together, Harvard and Don Harp formed a partnership and opened a store at the intersection of Highways 68 and 71 in 1953. They called it the Food Palace. By 1956, they'd opened Harp's IGA across the street at the same intersection, and Harvard discontinued farming altogether and actively joined in the management of the store. This was Springdale's first super market and one of the largest in the state at the time. Harvard was proud of that accomplishment, but Don saw it as only a beginning.

Don's two brothers, Reland and Gerald Harp were growing up in the store working as stock boys, carrying out groceries, cashiering or cleaning out the store. Both of them joined the company after they graduated from the U of A.

Floy had remained active cashiering, bagging groceries or filling in wherever needed. Don's wife, Martha Miller (a Rogers girl), kept books for the stores until the birth of their five daughters kept her busy at home full time.

1956 - Opening day of first supermarket in Springdale. Located on the southeast corner of the intersection of Sunset and South Thompson.

By 1964 another Harp's IGA was added north of Springdale at the Plaza Shopping Center (Highway 71 and Backus Street).

Floy continued to buy and stock health and beauty aids sold in the stores even after Harvard died (the result of an automobile accident in 1968). Work proved therapeutic for her, and she would probably still be found working in one of the stores today, if arthritis hadn't constricted her activities.

Some of Don and Martha's daughters or sons-in-law have joined the family business. Julie Priest is their oldest daughter. Patty's husband, David Reynolds is Meat Manager for Harp's West, and Shelly's husband, Walter Benson is Store Manager for the Berryville store. Twins, Tina Baker and Gina Bell are not presently active in the business.

With 16 stores, 14 in northern Arkansas and two in Poteau and Bartlesville Oklahoma, there is enough work for any family member who wants to be part of the corporation.

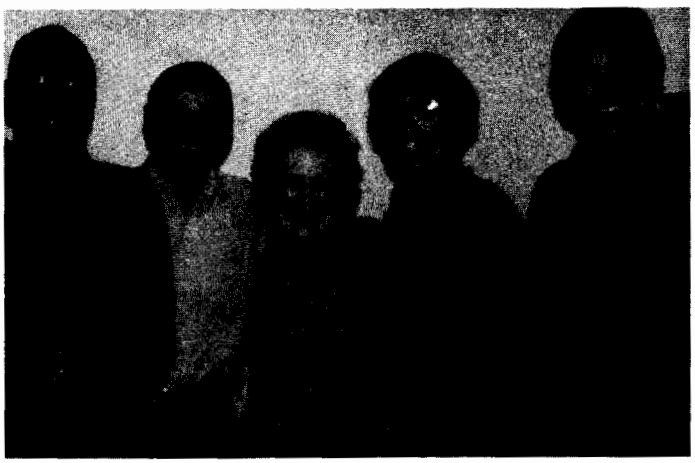
The three Springdale stores, Harp's North, Harp's West and Price Cutter (at the original site of the first Harp's IGA built in 1956), represent both kinds of store operations. Harp's west and Harp's north are representative of the conventional super market which provides full service store to car, and Price Cutter which is a warehouse type store offering limited service and lower prices.

Other store locations throughout Arkansas include three Ft. Smith stores, Harp's in Berryville, Marshall, Yellville, Mountain Home, Bull Shoals, Walnut Ridge, Rector, and Calico Rock.

In most locations Harp's has been and remains the primary grocery retailer. In addition to the stores, warehouse operations are an important part of the corporation. This includes Discount Distributors Warehouse located in Springdale. Staffed by professional buyers and merchandisers, this operation enables Harp's to be more competitive in a highly competitive retail industry and allows them to supply other retailers as well.

The untimely death of Reland in 1986, who was only 50 at the time, was followed seven months later by another family tragedy. Harvard and Floy's only daughter, Judy VanHoose, died as the result of an accident.

Judy had not been actively involved with the family business but was an important part of the community and had served as organist for a number of years for the First United Methodist Church, Springdale. Her husband, Jerry, and her three children Max, Jill and Justin, as well as her entire family, were devastated by the double loss of Judy and her brother, Reland.



Reland, Don, Floy, Judy and Gerald - January, 1980.

Don Harp remains at the helm as president and chief operating officer, he credits much of the present-day operational success of Harp's to his brothers Reland (who at the time of his death was vice-president) and to Gerald, who is the corporation's vice-president of operations.

Harp's Cash Grocery - 1930 - on East Emma in Springdale.

Gerald Harp's contribution to the corporation has included his own children. Kimi Blythe, twin to Timi Ray, works at Discount Distribution Warehouse as does her brother Jerry. Timi is personnel manager at Ft. Smith while Timi's husband, Frankie Ray is a Grocery Department Manager at Ft. Smith. Jacqueline (Jackie) lives in Springdale.

Reland's wife, Carolyn, worked as bookkeeper for Harp's for a number of years until four sons took so much of her time. Mike, the oldest son, is a Grocery Department Manager, Randall is a management trainee, Phillip works at the north store in Springdale, and Greg fills in wherever he's needed in Springdale.

Expansion is a continuing part of the evolution of super-marketing. Harp's will continue to set the trends in modernizing and adding conveniences for its customers. One stop-shopping has become a way of life for Americans, and Harp's meets the customers needs almost before they are requested.

Each new Harp's location is thoroughly surveyed and analyzed before a Harp's is ever erected. Whether a warehouse store or a conventional store is chosen for a site, the same Harp's philosophy serves the community. A large variety of merchandise, high quality, fresh produce and meat, well-trained employees and clean stores are offered. The customer's voice continues to be the final word in any decision-making.

A less well-known part of Harp's philosophy is the generosity of their giving back to the community from which so much success has been made possible.

Foodstuffs that are still nutritionally good (i. e. day-old baked goods, fruits, vegetables and meats) are delivered to area-wide institutions or distribution centers that take care of the elderly, and indigent. Harp's Stores are known throughout northwest Arkansas on "hit" lists for every school, church, social and charitable organization as a business who will donate supplies for charitable causes.

All in all, Harp's remains a hometown grocery store, not too different in its basic concept of community than the old corner grocery that started it all.

Dr. Dwight Heathman

Skill, Technology and Psychology Tools of Dentistry

Dwight Heathman, upon graduation from Huntsville High School (Madison County), knew he wanted to be a healthcare professional but not necessarily a physician. He didn't want to be called in the middle of the night to go deliver a baby. But he did like taking care of children and was interested in the health of others.

According to Heathman, while growing up in Madison County, he watched Springdale's (6,000 population at that time) rate of growth and pictured himself and his family in what seemed to be the "hub" for all the growth potential in northwest Arkansas. He wanted to be a part of that Springdale growth.

The key extractors (centered) were dental tools used in the 18th century. The kit of dental instruments were carried during the Civil War. The bone, ivory and mother of pearl handles show the handmade workmanship and quality of those periods.

Right after graduation, he went into the Navy and a program that trained him to be a dental technician. After serving his four years, he knew that he wanted to be a dentist and eventually have his own family practice.

He had just missed the GI benefits accorded to veterans of the Korean Conflict and had served just prior to Vietnam, so he was ineligible to receive tuition until his final semester of dental school.

He entered Arkansas State University (Jonesboro) and continued his studies at the University of Tennessee's College of Dentistry in Memphis. He graduated in 1965.

"My wife, Helen, was a Home Economics major and went to work as a medical secretary at St. Jude Hospital to help put me through dental school. She earned her Ph. T (putting hubby through). She was presented with that award upon my graduation," Heathman said.

Heathman's graduation was after Arkansas State Boards had already been offered that year, and he was forced to wait until 1966 for his Arkansas license. An offer from North Carolina State came through that gave him a chance to be Public Health Dentist for three of their counties; he took it.

"I guess you could call me a circuit riding dentist. I took my equipment with me as visiting dentist for every school in all three counties for nine months," Heathman said.

He first practiced with Dr. Oscar M. Kimbrough (now deceased) at 712 West Meadow for about two and a half years. It was after that he purchased the property at 525 Sanders where he still practices.

"It was a cow pasture then. It was surrounded by a dairy barn, chicken houses and land. I wanted my own office, though, and was lucky enough to have chosen what has turned out to be an excellent location. I guess that's why I'm still there," Heathman said.

Twice, Heathman took associates into his general practice. The first time, in the late 1970s, Dr. Gary Cohen joined the practice but went on to school in St. Louis to become an orthodontist and is now practicing dentistry in Clarksville, Tennessee

Dr. Larry Fincher worked with Dr. Heathman for a brief time but currently practices in Little Rock.

Heathman pointed out differences between the first staff he needed and his present staff. Early practice only required a support staff of one. He now employs five. This indicates the growth of not only his practice but of Springdale.

"When I first came to Springdale, I think there were only about seven dentists. Equipment had not yet become state-of-the-art nor did it offer the relatively pain-free and pleasant care it now offers with the new anesthetics developed. I have four operatories available (patient rooms) one solely for emergency treatment," Heathman said.

The biggest change to Springdale dentistry, according to Heathman, came as a result of fluoride being added to city water. Before fluoridation, children, even on their first visit, showed a lot of tooth decay. After fluoridation of city water, more than 60% of the children he sees are cavity-free.

Heathman's staff increase is due to the two dental hygienists, he employs, Deborah Weiser and Diane Wright. In addition, he has two chairside assistants. They are Laura Irwin and Pam Phipps.

The one employee who, over the years, has earned the title Heathman's "right arm" is Melvia Comley. Melvia has been with him 15 years as receptionist, payroll, bookkeeper and his own daily personal "reminder."

"I'm not ready to retire. I like what I do, and I like seeing the patients I've had over the years. I've treated some through childhood and adulthood. I hope to stay around to treat their children," Heathman said.

Heathman plans to add one more staff member in the near future. His nephew and namesake, Dwight Duckworth, will be graduating from dental school within the next year. He'll join Heathman's practice.

A continual learning process is required to keep up with the rapid changes and innovations to modern dental technology. The computer has changed a lot of things but, alone, can't make a nervous patient relax. That's still 90% of the dentist's responsibility, Heathman points out.

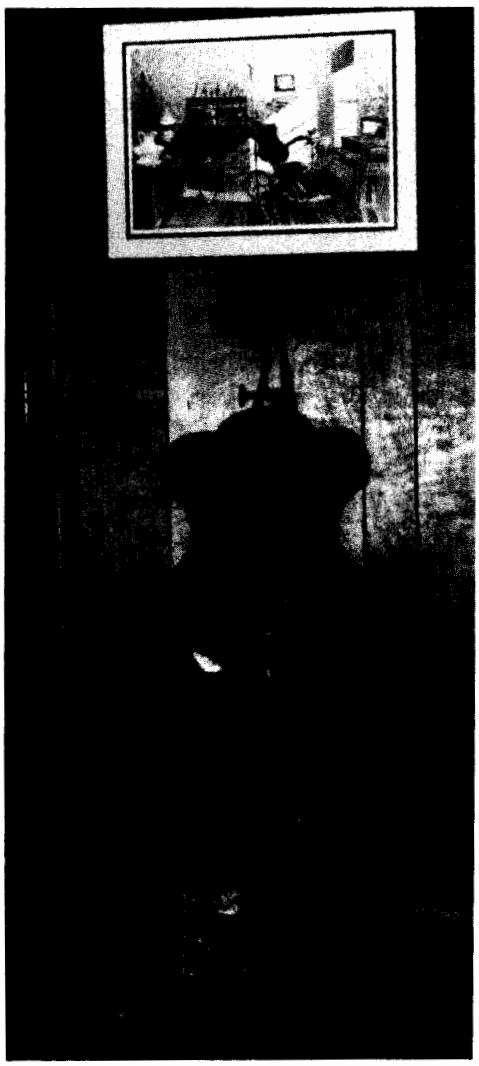
Heathman believes Springdale is as modern and up-to-date as any community, but it puzzles him why specialists in dental surgery seem to skip Springdale and go to Rogers or Fayetteville. He claims with the dental field becoming so crowded, the new and younger dental talent needs to look toward these specializations. He wants to see Springdale claim some of this new talent and knowledge.



This antique dental chair was standard equipment around 1840. It is displayed at Dr. Dwight Heathman's office on Sanders Street.

There is a creative side to dentistry, and it is this side that fascinates and holds Heathman's interest. Crown and bridge restoration have improved to such an extent that detecting the tooth or teeth replaced is becoming more difficult. This way of improving a person's appearance gives Heathman a great deal of satisfaction.

Another relatively new phase of dentistry is "esthetic' or "cosmetic" dentistry. Laminated or porcelain veneers are bonded directly to the surface of anterior teeth. This improves size, color and shape creating the desired "cosmetic" effect.

Maintaining memberships in the American Dental Association, the Arkansas State Dental Society and the Ozark Study Club keeps him in touch with dentist friends to talk "shop." They keep each other informed about what is and isn't being done in today's dental practice.

Heathman is past president of the Springdale Rotary Club (a Paul Harris Fellow), past president of the Board of Trustees for Shiloh Museum, past president of the administrative board of the First United Methodist Church and still actively serves. Helen Heathman is involved in many church projects too. She also volunteers her time to the Crisis Hotline.

Neither of Heathman's children has chosen to follow him into family practice, but Monty, 22, has completed a Video-Tech course and is working toward a B. A. in Radio, Television and Films. Daughter, Holly, 20, is pursuing her M. B. A. at Hendrix College.

The stress connected with a profession that is both loved and hated by those it treats, requires getting away from the practice on occasion. At these times Heathman gives in to his hobby of looking for antiques. Special "finds" over the years include adding pieces to an ongoing lead crystal collection and a dental chair that dates back to pre-Civil War.

About eight or nine years ago, Melvia (his "right arm") saw an ad in a trade journal asking for bids on the antique chair. Heathman followed up on it, and to his surprise was awarded the bid. A bonus included a refund. In his eagerness to bid high enough for the chair, he bid over what the man's asking price was. He received a rebate. The chair is on display at Heathman's office.

Aside from wishing that people would be more practical in their judgement and assessment of dentists' supposed wealth, Heathman is quite happy he went into the dental profession.

"People have the idea that all dentists are rich. There's no way of refuting that belief," he said.

"I read an article in the Grapevine (a local independent newspaper)by Kay Hall entitled Putting the Bite on Fear. I know Kay, and though it's written tongue-in-cheek, it pretty well expresses how she and a lot of others feel about visiting a dentist. She's allowed a few excerpts to be reprinted here," Heathman said.

"There is a universal fear that crosses all barriers of culture, language, age, sex, time and space. It is the most powerful fear known to mankind. This is not the fear of death or divorce; baldness or bankruptcy; but the universal fear of the dentist."

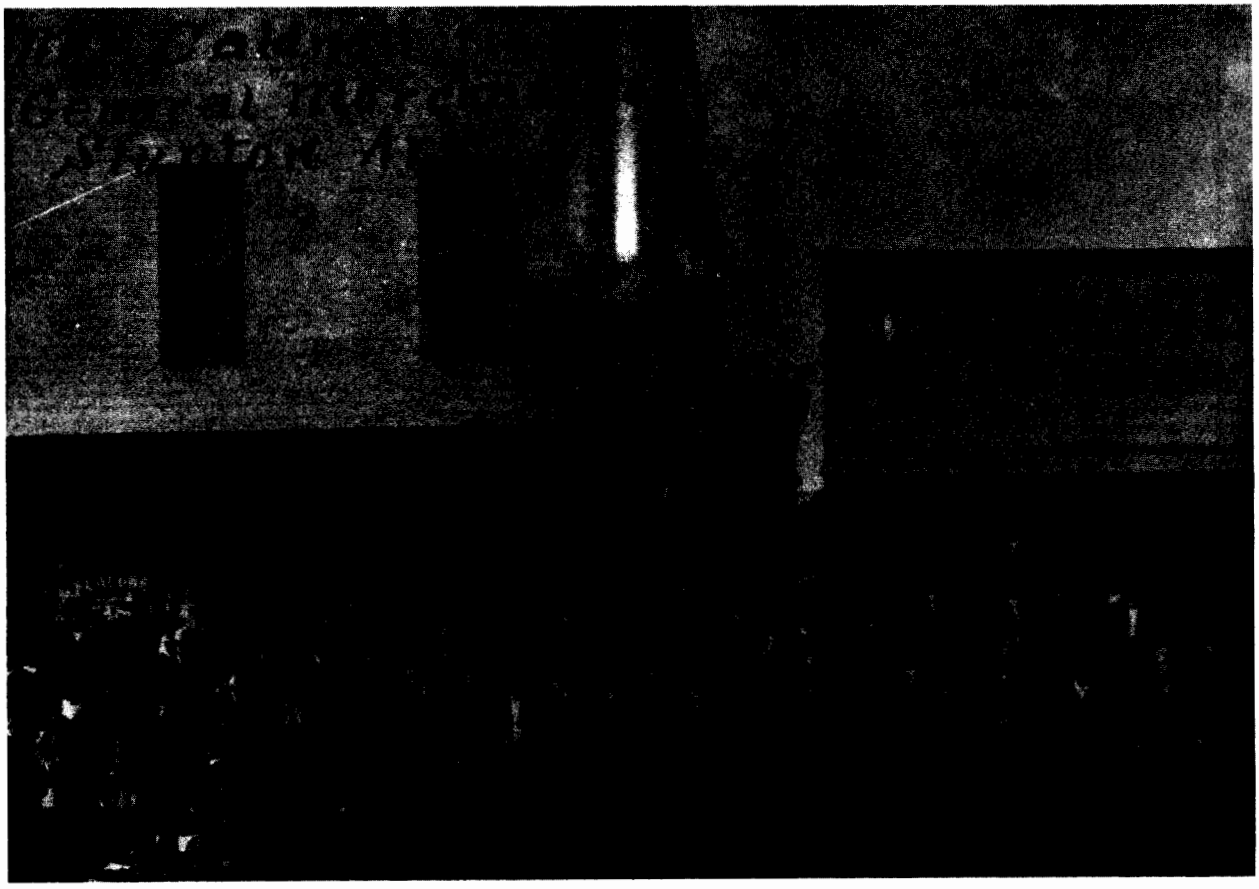
"While in that dental chair, I barely open my mouth and wonder at the perverseness that allows me to expose my other orifices without a blush, while I clench the arms of that chair until my knuckles whiten with the constant admonition: 'Open wider.'"

"To these unique and gifted beings on whom we bestow the inadequate title of dentist, I confess. There were countless times through impacted wisdom teeth, abscesses, root canals and common toothaches, when I'd beg to see this Devil's disciple. In fact, I've viewed him as my own personal angel of mercy. When pain has me cowed, immobilized to the extent that I feel only the throbbing, throbbing, I'd pay any price, sacrifice my first-born to gain relief. I recognize that he is truly an artisan, craftsman, doctor, aye, a demi-god."

"During these infrequent lapses I don't call him a robber or accuse him of making payments on his Mercedes with money from my mouth—at least not until I'm free from pain."

"When that pain ends he returns to the top of my list of people and places to avoid. Human nature simply doesn't allow for the erection of dental pedestals of permanence, only temporary restorations."

"Taking the bite out of fear still sets my teeth on edge, but I'll never grind them for fear of wearing away the gold. If and when my dentist reaches those pearly gates and receives that crown of gold earned for having me as his patient, I hope that it's fitted over his teeth, one by one."

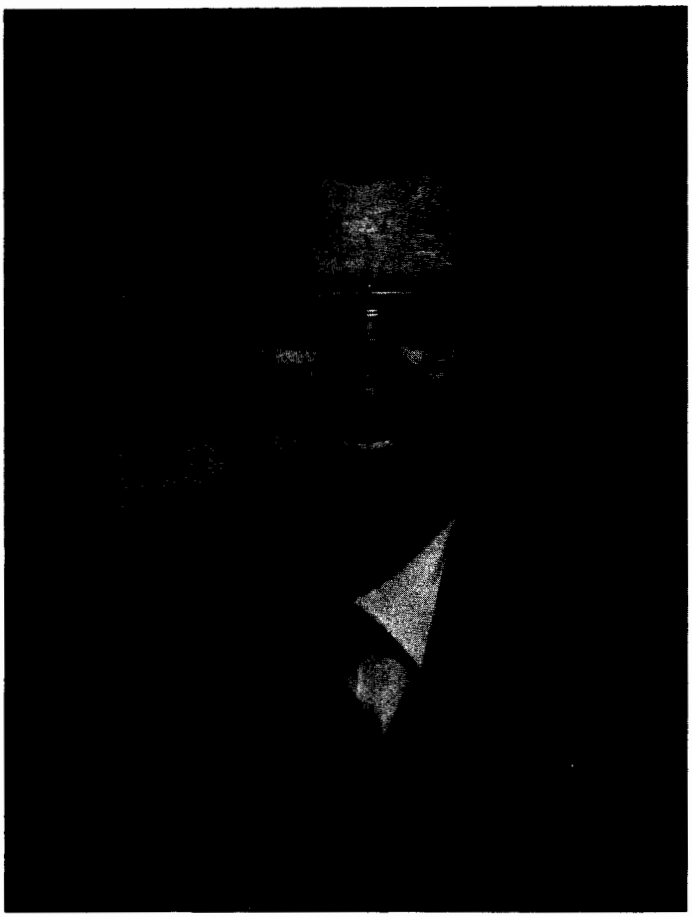


State Representative Jerry E. Hinshaw

The story of state Representative Jerry E. Hinshaw, of Springdale, is of a Southerner who grew up in the North but whose heart has always been in the South—"I'm a Southerner who's come home. I've always been a Southerner even though born and raised in the Midwest." And without a doubt, he has returned South to make a significant contribution to Arkansas politics and business.

The Hinshaw family is an old Southern family from Snow Camp, North Carolina. After the Civil War and the devastation it caused in the South, along with the occupation government of the North, Jerry's grandfather, Milton, advised his son (Jerry's father), Ross, to move to the North where life would be better. Literally migrating north by foot, the Hinshaws homesteaded 40 acres in northern Indiana. Growing up on a grain farm gave Jerry an appreciation of and insight into agriculture, which would prove invaluable in his political career.

Early in life, Jerry was impressed with the value of education, as his grandfather had only gone through the third grade, and his father had dropped out of high school in his freshman year. Diligently applying himself to his studies in grade school and high school, Jerry decided to enroll at Purdue University in Lafayette, Indiana, in the midst of the Great Depression.



Rep. Jerry E. Hinshaw

Working his way through college, Jerry spent only $482 that he did not earn in his four years. He became interested in politics at the university and ran for and was elected to the biggest office on campus, the presidency of the Independent Students, with a membership of 4,000. He graduated from Purdue with a B. S. in Agriculture.

After graduation, Jerry wanted to work in the South and obtained a job as a sales manager with the Ralston-Purina Co. in St. Louis, Missouri. It was while living in St. Louis that he met his wife-to-be, Betty, and they were married June 25, 1949. Shortly after his marriage, Jerry and his family transferred to Jacksonville, Florida.

Then in 1951 Jerry resigned from the company and went into the poultry business with Western Hatcheries in Dallas, Texas. In 1956, Jerry moved to Washington County and established a poultry breeding farm for Arbor Acres. He ran the farm until 1968, when he sold his interest and turned to cattle ranching. He stayed in ranching until 1976, then sold out and established a real estate business which he operates today.

Governor Bill Clinton receives a copy of Call The Roll from Rep. Jerry Hinshaw.

Jerry Hinshaw's Arkansas and Washington County political career began in 1964, when he ran as a Republican for the seat in the third congressional district. His opponent was a 22-year incumbent. But despite the great built-in edge of incumbency, Jerry received 47.5 per cent of the vote, proving the vulnerability of his opponent. His '64 race gave area Republicans a real emotional boost, and in 1966 John Paul Hammerschmidt was able to win the seat.

Jerry's political ambitions were put on hold for 10 years until in 1974, Amendment 55 to the state constitution, was passed which set up the county quorum court as a legislative body. In 1976, he was elected as a Justice of the Peace on the Washington County Quorum Court. He was overwhelmingly reelected in 1978 and 1980 without opposition. Later in 1980, Jerry resigned the JP position and was elected as state Representative for Springdale (District 11). He has held that position ever since, being reelected each year without opposition.

Rep. Hinshaw is the senior member of the Agriculture and Economic Development Committee and the Public Transportation Committee. Since agriculture and transportation are the two most important segments of the northwest Arkansas economy, Rep. Hinshaw, as the senior member on these committees, is in a vitally important position for his constituency.

While Rep. Hinshaw has been involved in many legislative acts, one of which he is very proud of is his co-sponsorship of the 1983 Omnibus Driving While Intoxicated (DWI) Act. This act brought real reform to DWI enforcement in Arkansas. In 1985, he sponsored a bill which provided for the remodeling and upgrading of the poultry and livestock diagnostic center north of Springdale.

Another major achievement contributed by Rep. Hinshaw has been his authorship of Call The Roll, a book on the history of the first 100 years of the Arkansas General Assembly. The book was published in 1986 by the Department of Arkansas Heritage, and will be going into another printing.

Like many Republicans in the era of Ronald Reagan, Rep. Hinshaw believes government has gotten too big and impersonal on the national and state levels. He feels government is trying to do too many things for people, things which people could do for themselves. The over involvement of government in the lives of people, he says, is counter-productive and causes hardships on many. "There is just too much government regulation, red tape and laws."

A major tenet of Rep. Hinshaw's political philosophy is equity: "If one person has to pay a tax, then I should have to pay it, too. So many things in government today are not equitable, and what I try to do is legislate with equity in mind."

Rep. Hinshaw and Betty have four children, three daughters and a son, all living in the South and contributing to the region's development. Anita is a Doctor of Veterinary Medicine in Springdale; Catherine is the Executive Director of the Arkansas Policeman's and Fireman's Pension Fund; Dawn is a journalist in Columbia, South Carolina; and son, Ross, is a ministerial student in Keen, Texas.

Jerry Hinshaw set his goal early in life to help make the South a better place to live. With that dream, he has made his most significant contributions to northwest Arkansas in one of the most important areas of endeavor—politics. And even more importantly, he and his wife have passed that dream on to their children.

Holland Nursing/Retirement Centers

Longer Lives and Alternative Care

Tom Holland, at 24, was working for the Springdale Fire Department as an emergency medical technician and had made many ambulance "runs" that took patients from retirement and nursing homes to and from the hospital.

When the retirement center on Lowell Road was offered for sale by Freida Caldwell in 1976, Holland showed a great deal of determination, positive thinking, and an aggressive ability to wheel and deal in order to purchase the property.

Lounge area.

Being 24 didn't deter him from getting the financing needed nor did it prevent him from buying the north location a year later from Florence Hammond and adding yet another location (west) purchased from Don Hendricks the following year in 1978.

Holland Nursing Center West, Inc., (802 South West End Street, Springdale) was built in 1958, Holland North (2501 Lowell Road, Springdale) in 1960 and Holland Retirement Center, Inc., (also 2501 Lowell Road) was built in 1963.

"Even that first year I saw the potential for growth or expansion to care for patients recovering from serious accidents or illness. I saw a need to introduce more space and extra facilities for retirees who were still mentally and physically alert but still might have some special care needs," Holland said.

Outside retirement center.

"There was also the consideration that, as owner, I would be working for myself. It wasn't long before my mother, Dixie Holland, joined the staff of Holland North as a certified dietetic manager, planning menus and managing the kitchen staff," Holland added. My wife, Jodie, is a registered nurse and is also a part of the Holland staff."

This triple operation presently employs 65. Deanna Shackelford remained as administrator for Holland North. Holland points out that he would be lost without her help. He credits her with having helped him with all three facilities.

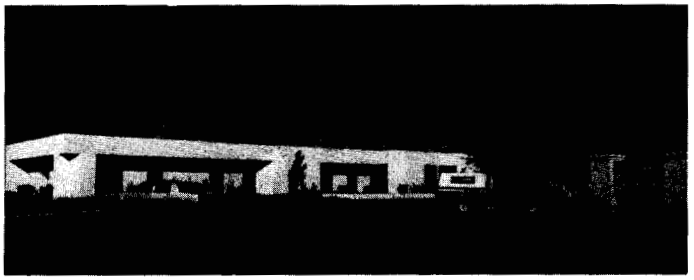
Holland North

In 1978 the retirement center had a capacity to house only 25, Holland expanded the facility to its present capability of housing 40 retirees.

He pointed out that this included private and semi-private quarters and that the cost was comparable to renting an apartment in the area and paying utilities and food costs. The big difference is that laundry, preparation of meals, individual care such as having prescribed medication distributed at proper intervals is made available. And staff is always on hand to meet the needs or simply to talk and reassure those living there.

Rooms are about 15 X 17, and patients are encouraged to bring some familiar possessions (a favored chair or desk, etc.) they hold dear to make them feel more at home.

"Coffee hours, socials, ladies' groups, men's groups, cards, games, television viewing and video watching are all available. We have outings to shop or for picnics or walks around the mall. Many like to exercise this way during the winter months, and we offer aerobic exercise to music three times a week even for those confined to wheelchairs," Holland related.



Holland Nursing Center on West End Street, Springdale, Arkansas.

During the "outdoor" season there are ample grounds to walk around between the retirement center and the nursing home as well as a covered porch across the entire front of the building.

Holland remains an active member of the Arkansas State Nursing Home Association, having served in the past on its board. He likes to keep in touch with other members who might have fresh ideas or better ways of administering to the needs of the sick and elderly.

Holland West is in the process of expansion. Originally 8,000 square feet, a new 13,000 square feet structure has been added. The old and new buildings will be joined, and between them will be small courtyards with flower gardens and seating areas. These open areas add light to the rooms on the court when the vertical blinds are opened.

The new addition has been decorated with warm colors. Aqua carpet covers part of the area including the entry and administrative offices. Patient rooms are roomy and often have comfortable arm chairs or recliners tilted at an angle for television viewing.

Activity room.

North and West facilities both have physical therapy rooms (therapists come to the patients) with a whirlpool tub and a range of motion exercises.

Dr. Ralph Power (Springdale Clinic) is staff doctor for all three homes.

The Holland North Nursing Home was featured in a monthly nursing home publication. It is also next on Holland's schedule for expansion from its present bed capacity of 56 to 70.

"Government regulation of nursing and retirement homes is necessary but also increases operational costs while the money allocated by the government under Medicaid doesn't come close to covering present day costs. In addition, in order to keep good people staffed, you have to pay competitive wages. I'm in the process now of working out a graduated salary increase for the nurse assistants on staff. We've always paid more than is required, but we like to keep a solid and experienced staff," Holland said.

Holland was in agreement that nursing homes and retirement homes should be subject to inspection not only by government but potential patients, patient-families and visitors. He welcomes visits that check the care and facilities provided in or by his three establishments.

"We bathe and change the bedding or patient's clothing as needed. We don't postpone cleaning up after accidents until shift changes. We care for each patient and address the situation as it happens," he said.

Holland doesn't see retirement centers or nursing homes as depressing. He doesn't correlate sickness and death to his three "care" centers.

Holland expressed the thought that today, in 1988, People receive better medical attention, eat better, get more exercise and live longer. Sometimes they outlive relatives who could have cared for them at home.

The care that Holland provides leaves free time to enjoy the company of others. He mentioned that his nine year old daughter, Emily, is a frequent visitor to the nursing home (West) and visits with the patients who are in good spirits after being greeted by a young and friendly face.

"Some of the patients really look forward to a brief visit from Emily. There are too few young people to cheer the patients, and she sort of fills in for the grandchildren who may live across the country," Holland said.

Resident's room with personal belongings decorating the walls.

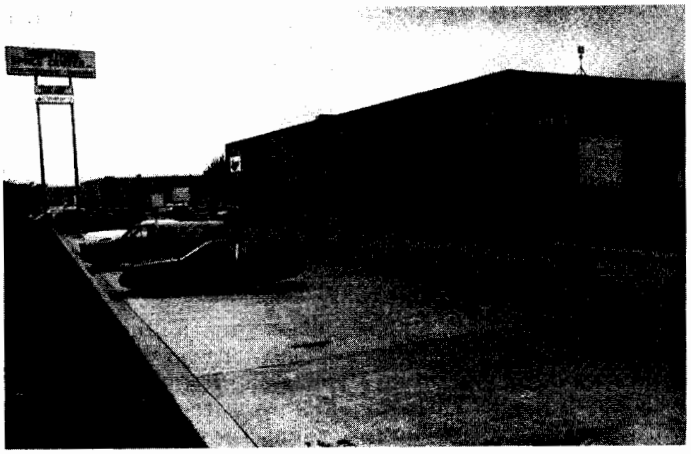
Holland doesn't work a straight 40 hour week, but he manages to maintain a positive and upbeat attitude that is reflected in the faces he greets when walking through the halls of Holland West.

Calling the patients by name gives them a good sense of self-worth and individuality. It indicates to them that Mr. Holland isn't just an administrator, but the young man who always smiles and knows who they are. They may go to him, talk to him if they need to. His door is always open.

Industrial Space Center

Industrial Growth Met By Space Center

In 1980 Joe Edwards stood looking at the 15 acres on the corner of Highway 68 East and Highway 265. He was surrounded to the north by the airport, to the south by residences, to the east by pastureland, grazing cattle and chicken houses, and to the west lay Springdale proper. He felt much like the Lone Ranger. . .a man with a cause.



Industrial Space Center

He had vision and insight that enabled him to bring jobs and industry to Springdale. He knew he could build a large enough complex of offices and warehouses to house new or existing businesses. Getting financial backing for such an undertaking was another story.

Edwards told his wife, Janice, his plan. She had been with him in Fort Smith when he'd worked for his dad, Joe William Edwards, a well-known roofing contractor, and she had kept books for him when he began his commercial and industrial roofing company in Springdale. Believing in him was one thing, financial backing was another.

Both of them knew that a project of such magnitude would require millions of dollars, but Edwards had seen the need for a complex to house satellite businesses, many that would be direct results of dealing with Tyson's, Wal-Mart's and trucking industry such as Jones Trucking.

Edwards had seen how his roofing business had prospered with half his jobs being the result of giants of industry like the three mentioned. The need for small service and supply businesses to be housed near such industry was not being met. It was to these outlying (and out of state) businesses that Edwards looked for possible tenancy of the complex he envisioned.

"Some of my friends laughed at me wanting to build offices and warehouses so close to the Springdale Airport runway—almost to the runway, but I had a feeling about it. I knew it was a good location. I was tired of businesses going in both directions to Rogers or to Fayetteville. Springdale had a need, and I felt I had a solution. I had seen areas like Denver and St. Louis that were veritable hubs. I foresaw Springdale as a mini-hub of industry requiring satellite and subsidiary business to perpetuate and maintain its growth," Edwards said.

Edwards banged on door after door, gathering enough interest from potential lessees to confirm his belief that an industrial complex would work. He visited Dallas, Memphis, St. Louis and any city he heard about that housed the kind of industrial park he had in mind.

It was while on a ski trip with his family (the Edwards have two sons, Greg and Chris) in Colorado, that he saw the kind of industrial center he wanted to build in Springdale.

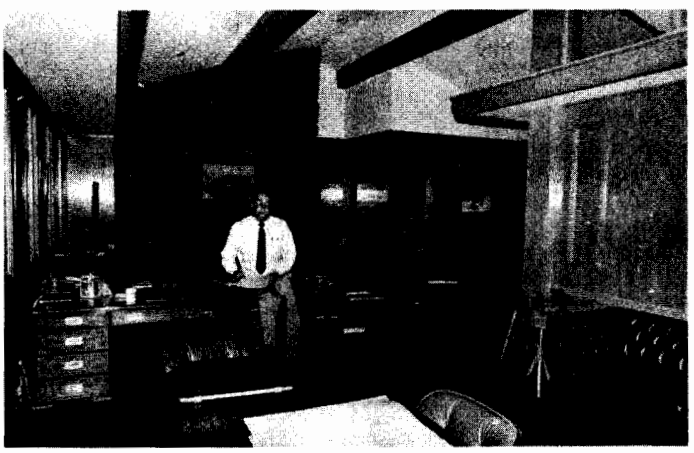
It was Edwards' friend, Jerre VanHoose, who shot the original photographs of the industrial park in Denver upon which Springdale's Industrial Space Center was reworked and designed.

Edwards took the photos to Northwest Engineers, Fayetteville, and, together, they worked out the first designs and blueprints that were to become, in reality, the 420,000 square foot complex that occupies the 30 acre corner of Highway 68 East and Highway 265.

Financial backing still hadn't been forthcoming, but Edwards' first break came with Springdale's First National Bank recognizing the potential for constructing such an innovative industrial complex for soliciting new and existing outside businesses to the area. Their initial loan resulted in McIlroy Bank, Fayetteville; First National Bank, Fayetteville; Bank of Fayetteville and United Federal Savings and Loan, Springdale; following suit and providing the funds needed for the Industrial Space Center to be constructed.

"When I began the plans for this project, interest on loans was about 9% (with the usury law in effect in Arkansas). By the time I got the backing in 1981, interest had climbed to 19% and construction costs had skyrocketed," Edwards said with the assurance and good humor that comes from knowing that 100% of his Industrial Space Center was presently leased.

Janice, never doubted the success of her husband's efforts and pointed out that he had been wise enough to solicit tenants to lease space before continuing to add new construction.



Joe Edwards

"Joe has never had any unleased space for more than 60 days. That more than anything else has probably been one of the greatest reasons for the success of this place. Construction will never end, but neither will Joe overextend. He continually studies the needs of northwest Arkansas and plans for its satellite growth accordingly," she said.

Lack of occupants has never been a problem at Industrial Space Center. Edwards contends that the biggest complaint from prospective tenants is his inability to build fast enough to keep up with requests for space. This complaint and the need for more parking made it necessary to purchase an additional 15 bringing it up to the 30 acres now a part of the complex.

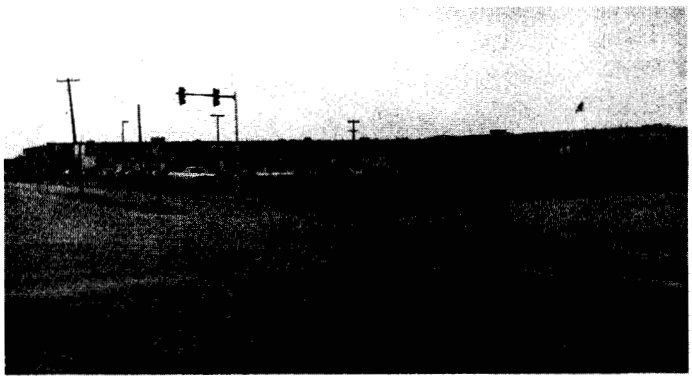
When construction began, Edwards made the selection of materials. He mainly chose concrete, copper and glass. He wanted the building exteriors to withstand time and the elements. He pointed out that even if his buildings were gutted, the exteriors could look the same in 150 years with sandblasting and by anodizing the copper.



Space Center complex corner of Highway 68 East and Highway 265 South in Springdale.

Heekin Can company was the first to sign a lease and remain with Edwards, but Clarke Company fills the largest amount of space, over 250,000 square feet, and employs about 300.

All the well-known courier (and overnight mailing) services are located within Industrial Space Center or Space Center North. Federal Express, Airborne Express, Emery Worldwide, and Purolator Courier are all tenants.

Other tenants include: Hyster Company, Econocom Maintenance, C. L. Swanson Company, Fluid Connections, Modern Business, Besco Business Equipment, Dayco Products, Brown Distributing Company, Carlton Bates Company and Centro, Inc.

Taking care of this duplex-multi-tenant facility would be enough work for most men, certainly enough time is required, but Edwards owns similar food distribution centers (or mini-hubs) in both Kansas and Missouri, as well.

"After a phone call Joe may get out of bed in the middle of the night just to drive around the complex and check to see that everything is all right. We keep the complex well-lit, and the Springdale police have been extremely cooperative in patrolling the area with regularity," Janice Edwards said.

Surprisingly, the greatest satisfaction for Joe Edwards has comes from being able to provide jobs for the young people in northwest Arkansas, young men in construction (like both his sons, ages 17 and 19) who come back to him after completing their college educations and go into business for themselves and come to him to lease space. The business brought into Springdale also means more jobs for local residents.

Edwards has at least one more big construction plan in mind for Springdale. He'd like to build a multi-story office building of glass and steel. He feels the present and projected growth will warrant such a building in the near future.

With plans always on the drawing board or with ongoing construction, the Edwards have to make time for their annual ski trips to Colorado these days. Relaxing moments are few but cherished, like the time they spend on Beaver Lake fishing from their boat.

Edwards gives much of the credit for his accomplishments to not only the faith of others in him but even those who lack faith in him. He seems to make opportunity from the obstacles presented to him by others. His inborn determination to fulfill his goals seems to bring the ability to sweep away or to find a way to capitalize on every objection he meets.

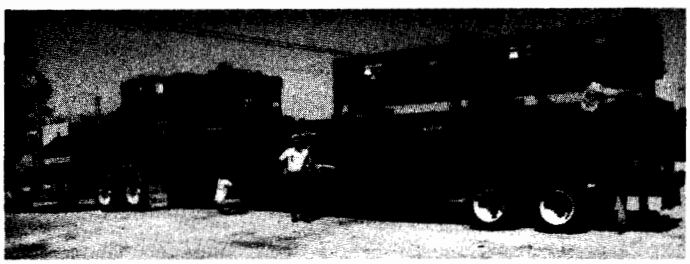
There is no question in Edwards' mind, that his right arm of support has been his wife, Janice. She works at his side and keeps his feet firmly planted in the present while his dreams tend to catch him up in the future.

The future he sees includes growth for Springdale and northwest Arkansas built by young men like his sons who will continue to contribute even greater ideas to bring improvement to the Springdale to come.

J. V. Manufacturing, Inc.
"If It Doesn't Work, You Don't Own It"

Jim Ulrich and Howard Long were returning from a delivery run in which Howard had delivered a cardboard paper baler to a Wal-Mart store. Howard suggested to Jim that he start building cardboard paper balers since there was no one in the area to build them. Jim, who had worked on the pipeline road in northern Alaska and had been a welder and heavy equipment mechanic on the Alaskan pipeline, had experience in welding, metal forming and heavy equipment operation was reluctant and wanted to drop the issue. As they ventured toward home, Howard pressed the issue asking Jim to estimate the cost of building the cardboard paper baler. They included the cost of the metal, the motor, parts, and cost of labor and came up with a figure of $4,500.00.

During the mid-winter of 1978, heavy construction had slacked off leaving Jim with plenty of time on his hands. But with spring coming it was time to start getting the equipment back into shape. All this time he kept the baler idea in the back of his mind. He rented a small building at 809 W. Allen in Springdale to work on dozers and expand on the baler idea.



Jack Perry standing beside truck loaded with three down-stroke baler on the front and "two-yard" compactors on the back.

Jim spoke with executives at Wal-Mart about the possibility of building balers for the company's stores. He got a gentleman's agreement that if he could build a better baler than they had been buying, they would buy it. So Jim went to work on his newest venture. The first models were "Hell building" as Jim put it. They were so far off that he cut them up and made work benches out of them.

Finally after many long, hard hours, Jim turned out something he could be proud of. He then sold his first baler to Poulan Chainsaw Company in southern Arkansas for $4,850.00.

That same baler is still in use today, and Jim drops by from time to time to see how it is operating. And so was the beginning of J. V. Manufacturing named after Jim and his wife, Viola.

Six months after Jim started the business, he brought in Jim Shields as half-owner. The first year they built between eight and ten balers and kept working to improve the baler. In 1979 the tradename, Cram-A-Lot, was adopted along with a patent on Jim's new baler.

As months passed the company grew. Three welders, an iron cutter and foreman, Robert Stokes, who still works at J. V. as production foreman and designer were brought on to help produce the balers. As the business expanded they began to outgrow the small shop. The business was moved to 303 Highway 68B on the east side of Springdale.

In 1981 Jack Perry bought out Jim Shields' half of the business and started promoting the balers heavily, through advertising promotions and trade shows. Now with production off the ground the business began to grow in leaps and bounds. Sales grew, production was stepped up and the company was striking new heights each month. In August, 1982, Jim Ulrich decided to retire, travel and go fishing and sold his half to Jack. During the first year that Jack had come to J. V., the company grew almost 400% and there was no foreseeable slow down in the future.

Jack and Janet Perry

Now that Jack was in charge of J. V. Manufacturing, a new challenge was presented to the company. Would the company expand? Would profits continue to turnover? How long would this era of prosperity last? Quickly Jack put all these fears to rest. He brought in his wife, Janet, who had advertising experience. And she took over advertising and promotion. Jack added more workers and brought in engineers to develop ways to enhance the quality of the baler.

Jack was a lifetime rancher and entered the baler business as something to fall back on when he and his wife retired because they felt they could handle it better than working on the ranch.

For four consecutive years Jack built on to J. V. manufacturing; in 1983 he added 25 feet on to the existing building. In 1984 he built a new 150' by 60' production building, and in 1985 he added another production building the same size along with a 230' by 80' building in 1986.

With the help of chief engineer, Jim Cunningham, J. V. Manufacturing has a complete line of trash equipment for almost any phase of the trash industry: downstroke balers, horizontal balers, 40 yard containers, just to name a few. They service many local companies and hospitals. But J. V. Manufacturing has not limited itself to locals, instead they sell throughout the fifty states, Mexico and the Virgin Islands, with plans for expansion to Canada in the near future.

Along with the line of trash equipment J. V. manufacturing developed a roll forming machine in 1983 called the Job Sitter. The Job Sitter is an industrial roofing machine that shapes roofing as it comes off a roll. The shaped sheet of metal is fed on to the roof of a building eliminating hard work and down time. The Job Sitter is designed for easy transportation, convenience and speed on the job. Although the Job Sitter is still young, Jack Perry expects a promising future for the new machine.

In 1986 J. V. Manufacturing came out with a five-yard compactor that is designed to extend the life of a landfill. This compactor packs and condenses trash better than ordinary compactors because of its size and design for high industrial use. The system has optional custom designed transfer stations which allow for strategic placement.

J. V. Manufacturing now employs 84 people. The company runs two production shifts a day, five days a week. The company does all of its production on location in Springdale.

J. V.'s production rates are very high. With a full crew they produce fifteen cardboard balers a week, 14 compactors, one trash container a day and one specialty roll forming machine a month.

A maintenance crew works throughout the area to make any needed repairs. If a problem arises with a piece of equipment outside of a three-hundred mile area, an agreement has been worked out with maintenance people throughout the country to follow-up on the problem. Jack Perry prides himself on customer satisfaction and has a motto that says, "If it doesn't work, you don't own it "And to back his motto he provides a full one-year warranty on all parts and labor. J. V. Manufacturing does its own delivery and installation with a specialized crew that knows all about the machine to help get a company or individual familiar with the product.

With a growth rate of 65% a year, it is a job itself in keeping production costs down. To handle this big load Jack hired Chris Weiser, B. S. M. E., in 1986 as vice-president and business manager of the company. Chris and Jack work together to find better ways to produce J. V.'s products at a lower price. One way is to shop around for steel. Prices can fluctuate so they buy from a variety of producers. Up until a year ago, the metal for the trash containers had to be bought and shaped from a company in Tulsa, then had to be delivered which made costs even higher. Jack took action against this and bought a used forming machine in Chicago, IL. Now he does his own forming which allows him to shop for steel and cut his costs nearly in half.

In November of 1987 J. V. Manufacturing took a new turn. It bought out a small golf club manufacturer in Siloam Springs that built shafts, handles and foaming for golf clubs. The total revenue at the time was very small, but when J. V. Manufacturing took over the revenue tripled. Although the project is in the development stage, large growths are expected. The company is working with Arnold Palmer and Ben Hogan on special projects to be introduced later. Jack and Janet are both eager to see where this new venture will lead them.

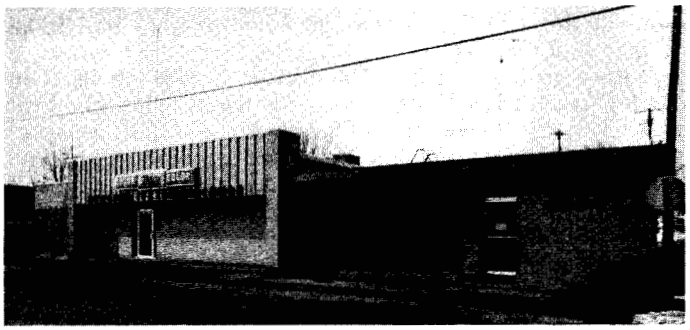
The growth rate of J. V. Manufacturing over the past ten years has been astounding, and sales are always better than expected. The growth rate of the area and the country as a whole has been vital to J. V. Manufacturing. As people increase their use of products there is always an increase in waste. Jack's outlook on the trash industry is expressed in his second motto. "The trash business is better than the oil business, because every time a baby is born something has to be done with his diapers. The solution is a trash can, and J. V. Manufacturing will be there to provide for a need that everyone has."

Jim's Radio, TV and Communications, Inc.

The Evolution of Radio-Communications

James W. "Jim" Carpenter used the communications experience he acquired during his tour of duty in the Army during World War II, and the skill and knowledge he gained at Coyne Radio Electrical School in Chicago to found the Springdale business first known as Jim's Radio Service.

As a lieutenant in the Signal Corps in the European theater, Jim was the officer in charge of telephone teams who kept wire strung from headquarters to the advancing armored divisions on the front lines.



Jim's Radio, TV and Communications

Carpenter was born and reared in South Dakota, and previous to his war experience, he attended and graduated from the Coyne Electrical School in Chicago.

Once the war ended, Jim gained experience working for a radio service shop in Kansas City, where his wife had been executive assistant to a Colonel with the United States Army Air Force at North American Bomber Plant.

In deciding to go into business for himself, Carpenter took into consideration his wife, Teena's familiarity with the northwest Arkansas area. Having grown up in Seligman, Missouri, she recognized the potential growth and opportunity that was present back in 1948.

Ken Carpenter

The Carpenters had saved money during the war with Teena working during Jim's overseas tour of duty. They were able to purchase the property located at 726 Highway 71 North, Springdale. The lot 100 feet by 180 feet held an abandoned service station. It was this building that the Carpenters renovated to house their new business. Many changes occurred over the years, but the business remained at that same location.

December 1, 1948 was opening day for Jim's Radio Service. That first year was a hard one, but young men coming home from the service after World War II had something to fall back on known as the "GI Bill of Rights." This enabled the Carpenters to begin a new business and give them a supplemental check of one hundred dollars a month for a year. He only had to rely on that check for three months. From that point on, his business was self-sustaining, surviving on its own.

Jim and Teena Carpenter.

Basically a family business, he and his wife worked together, she as office manager and support staff, he as the sole serviceman. Technicians were added and employed as needed.

In the early days, Carpenter and his wife spent many evenings together loading their two small sons into the back of the truck to make service calls. Most weeks were at least 65 working hours long.

Teena Carpenter learned her way around Springdale and the surrounding area by joining her husband on these calls while the boys slept. In the beginning, when she was primarily the one to answer the phone, she was the one in receipt of directions from the customers, and she navigated those early house calls.

Early on, it became apparent that Jim couldn't possibly remain "at the bench" to do all the repair work coming into the shop. Two of the early repairmen hired to help him were Ray Tripp and Roger Penny.

Business increased making it necessary to build a larger building within three years. With the advent of television and the continuing need for its servicing, the business grew into Jim's Radio, TV and Communications, Inc.

The older (1950) building and the new building were brought together with the addition of a third building which held the offices and show rooms, providing a place of display for the Zenith television sets, General Electric Mobile Radios and Executone Office Communication Systems that were added for sale and service.

By this time the expansion of the once "Mom and Pop" operation required employing 19 others to sell and service the growing list of customer clientele. The addition of two-way radio and commercial intercom systems with paging required two outside sales people to make calls on area businesses.

Local demand for electronic equipment, sales and service grew and customers from the northwest Arkansas area came to Jim's for their sales and service needs.

As more and more businesses began depending on mobile radio communication, business continued to increase. The nurse-call systems and intercommunication systems grew as did business needs for special telephone equipment and servicing. This was when the Executone branch of sales and service was added to provide corporations and small businesses with the type of communications systems individually needed

Some of the first GE radio equipment "Jim's" sold went into area law enforcement systems. Some of the early intercommunications systems were installed in the schools.

Ken Carpenter, Jim and Teena's younger son, received his Master of Business Administration (M. B. A.) and came into the family business in 1981. Their older son, David, is an engineer for Arkansas Power and Light in Eldorado, Arkansas. Both sons received their degrees (David in electrical engineering) from the University of Arkansas.

As Ken became more involved in the management of the business, it freed Jim to do the gardening that he loved and had so long neglected. Teena kept her hand in the business, briefly, to handle accounts payable for her son, and since the ownership of Executone by Ken, she continues to work on a part time basis.

At the same time Ken took over part of the business, an employee of 25 years, Oran Rainwater bought out the radio and television sales and service end of the business while Brad Tolliver, Little Rock, bought out yet the third area of the business the mobile radio and communications.

Jim Carpenter is a member of Shiloh Museum's board, and he maintains an interest in the growth and preservation of the community and its history since his retirement in 1986.

Jim and Teena, together, share interests in square dancing, traveling, gardening and doing volunteer work. They attend the First United Methodist Church, Springdale.

Jim's philosophy in regard to founding, managing and expanding a successful business is a simple one, making it all the more difficult to accomplish: "We never advertised the first 25 years. Our advertising consisted of satisfied customers talking us up to other prospective customers. I believe if you give good service, tell the customer the facts, honestly, and never knowingly take advantage of anyone, you may get taken advantage of on occasion, but you're bound to succeed," Carpenter said.

"Jim has always given everyone an honest bid. He's never forgotten the personal touch in sales or in service. He tested and retested every piece of equipment that was ever sold before installation whether to a company or an individual. He still, to this day, remains available to all three businesses on a consulting basis. He's a good man," Teena added.

Jones Truck Lines

Over The Road Trucking

Thirteen hours of riding along dusty roads, humid temperatures and boredom eat away at the mind. The mules trudge on, hauling a Springfield wagon full of groceries and hardware.

The team's driver, 18-year-old Harvey Jones, watches the scenery change but little as he makes the lengthy trip from Springdale to Rogers to Fayetteville and back again.

It was 1918 and Jones was already in control of his future: over-the-road trucking.

So it was an easy enough job for Jones back then. Although his route was the same from week to week, the countryside was beautiful and ever-changing as the seasons passed.

The work, or perhaps the regular rides, were profitable. Within a year, Jones realized all too well the potential inherent in his hauling "company."

He sold his team and the Springfield and plunked down the profits on a hard-rubber-tired, used Federal truck. Jones was in business.

Those fledgling days are indeed a far cry from the Jones Truck Lines, Inc., of the 1980s.

Today, Jones Truck Lines reports annual revenues of about $180 million. The company still pays for all its purchases in cash- a requirement Harvey Jones insisted upon.

JTL operates in 22 states and employs more than 3,000 people. In 1986, Jones' road equipment averaged six trips a year around the world at the equator: 100 million miles per year.

It was a million miles away to be sure, from those humid days, dusty roads and stubborn mules Jones started out with.

It was determination, savvy and an eye on his own destiny that brought Jones to such a profitable life.

"But Harvey," Jones' former eighth-grade teacher had admonished when he told her what he was going to do with his business, "you won't amount to anything if you don't finish high school."

"Miss Ollie," (Beaver) Jones was said to have replied, "I already have two trucks and a fellow to help me and I intend to go into the trucking business." The rest of high school would have to wait.

In 1919, Jones painted the name "Jones Transportation Company" on the sides of his new, but used, Federal truck. Next came expansion. Jones' three-town route grew to serve Fort Smith, Joplin and Springfield.

Four years later, with the company slowly growing and a certain stability now a part of the business operation, Jones changed the name of his company to Jones Truck Lines.

Jones Truck Lines had a future, and looking toward that future, Jones developed what he called a program of "Planned Progress."

That planned progress worked, too. By 1936, JTL was able to purchase 12 trailers increasing the total pieces of rolling stock to 30 units.

Terminals were established at Fort Smith, Joplin, Springfield, Kansas City, Little Rock and Tulsa. That trend continued into the early '40s. Routes were purchased (in compliance with the existing trucking regulations of the day) in 1941 into St. Louis and Memphis.

World War II, however, brought Jones' progress to an abrupt halt. While men and machines were needed for the war effort, Jones Truck Lines continued its operation, but recorded little growth throughout the war years.

When the war came to an end, and business resumed to a certain sense of normalcy, Jones bought a route for his trucking firm which allowed trucks to move from Fort Smith to Oklahoma City, including Muskogee.

This expansion came about partially because Jones had purchased Breeding Motor Line that year. Terminals were built and clients established along the new route.

One year after Jones trucking company returned to its "planned progress," Jones Truck Lines became Jones Truck Lines, Inc.

That date marked yet another milestone for Harvey Jones' business: the Jones Truck Lines, Inc., was the largest individually operated truck line in the country.

Because the trucking industry was "regulated" throughout most of the trucking industry's history, Jones had to purchase routes in order to expand and to fulfill his program of planned progress.

So, purchase rights he did. Jones bought the rights for the Dallas to Fort Worth route in 1956. The next year he purchased rights to travel, or haul freight, into Wichita. Next, rights were purchased in 1957 for a route from St. Louis to Chicago and the Missouri bootheel, including Kennett.

In 1960, Jones made a major move to expand his routes eastward. He bought into the Mississippi Delta area, which allowed travel into the towns of Greenville, Greenwood, Clarksdale, Cleveland and Indianola.

That move was heralded as a "major breakthrough" for the area, if not for Jones.

The September 22, 1962, Transportation Week reported that ". . . interested groups had appeared in hearings before the Interstate Commerce Commission to emphasize 'how efforts to obtain new industries had often been hindered by lack of fast truck service to the west.'

"A major breakthrough for Delta shippers became a reality with the announcement that the Interstate Commerce Commission had granted Jones Truck Lines authority to provide motor freight service between Dallas, TX and Greenville, MS via the Greenville-Lake Village Bridge."

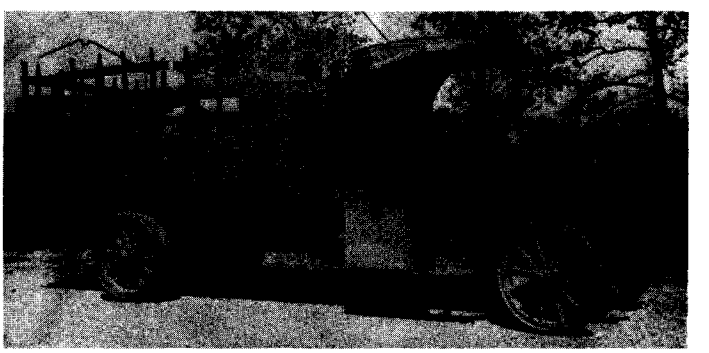
Just as the nation strengthened itself economically and politically, the Jones Truck Lines, Inc., matched success with strength as the '60s passed.

The company that started with Jones, his mules and a couple of friends to help back in 1918, had about 1,000 people employed at 15 terminals in the 1960s. JTL owned 200 diesel tractors and 590 road trailers which traveled approximately 50,000 miles per day between terminals. Records showed that about 5 million pounds of freight were hauled each day.

In the cities 420 pieces of equipment were kept busy picking up and delivering freight. By 1968, the company handled 1,200,000 pounds of freight with a gross revenue of $19 million. The company used up 2,238 tires at a ripe $90 each. These are mild tidbits of what it's like to run a trucking company, particularly one as successful as JTL.

Part of the company's success, too, came from the revenues generated by the Eski-Motive division, which comprised about one-fifth of the entire Jones fleet. This Eski-Motive portion of the company made up the refrigerated service offered by Jones.

Perishable trucking was no stranger to JTL, however. The company provided such a service since 1932 to all its customers. Back in '32, though, the company hauled chickens in ice barrels from Arkansas to Kansas City for Swift & Co.



Things were a bit more sophisticated in the mid-'60s. The company had about 100 refrigerated trucks on the road and covered nine Midwestern states on a regular basis.

JTL had always provided immediate transportation for perishable items. Company philosophy was that with 500 freight trailers on the road, there is always a truck on the road to accommodate perishables. Any of the trucks could be loaded within 2,000 pounds of dry box.

The many freight trailers also allowed for extensive maintenance and repair facilities that would not ordinarily be available to a refrigerated fleet alone. In Springdale, the garages covered several city blocks with separate structures housing maintenance of tractors, Thermo King units and tires.

There were also paint shops, sand blasting rooms, grease rooms, wash rooms with automatic washers, carpenter shops, mechanics shops and a tire department.

Jones provided for a certain independence for his shop supervisors, too. They had complete authority to pull any tractor, trailer or refrigeration unit out of service for inspection or repair.

When a new truck or trailer was received, it was completely broken down for inspection and lubrication.

Purchases of equipment were planned a year in advance and delivery dates spread throughout a wide span of time so that each new truck or piece of equipment could be thoroughly checked out.

Every 12 months, Jones ensured that the trailers received the same going over as they would if they had been new.

All trailers were given a bimonthly inspection and lubrication, plus daily checks on any equipment parked in the yard.

With that philosophy of quality, Jones transportation service matured. Throughout the '60s and '70s, the company grew into a $23 million dollar corporation with 28 terminals in 12 states.

The upward trend of revenues and growth continued for the next 14 years, at which time the Sun Company (formerly Sun Oil) began its acquisition investigations into JTL.

On May 1, 1980, Sun Company purchased Jones Truck Lines from Harvey Jones. That same year, a new president, John Karlberg, took over; he was only the third president in the company's history.

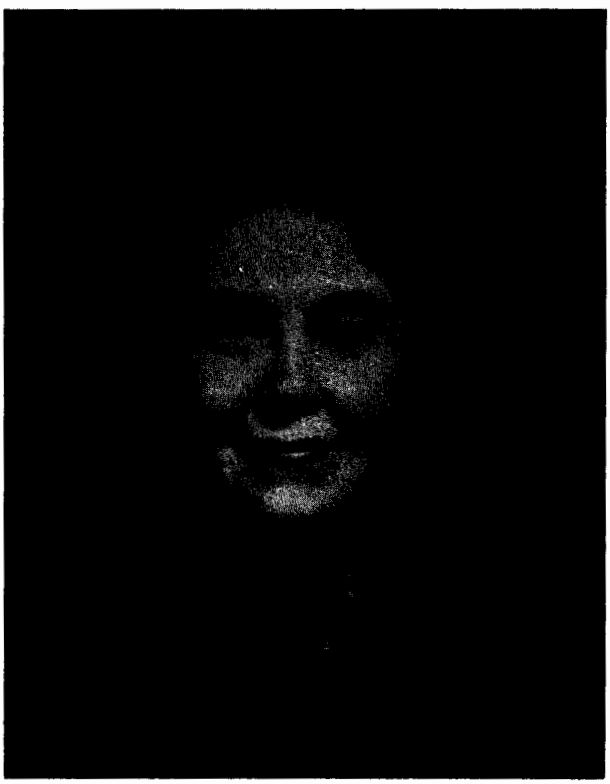
After the acquisition of JTL, 80 terminals were added to the company. In 1980, revenues were about $80 million and by 1986, revenues exceeded $180 million.

True to Harvey Jones' creed, all purchases are paid for in cash.

The company, in retrospect, was the first to guarantee complete customer satisfaction with a money back guarantee. A simplified method of determining Arkansas intrastate rates was developed by the company, putting JTL in the position of being the only carrier in Arkansas to offer such a service.

Today, Jones Truck Lines employs 3,300 people at 123 terminals in 22 states. In Arkansas alone, JTL employs nearly 650 people. The president is P. Elliott Burnside. In 1988, Jones Truck Lines entered its 70th year of operation.

With savvy, with foresight and with just a wee bit 'o luck, Harvey Jones was able to build an empire. As a company brochure says: "Innovation is, and always has been JTL's forte."



Jumbo Motor Supply Company, Inc.

Family Business Means Family Service

It was in 1952 that H. T. "Budd" and Emma ("Emmy" to all who knew her) Platt bought Jumbo Motor Supply from Cecil Brown. Oldtimers will recall Cecil and his familiar green Jumbo elephant logo. He started this auto parts business after world War II. This business was located at 131 West Emma Avenue in Springdale.

No strangers to northwest Arkansas, the Platts moved their family to Springdale from Fort Smith, and Budd set about to make the 1500 square feet of parts, storage, warehouse and service counter into the Platt family business.

Those first years, his son Tom, the present owner, worked part time in the business and helped in all areas. Susan, Mike and Richard, Budd's other children all helped. Under Budd's leadership the business grew and successfully supported the Platt family and helped put the children through college and most of them through graduate school.

By 1959, the business had grown to the point where more space was necessary. In fact, by 1960, Budd had tripled business.

The move in 1960 to 501 West Emma almost doubled space and made the operation more efficient. It gave Jumbo extra counter space and more room for inside sales and customer service.

Although all the Platt children had helped part time with business, Tom Platt was the son who went into the business full scale with his father. This was after he had graduated from University of Arkansas with a degree in marketing and had served two years in the U. S. Army.

Budd and Emma Platt in 1952 after their purchase of Jumbo Motor Supply from Cecil Brown.

Tom and the rest of the Platt children remember working from high school days (Springdale High School) when they swept out the store, made deliveries and filled in wherever needed. Also, Tom recalls time spent at a machine grinding pistons (a procedure no longer needed with modern technology). Tom points out that in the early days the store was open five and a half days a week, and his dad worked many 12 hour days. Now, Tom puts in about 45 hours a week with Jumbo open six full days a week.

"I don't mean every bit of it was drudgery to my dad. I remember how we'd go through the change looking for old coins. We shared that interest, and I still keep up with it on a small scale. It's simply an American coin collection that I keep locked away," Platt said.

Budd Platt semi-retired in 1970, somewhat active in the business but enjoying time he and Emmy spent together in Florida. This semi-retirement continued until his death in 1977.

Tom married a Springdale girl, Roberta Ann Eidson, a Home Economics graduate from the U of A. They were married in 1959, and after raising their two children, Kathryn, age 20. and Mark, 18, Roberta now works fulltime in the business.

Jumbo Motor Supply in 1988, located at 501 West Emma Avenue, Springdale.

Kathryn, while attending U of A, studying toward a degree in Marketing, works at the store part time during the summer months helping with accounts receivable. Mark also works at the store part time during the summer months helping clean up and making deliveries.

Mark will return to Kemper Military School and College in Columbia, Missouri this fall and graduate from there in the spring of 1989. Neither Mark nor Kathryn show an interest in making Jumbo their vocation at present, but Tom is not anxious to turn over the reins just yet anyway.

Roberta's hours coincide with Tom's, and they both explain that there's really not that much togetherness when you take into consideration that the office and meeting room space (1800 square feet) is almost as large as the whole store in the beginning. This last expansion took place in 1978 when an addition to the west and south sides of Emma Avenue building increased the total square footage from 3,000 to 11,500. "Since our move in 1959 to this location, business had more than doubled, and we had to do something," Platt said.

That something includes, at present, 130 lines of parts. Area truckers, area dealers, auto dealers, body shops, repair shops and individual customers appreciate a wide selection of parts that include these familiar items: Standard Motor Products including Air Conditioning, Ignition and Carburetor parts, Dayco Belts/Hoses, BCA/Bower Bearings, Anco Windshield Wiper Blades, Champion Spark Plugs, TRW Engine and Chassis parts, PPG paint and supplies, Wix oil, air, and fuel filters, Stemco Heavy-duty Seals and Exhaust, to mention only a few.

Platt's formula for making a business grow and succeed seems simple enough. He claims one needs to know when to buy—at the right time, for the right price, and one needs to keep super sales people who call on customers and keep calling, not waiting for business to happen and not waiting for it to stop before bringing in more.

He gives a great deal of credit to the people who have worked with him over the years. Herb Hughes, Vice President; outside sales manager, started working for Tom's father in 1955, with a three year hiatus with the Airborne. Allen Schuelein, Vice President; inside sales manager, has been with the company since 1960 after serving in the U. S. Army.

Another long time employee who retired in January 1988 is Betty Delozier Lewis. She had worked for Budd as a high school student, married, and when her youngest daughter started grade school, came back and worked for Tom for 13 additional years.

Jumbo has eight employees in the Springdale store, and that includes full-time family. Roberta now has the corporate title of Vice-President, secretary-treasurer. Tom is owner and president of the corporation. Jumbo is strictly a local business serving a 25-30 mile radius. There are more than 27,000 items on inventory. According to Tom, "Eighty percent of our business is the traditional trade and the balance is the "do-it-yourselfers."

With 700 active accounts on Jumbo's books, computerization was a practical, necessary answer to handling everything from inventory control, accounts payable and receivable to point of sale.

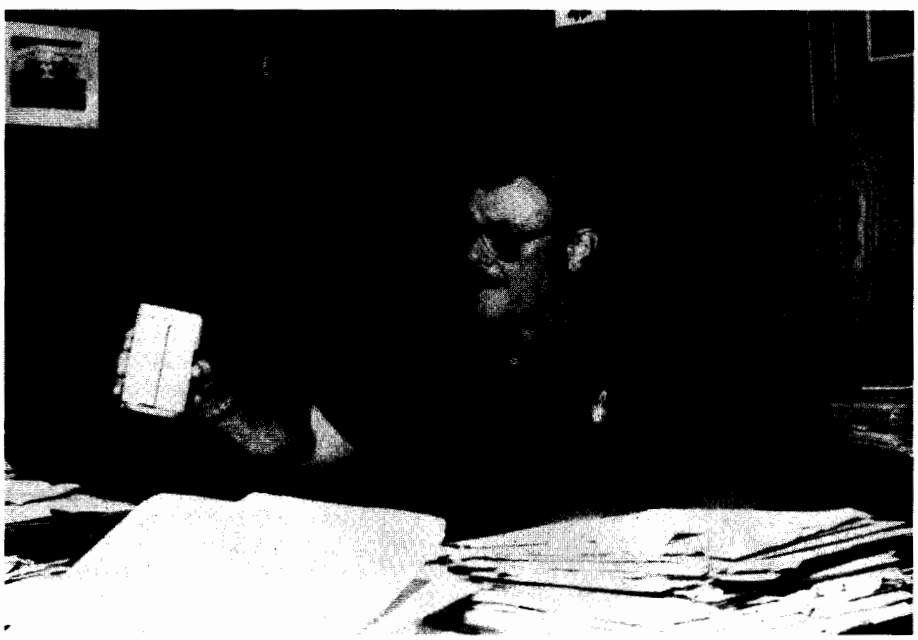
In 1981, Jumbo adopted the Triad System Computer with a complete auto parts package in both hard disc and software. It is connected to two prime suppliers in Texas and others for purchase order transmissions.

It isn't all work for the Platts, and they do share interests in antique-ing (looking for bargains in the tri-state area), and special projects at home and in the yard. "The church is also a large part of our lives," Roberta added.

Fun trips that have combined business and pleasure have included those to Virginia, Colorado, and California for the whole Platt family. Side trips at each location are particularly remembered.

Looking toward the future, Platt doesn't wish to overextend his business, but is considering going into some other areas of merchandising, as the market dictates. This is one of the fascinating aspects of the wholesale parts business. "It never gets stagnant, and neither should we," Tom said.

Platt finds owning his own business deeply satisfying and had this to say about it: "It's more than ego involved here. It's a challenge. It's something that you know you've accomplished, maybe not single-handedly, but you've led and directed it through your own vision and hard work."



Just-Us Printers, Inc.

Just-Us and the Printed Word

Tom Justus went into the printing business right out of high school. He started as a linotype and press operator for the Walnut Ridge, Arkansas Times-Dispatch. He went on from there to manage some of the largest printing and publishing businesses on the West Coast.

As general manager for Pacific Coast Publishing Company in Santa Barbara, California and as manager of other large printing plants in Pasadena (Los Angeles area) as well as having served as marketing manager for Butler Paper Company, Justus learned the printing business well.

Just-Us Printers, Inc., located at 555 North Old Missouri Road, Springdale.

As manager over a headquarters plant in California and advisor for other plants in Texas, England and Australia, he traveled to England, France, Germany, Italy, Switzerland, Denmark, Holland, Finland, and Japan to purchase equipment for them. This gave him a solid background from which to build a printing business such as Just-Us, Printers, Inc.

Another interesting fact and facet of his print-experience occurred before Justus went into management. He ran the first small off-set press in Santa Barbara in the 1950s before off-set became such big business.

Enjoying the "good life" (for many the perfect life) as a California resident and successful businessman didn't provide the fulfillment for the Justus family that moving to northwest Arkansas has been able to.

His wife, Thelma, went to business college after raising their four children and went on to become active with the Chamber of Commerce in Pasadena, but a real challenge was missing. Her work with the annual Tournament of Roses parade, her dealing with its many celebrities, was a yearly success and gratifying, but. . .

During this time, Justus's sister, Donna Burch, touted the benefits of Sun Belt living (in Springdale), and Thelma had read article upon article about the business opportunity and family lifestyle that was offered in northwest Arkansas. Justus came to Springdale in 1979 to check it out for himself.

Tom was delighted to find that neither his sister nor reports had exaggerated the chance for business growth and promised family life. He and 11 of his family moved from California to Springdale to begin the small printing business first located on Holcomb Street in the shopping center by Springdale Post Office.

At first, the 800 square feet of space was enough to handle the printing business and to provide work for his wife and himself and parttime work for his son Bob. By the mid-80s both Bob and Mike had come into the business full time.

Business grew to such an extent that Just-Us Printers, Inc., in 1984, bought two acres on Old Missouri Road and expanded from 800 to 6,000 square feet.

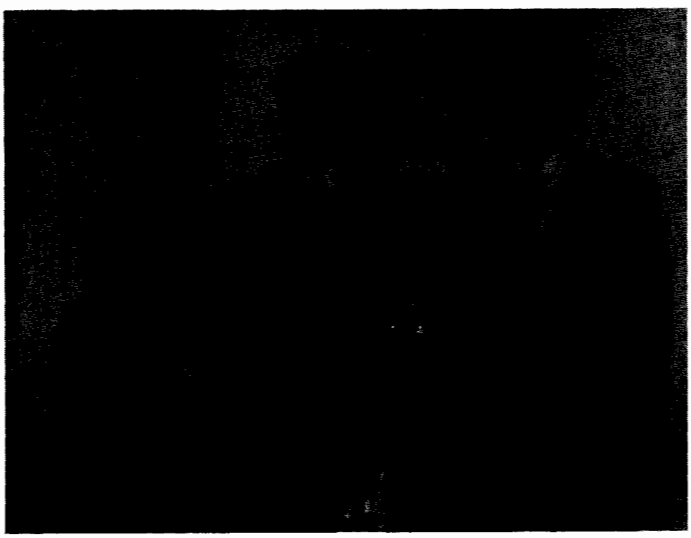
In 1988, work began to add an additional 4500 square feet behind the present facility at 555 N. Old Missouri Road (North Springdale Industrial Park).

Officers of the company include: Tom Justus, president, Bob Justus, vice president, Thelma Justus, secretary and Mike Justus, treasurer.

Having grown in size from a full time staff of two to 22 full time employees and from a northwest Arkansas printer to a business that services 16 states, Just-Us growth has proved to be a challenge and reward. At first it meant 12 to 14-hour days. Justus can now boast of nine hour days for himself.

"I've never been the type of businessman to look at ways to take from an area. Business means more than dollars and cents figures on profit and loss reports. I'm proud to have a successful business. It creates work for others, but the thing I like best is giving back to the community. I like providing a service, the best service I know how. I enjoyed seeing our growth as we went from the smallest to the third largest printer in the area," Justus said.

Two of the Justus children are actively involved in the business. Bob brought a degree in communications and 13 years of printing sales experience to the company and Mike, too, received his degree in communications and taught journalism while he worked toward his masters degree.



Seated: Tom Justus, president; wife, Thelma, secretary of the corporation. Standing: Bob Justus, vice-president; Mike Justus, treasurer of the corporation.

In addition to the printing business, Bob has a flying service (all three Justus men fly) and Just-Us Printers, has a company plane, a single-engine six-seater.

Mike has served as president of Kiwanis and is president-elect of the Springdale Chamber of Commerce. Tom Justus is presently vice-chairman (6 year term) on the Springdale Civil Service Commission, and Bob is past president of the Springdale Flying club.

Each of the Justus men has the same positive outlook on business and on life as a whole, feeling life and life's work are interrelated.

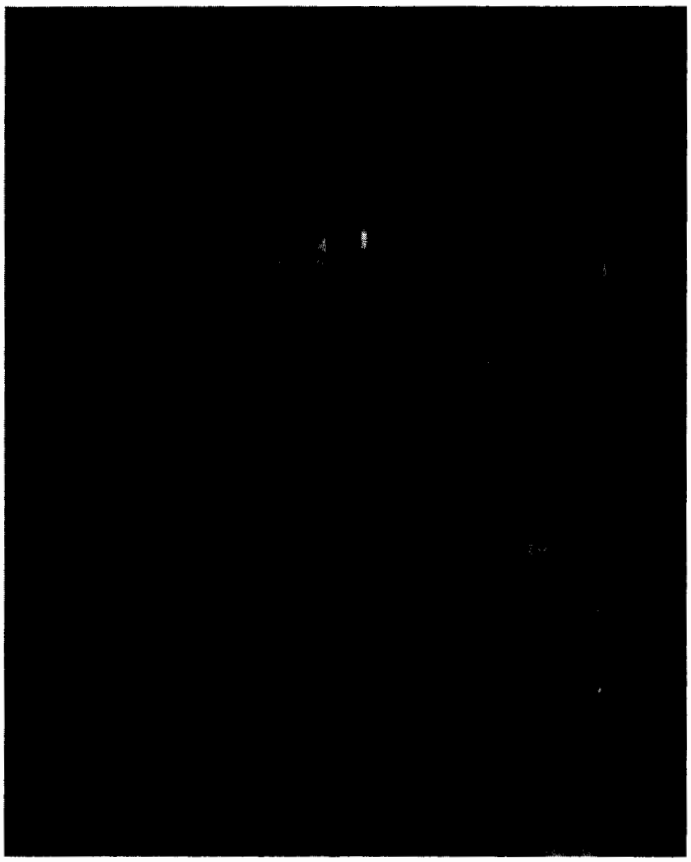
Tom's daughter, Judy Peterman, is head nurse on the new wing of St. Mary's Hospital, Rogers; and his other daughter, Terrie Hammer, lives in Gladewater, Texas and helps run a family construction business. Neither daughter works in the family printing business but both daughters-in-law (Sandi and Donna) do.



Seated: Sandi Justus, standing: Donna Justus.

Justus points out that the printing business has radically changed from his first typesetting days. A tour through the working area indicates just how much printing has changed. The equipment is spotless and state-of-the-art.

Mechanization and computerization have made it a "clean" job as opposed to the old way of setting type.

"It's a lot of photo-composition and laser now. Plate development and processing of film make it a whole new experience. There aren't enough area schools available to teach printing. I'd really like to see a good program made available," Justus commented.

"There are so many areas to the print business. Graphic arts always has a need for new talent. We have precision equipment, and we need precision crafts people," he added.

Part of that precision equipment includes bindery machinery that is totally automated from collating and stitching to trimming, folding, and binding, numbering, scoring, die cutting and blind embossing. Saddle-stitch books and booklets can be run in units from 500 to 500,000.

Just-Us Printing takes on the smallest jobs from business cards to four-color magazines and brochures for large companies. Justus has a business policy that has served him well. He doesn't ignore small business for big accounts. Feeling that dependency on one or two accounts doesn't improve the business itself, he makes sure that the small business receives the same quality and special attention given to larger accounts. Those small accounts, by word of mouth, increase customers year after year.

"I never want to get so big that I don't get to deal on a person-to-person basis. I'm very people-oriented. I like the customer relations end of the business," he said.

The positive philosophy that rules his personal and business life is based on his avocation. A pastor and lecturer of the Church of God, International, he counsels and speaks to many groups throughout the year, encouraging and motivating others to live their lives to the fullest in a positive, creative and giving way is his way of returning a part of what he has abundantly received.

The family feeling he shares for those he employs extends to his concern for their well-being. Employees do not smoke on the premises, and he requests that all of his employees show consideration for one another in use of their language and in their treatment and criticism of one another.

The employee breakroom at Just-Us has a lot of natural light from the large window area and is furnished with a large refrigerator, microwave oven, tables and chairs. It is one more indication of "family" care. All employees are encouraged to air not only ideas to improve work but to air complaints, not to each other but to management.

"Happiness is a state of mind. There is no happiness without giving back what you have received. I don't plan on retiring. I enjoy working with people too much. Customers, after all, are who make it worthwhile. Northwest Arkansas has been good to my family. I'll continue to make it a good place to bring business and to do business as long as I can," Justus said.

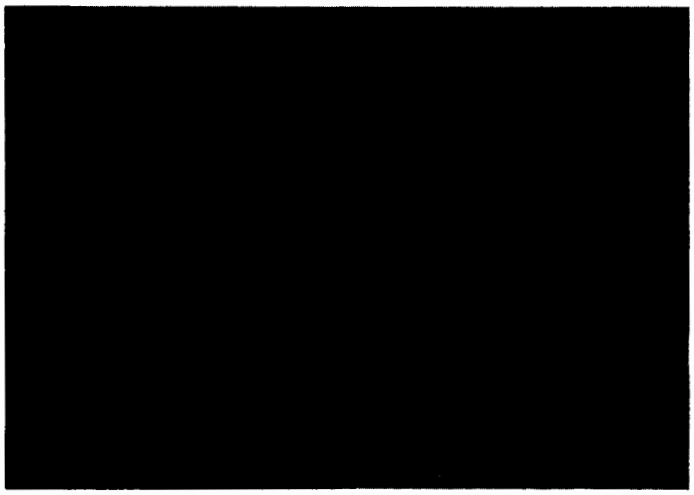
Gerald D. Lee

Family Law Practice Fulfills Dream

The law offices of Springdale attorney, Gerald D. Lee, located at 606 West Emma Street, are a pleasant departure from high-rise steel and glass office buildings.

The old two-story house, decorated and restored by Lee and his wife, Kiethith, was once the residence of C. P. Sisco, known by most Springdale residents as "Doc" Sisco. Sisco's former patient treatment room now sports a copier and row upon row of colored file folders bulging with papers.

The original wood floors, doors, cupboards and fireplace, with its wooden mantle, all add to the warmth of the "family" feeling you receive from the moment you step into the living-room-turned-waiting-room of Lee's law practice.



This lovely old two-story house was decorated and restored by Gerald Lee and his wife, Keithith, is now Lee's law offices. Formerly known as "Doc" Sisco's home, it is located at 606 West Emma Avenue in Springdale.

This ambience creates an "everything will be all right" kind of mood that soothes a client's distress before he or she ever enters Lee's inner office.

"It's quite a change from our offices at 801 Henryetta. There were just two small rooms there and no place to expand. Here, we have the whole upper floor when the time comes to enlarge the practice," Lee said.

"My wife and I have worked hard on this practice. She has worked at my side as my only support staff, and on those nights we end up working until three in the morning preparing a brief for appellate court, I really appreciate her support," Lee was quick to point out.

Lee's practice consists mainly of clients with cases of bodily injury, Worker's Compensation claims, Social Security disability claims and family law. They come from all walks of life, and although some look him up in the Yellow Pages, most are referrals from former or present clients.

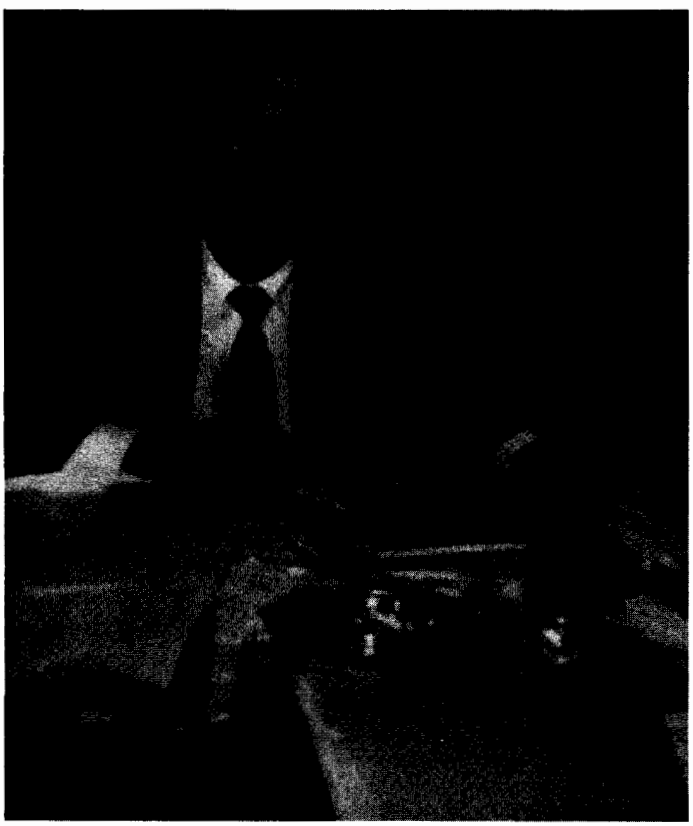
"I guess I'm pretty selective, but I will, on occasion, accept a criminal case, and once in a while a good case comes along that may require a change in law or legislation to be introduced. It means setting a precedent to make other lawyers' work easier. That part of my work is very satisfying," Lee said.

"The Fowler versus McHenry case was one in point. Its outcome led to the parameters of compensability in heart attack cases in worker's compensation to be more clearly drawn. The outcome was a proud moment, not so much for me but for my profession as a whole," Lee recalled.

"Another case I recall involved possible arson. I defended the insurance company, and this case turned out to be precedent setting when testimony was allowed in regard to the homeowner's motivation for incinerating his home. Now lawyers with similar cases have a precedent to use to get evidence introduced that tends to show the owner's motivation to burn their home or business." Lee related.

Lee's particular "family" law practice with his wife at his side, must be one American dream familiar to all who still seek the "good life." Not always attainable, this dream requires seven years (undergraduate school, law school) in most cases before starting a career. In Lee's case it took twenty-seven years to make his dream come true.

After graduation from Fayetteville High School in 1955, Lee enrolled at the University of Arkansas (U of A). When asked by admissions what courses he planned on taking, he stated that he wanted to be admitted to its law school.



Gerald Lee, attorney at law, seated in his office. Note the old wood windows behind Lee, a significant feature of homes built more than 50 years ago.

When told that he would be required to take undergraduate courses and earn an undergraduate degree before he could apply to law school, he questioned their reasoning.

It made no sense to him that he had to take a lot of courses that had nothing whatsoever to do with preparing him for writing briefs or learning courtroom procedure. He simply wasn't ready to join the system that makes up university and campus life.

Thus began an Army career that spanned 20 years, included his marriage to Kiethith, produced three children and included two tours in Vietnam, and a five-year tour in Germany.

A college education was also obtained by attending colleges near duty stations after hours. This meant working all day to attend classes at night.

The Army was as good for Major Lee as he was for it. He received an award for Meritorious Service, a Silver Star, four Bronze Stars and an Air Medal awarded for helicopter combat assaults. He's quick to allude to the fact that there is no Purple Heart.

Upon retirement from the service, Lee was just six hours short of a degree. He earned those six credit hours at Cameron University in Lawton, Oklahoma.

When he received his undergraduate degree, he was that much closer to his dream of becoming a lawyer. He applied to three law schools, two in Oklahoma and one at the U of A. He was accepted at all three but chose to enroll at U of A. He received his law degree in 1979.

Lee joined the firm of Niblock and Odom in Fayetteville as an associate until 1982 when he became a partner in the law firm of Odom, Elliott, Lee and Martin. He values the experience and the contacts he made during these associations.

"I found myself away from home so much. I traveled from one end of Arkansas to the other. Kiethith and I talked it over and decided we'd try to go solo. She was tired of raising the kids alone, and I didn't want to be a stranger to them," Lee said.

"We thought we'd open an office in Springdale. It had been our home ever since 1979, and that way it would be close for me to attend Michael's (one of their sixteen year old twins) ball games and Michell's (the other twin) school functions," he added.

The Lee's older daughter, Melissa (called Missy by the family), seems to be following her father's military footsteps. She's a first lieutenant in the U. S. Army Signal Corps, while Michell is still savoring her victory of being first runner-up in the Miss Pre-Northwest Arkansas beauty pageant (1988). Michael thinks he'd like to become a lawyer and join dad in the family practice.

Lee will support whatever career choices the twins make. He remembers how long it took him to achieve what he really wanted.

"At one time, I was a pretty good fisherman. I won several bass-tournaments and really considered turning pro, but family life won out over that choice, and I'm not sorry," Lee commented.

Lee is a member of the American Bar Association, Arkansas Bar Association, Washington County Bar Association, Arkansas Trial Lawyers Association and the Springdale Chamber of Commerce. One membership he proudly retains is with the Vietnam Veterans of America.

On occasion Lee is asked to speak with nursing personnel at nursing homes and hospitals. His talk covers ways to help prevent injuries and reduce injury claims. Paying attention to the smallest detail may prevent the biggest injury claim. Many of the nursing homes have reported back to Lee on the success of such a prevention program.

Lee hasn't set a timetable for expansion of his practice. "Right now I don't have any plans to enlarge my practice. A caseload of about 600 a year keeps us pretty busy. I do have all that space on the second floor if one or both of the twins decide they'd like to come into law with their mother and me. The most we might consider is looking at a computer system. Kiethith still does old-fashioned lift-off typing. I don't know. I think for now, I'll just enjoy seeing my dream realized," Lee said.

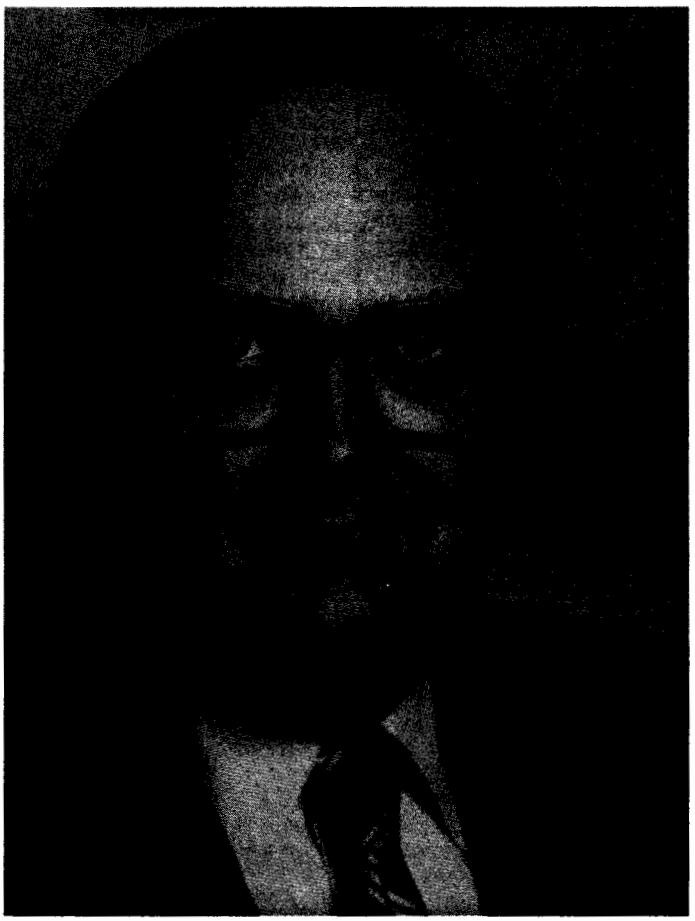
David Malone, State Senator

A popular description applied, too often, to public figures who make an effort to avoid headlines is "low-key." Senator David Malone, district 6, of the state of Arkansas, is not "low-key" as much as he is a thoughtful, modest man who wants to do the job he was elected to do for the voters who elected him.

"I've always believed that if you do the job required of you and do it as well as you can, you build a lot of future contacts and good will with the people you meet along the way. It opens unexpected doors down the road. Besides, I'm a firm believer in volunteering for a job before being volunteered," Malone said. "Something else I've learned while in office is results are what count, not the person receiving credit," he added.

David Malone, born in Beebe, Arkansas, was educated in the Little Rock Public Education system. A graduate of Hall High School, Little Rock; Malone, without realizing it, was preparing for a future in politics.



Senator David Malone

Each time Malone served on a committee or took part in the organization of student and athletic activities, he nurtured an interest in making a better school.

Malone has never departed from fostering education programs, seeking out cost effective ways to maintain them and to offer a life support system to Arkansas schools, colleges and universities throughout the state.

Although born in Beebe, Malone came to northwest Arkansas to attend the University of Arkansas and fell in love with the area and its residents. While at U of A, he served as a Student Senator, President of the Interfraternity Council, and was selected for Who's Who among College and University Students.

He received his accounting degree in 1965 and completed law school in 1969. He practiced law in Fayetteville and was City Attorney in 1970 until he became an assistant professor in the College of Business at the U of A. Active in public service, he was elected to the City Board of Directors and served as Mayor of Fayetteville.

"If I were to be proud of any one accomplishment, it would be that of being identified with the completion of the Continuing Education Center in Fayetteville. As mayor, I wasn't the one responsible for the original concept of this program, but I was the one to implement it, to see it through to completion.

"This program enabled me to work with people at all levels (economically and academically) and through all phases of its completion. Fred Vorsanger, then a vice-president at the U of A, Garland Melton and Attorney General, Steve Clark were among those I worked alongside.

"Getting this program completed required private capitol, the university, the local city government, some state help and the community itself working together to support it. It proved that all of us can work together for the common good, for a common purpose," Malone said.

The Continuing Education Program continues to be used by and for many area projects, educational programs and seminars which draw community interest from the whole area.

During his term as mayor, Malone also coordinated efforts which resulted in a larger Fayetteville airport terminal at Drake Field. He was mayor when the Youth Center (California Drive) was enlarged and when Fayetteville City Library (on East Dickson) was added onto as well.

All Malone's "coordinating" efforts were simply a prelude to his present position on the Senate Education Committee and as co-chairman of the Senate Oversight Committee on Education Reform.

Before serving in the senate, Malone served two terms as state representative (where he served on the House Education Committee), and he pointed out his satisfaction while in office. He would have happily remained a representative had Senator Morriss M. Henry chosen to seek election for another term.

Malone points out that his constituents are, perhaps, more knowledgeable than many Arkansans and the state has grown into a one and half billion dollar business. Malone informs voters of how state government works for them. He explains the impossibility of being in two places at once (at home to his constituents and at the Senate in Little Rock).

"Actually, I spend more time at home with my constituents than the first Arkansas legislators from this area did. I picture those early congressmen on horseback unable to commute each weekend as I do and realize that they saw their constituents far less than I do," Malone said.

Letters to the Editor, recently, have been filled with cries "When is the restoration of 'Old Main' going to be complete?" and "Where is the money needed for 'Old Main' and for the unending lists of other expenses necessary to keep our schools, colleges and universities competitive?"

"I've worked for and want to see a permanent funding base for public schools and higher education. Reaching a solution has been frustrating, because we have some of the brightest, most gifted students in the country, and Washington County has always been first in the building of schools, colleges and universities. This area supports education. Part of our problem is lack of communication with other parts of the state and with Little Rock. It is improving, but all of us, here, (in Washington County) are going to have to understand the complexities involved in getting other areas of the state to see that education and economic development go hand in hand. The whole state has to concentrate on achieving a sustained support of our schools and realize that it may be 10, 15 or even 20 years before any real economic growth shows positive results. We are not a wealthy state, and there is no quick fix for education," Malone said.

Malone sees history as an important political tool as well an educational one. "History is very important. I've continued to take courses in several fields for the last three or four years. It teaches us lessons if we'll just read and learn," he said.

"One thing I'd change if I could is the feeling of inferiority some native Arkansans carry about our education system and how we stand up against other states in this 'competition' of learning. We have the very bright students.

"I see it when I work with youth programs like Boys State and Girls State. I know from working with these young people (regardless of the kind of youth program that offers opportunity and experience for the young) that as we coach them, give them tips while they serve as 'senators' and 'representatives', we learn too. These kids are eager to learn and very sharp," Malone said.

To further emphasize his point (about feelings of inferiority being a problem) he told of an Arkansas science liaison conference held two or three years ago. Malone stated that questions were asked conference attendees about their image of Arkansas, its educational standing and its future. Question after question showed that outsiders ranked Arkansas higher on almost every point than did Arkansans.

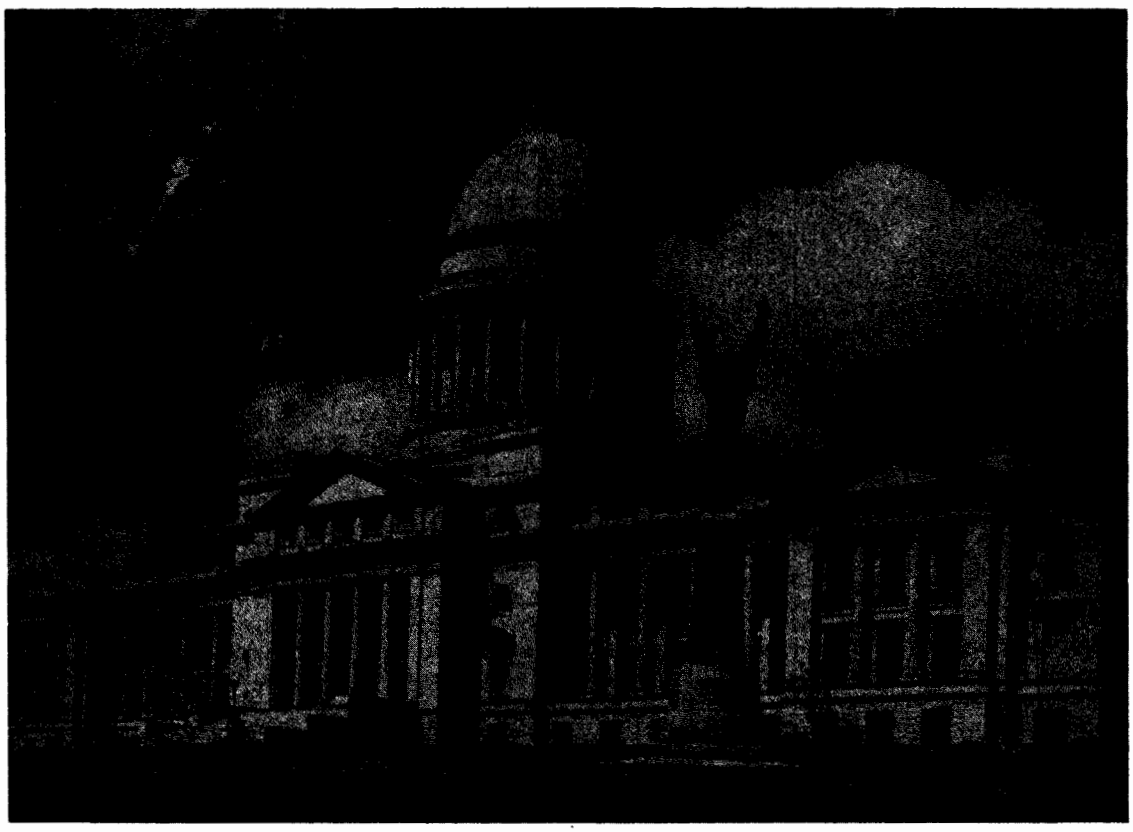
Malone plans to stay where he is. He likes working at the university (U of A) School of Law as assistant dean and as a board member of the Arkansas Law Review. He also sits on the board of the Arkansas Institute for Continuing Legal Education.

"My wife, Judy, served as secretary for the first City Manager of Fayetteville (she now teaches at the College of Business Administration, U of A), and she's aware of the time it takes to get people to agree on a solution to any single issue, Malone said.

"I don't ever see myself really retiring. I would like to remain in the senate and accumulate seniority to accomplish my goal of sustained funding for education. It's a question of priorities and education is at the top of my priority list. I like northwest Arkansas. It's my home and where I intend to live.

"I'm not planning a national political career, nor do I foresee a move to D. C. Now, I can see that kind of future for my son, Mike, (a student at Hendrix College) if that's what he wants.

If I ever do retire, it will only be semi-retirement. I'll continue to take courses in higher education and history. I've gathered so much history on the early legislators and on early Arkansas law, I may have to write a book just to use all the material I've gathered. I've been away from law practice for 15 years, and that probably isn't something I'd return to, but writing? Maybe," Malone concluded.



McClinton Brothers Company

Determination, Hard Work Key McClinton's Success

Charles and Clark McClinton built McClinton Brothers Company with determination and hard work.

With the help of a Caterpillar D-7 bulldozer they bought from the McAlester, Oklahoma military depot for $950.00, the brothers cleared land and dug ponds—whatever presented itself, keeping them working during their first year of business in 1946. "One of us would work from 6 a. m. until noon, and the other would take over and work from noon until 6 p. m., "Clark McClinton recalled.

Johnson Crusher, summer of 1960.

Charles McClinton's expertise in highway construction and his stint with the Sea-Bees during World War II stood the fledgling firm in good stead. While one brother was working the dozer, the other would be out hustling business. "We had $5,000 invested between the Caterpillar and our truck," Clark said. "We'd charge 15 cents per cubic yard for digging ponds, to $12.50 per hour."

By the end of the year business was so good they were able to add another Caterpillar D-7 bulldozer and two new scrapers, bringing their equipment investment to $25,000. Expanding equipment inventory was comparatively easy that first year.

"We made the most money in our first year of operation because we had no overhead," Clark said. "There was just the two of us—no other employees—and what little bookkeeping we had to do, we did ourselves." Business had picked up enough by the spring of 1947 that they hired their first full-time operator, Charlie Johnson. In August of 1947, the brothers had bid on and won their first large contract: $20,000 to grade the Searcy, Arkansas airstrip. That fall they were the low bidders on two highway jobs in Washington county and in 1948—with the help of additional employees and a newly purchased Caterpillar D-8 tractor and bulldozer—McClinton Brothers constructed and surfaced five important miles of highway in northwest Arkansas: a stretch of Highway 68B east of Springdale, and part of Highway 112 north of Leverett School to U. S. Highway 71.

By 1948 the contracts were increasingly larger and larger. McClinton Brothers Company was racing to keep pace with a rapidly growing region after the war.

In August the company won a bid with the City of Fayetteville to construct the town's first paved airstrip. Cost: $110,000. The 3,000-foot airstrip was completed in 1949, and the contract allowed the company to purchase some much-needed gravel and stonecrushing equipment. E. A. Martin Machinery Company of Springfield, Missouri also sold McClinton Brothers a Caterpillar 12 motorgrader for $9,750.

By this time, the company had expanded its personnel as well. Creed Stansell, Clarence Mason, Foster Holtzclaw and the firm's first motorgrader operator, Joe Baker, were hired. Carl Mayo and Jessie Eubanks came on board, too. Although Mayo is still working for the firm, the others had retired by 1986. With the help of its new stone-crushing equipment, McClinton Brothers started the Johnson Quarry. Crushed stone formed the base of the Fayetteville airstrip, and the brothers realized that it would be better to have their own crushed stone rather than buying from others.

"We used the crushed stone for the Fayetteville airport job from waste rock from the Ozark White Lime Company property," said Clark. So it was natural for them to approach Jack Reed, Sr., owner of the White Lime Company in Johnson, Arkansas, to lease property and begin operations.

In 1949 no crushed stone was manufactured in northwest Arkansas. The brothers' Johnson Quarry remedied that. "We crushed 35,000 tons the first year," Clark said, "and expanded the plant to the point that, by 1951, we were able to crush 75,000 tons a year."

If the post-war years had been good to the company, the early 1950s were not. Inflation was so high in 1950 and 1951 that the company lost money, even though it completed two major highway contracts: six miles of Highway 45 from Mayfield to Hindsville, Arkansas, and 10 miles of Highway 72 from Maysville to Gravette, Arkansas. In 1951 the company was forced to sell all its construction equipment, only retaining its crushing equipment at the Johnson Quarry.

But McClinton Brothers leaped one hurdle that year. Clark's son, David, began working in the business. "He was 13 years old," Clark recalled, "and worked for 50 cents an hour." This marked the beginning of the second generation operating McClinton Brothers.

Although business began picking up in 1952 and 1953 and the company was able to purchase some used grading equipment, by 1955 McClinton Brothers had spread itself too thin. Winning numerous bids across northwest Arkansas, business was so good, the company "went flat broke," according to Clark. "We had to sell all our equipment again, except the crushing equipment at Johnson," he said.

By 1956 the company was so broke that Charles McClinton left to work in California—but David continued to work summers for the company. Particularly hard years for the company were 1956 and 1957.

"I'd wake up every night and try to figure out how to keep from going bankrupt," Clark said. "Except for the loyalty of friends and our faithful employees, we'd have never made it," he added thoughtfully.

Times were so bad that Clark's role as a Sunday School superintendent for the Wiggins Methodist Church also helped keep him going. "Being superintendent kept me sane, because I had to concentrate on something else besides the business for six or eight hours every week," he said.

The quarry equipment helped keep the firm solvent and, in 1958, the company was able to pay off its debts. There was a catch, though: "All our equipment at the quarry was worn out, and we had to purchase new equipment," Clark said.

The new purchases for the quarry paid off. In 1960, McClinton Brothers crushed 100,000 tons of rock at the Johnson Quarry for the first time. The record marked a turning point for the company. Charles returned from California and purchased a quarry in Harrison in 1959, running it with his two stepsons until his death in 1971.

It was also a turning point for northwest Arkansas. With an increase in tourism and industry in the area, the roads needed upgrading to handle the load. McClinton Brothers met the challenge. The company purchased its first asphalt plant in the spring of 1961. By 1963 the highway construction business had expanded so much that additional equipment was purchased.

Besides crushed rock, the company was producing 100,000 tons of asphalt. But the firm didn't neglect its rock-crushing plant. It purchased a portable crushing plant in 1962, which helped the firm consistently produce 100,000 tons of rock at the new primary crusher plant in Johnson.

Expansion again had its price. Early in 1962, Clark had a mild heart attack. "It was on January 16," Clark recalled, "and the doctor told me to take a few weeks off for a vacation that summer. I'd never had a vacation until then."

1950 - West approach to Highway 16 bridge at Savoy. Charles standing to the left overseeing the job being done by the scrapers.

His son David stepped into the breech. David had been working closely with his dad for many years. "Although David was working on his business degree at the University of Arkansas, he took over the company while I was getting well," Clark said. "February of 1962 was the biggest sales month we'd had in the history of the company, and David was in charge during that time."

And business kept booming. By the mid-1960s the company was running three quarries. In addition to the Johnson Quarry, McClinton Brothers had quarries in Avoca and West Fork, Arkansas, and supplemented output with the portable crusher. David finished his degree and began full-time with the company in 1963.

The company also leaped state lines in the 1960s. In 1965 McClinton Brothers purchased the Anchor Construction Company of Muskogee, Oklahoma. But growth in Arkansas' northwest corner continued to pressure the company to seek new and better ways of serving Arkansas. In 1968 Lyle James and Dick Lester, owners of Northwest Arkansas Asphalt Company, decided to retire and sold out to McClinton Brothers.

August, 1969: Razorback Stadium spreading base down prior to artifical turf going on the playing field.

"I want to emphasize the success of our company came from the tremendous growth of northwest Arkansas during this period," Clark said. "Almost all our work came from Washington, Benton and Madison counties."

In 1963 the company had only 75 employees. By 1973 the company had grown to 250 employees, and 50 more were added between 1974 and 1980. "There are very few roads in northwest Arkansas that our company did not either work on of surface," Clark said. "We did the widening of Highway 71 from Rogers to West Fork, and most every road in Washington and Benton counties we've worked on."

Before the McClintons sold their interests in McClinton Brothers, Anchor Asphalt and Northwest Arkansas Asphalt in 1974, the firm had also surfaced the Fayetteville bypass for a $2 million bid, and widened College Avenue in Fayetteville from North Street to Stearns Road. "It was the first time a five-lane road had been built in this area," Clark reflected.

McClinton Brothers has been involved in the Fayetteville/Springdale/Rogers/Bentonville bypass project from the beginning. On July 1, 1987, ribbon-cutting opened three more miles of the bypass from Lowell to Rogers. McClinton Brothers surfaced the stretch. The company also plans to bid on the remainder of the project, both the surfacing and the bridges.

"We just found a bridge builder we think can do the job for McClinton Brothers for the next 2.7 miles of the bypass," Clark said. "The bridges alone will run around $2.47 million to complete for this stretch. We hope they accept our bid."

It would seem very likely. Although Clark has been "retired" since 1978, he still spends many hours each day in his office at the company's headquarters in the Hathcock Building in Fayetteville. Much of the energies he spent in building the company on the principle of, "Do what you say you're going to do—don't try to short it," he nows expends as district governor for the Rotary Club for 1987-88.

The four-way test of the Rotary Club seems to crystallize Clark's philosophy of life and doing business: "Is it the truth? Is it fair to all concerned? Will it build goodwill and better friendship? Will it be beneficial to all concerned?"

Clark thinks his personal background—the way he was brought up to believe his bond is his word—has been one of the things that has benefited the company. "If you give someone a bid," Clark said, "you build it the way it's supposed to be built. If you misjudge the bid, that's on you." That's one of the reasons McClinton Brothers has such a good reputation with the highway department.

"We surround ourselves with capable people and give them the authority to do the job," David asserted. "A manager's ability is dependent on his own ability to pick and motivate the right people, something I learned from my dad." David added that everything he's learned about ethics and the technical aspects of the business, he learned from his dad. "Ethical training is just as important as technical training from your parents," he said. "McClinton Brothers' advertising and work are based on quality—not always the cheapest, but the best."

The growth rate of northwest Arkansas during the last 30 years has been an economic factor in the McClinton Brothers' development. But the company has grown on a firm basis primarily because of Clark's business and ethical principles—and his son's willing ability to carry on the family traditions of hard work, integrity, quality and reliability.

"I'm proud to be known simply as. . .'Clark's son,'" David said. "His principles are what created this company, and what continue to keep McClinton Brothers going."

McDonald's Restaurant

Eating In-Carrying Out The Great American Pastime

An entire book could be written on the eating habits of Americans, or you could visit McDonald's Restaurant in Springdale, Arkansas and record the eating habits of a cross-section of family members, office workers, truck drivers, teenagers and the golden-agers that pass through, stop by or regularly visit this link in the large chain of America's favorite fast-food restaurant.

According to its owner, Bill Mathews, this particular McDonald's was built and opened in June of 1975. Matthews, as a young man, moved to Springdale from Massachusetts and worked as "crew" in this restaurant when it was owned and operated by John Power (who also owned the Fayetteville McDonald's, opened in 1970 as well as being owner of three other McDonald Restaurants in the area). Not only did Matthews work under Power, but his wife, Vickie, and he met as crew workers at Springdale's McDonald's.

Assisting Power, at that time, were Tom Lonon as manager and Mark Railey and Jay Herrin, assistant managers.

Mathews worked his way up through the ranks from crew to assistant store manager, manager and then area supervisor while he continued his education. After receiving his bachelor's degree in Administrative Management, he went on to a masters degree in Business at the University of Arkansas.

The early restaurant had a bi-centennial theme (1775-1975) that made red, white and blue the natural color scheme for the interior decor. The early business had neither the playground nor the drive-through business it has since added.

The drive-through came about in 1977 after Oklahoma City instituted the first McDonald's drive-through window. Springdale quickly followed suit and had one of the first drive-through windows and later was one of the first to institute the double window service available to cars. You pay at one window, pick up at the next. It increases efficiency and speedily serves waiting cars.

The impact that the drive-through business has had on McDonald's is phenomenal. Mathews claims that no one could have foreseen that it would make up better than 60% of the entire customer service.

"I'm certainly not unhappy about America's eating habits. This need to drive in and pick up to take home or carry back to work has been wonderful for business, and it keeps costs down for the entire facility—which is reflected in menu prices—because less parking space is needed, and the interior facilities (booths, tables and even rest room facilities) require less repair or replacement," Mathews said.

Mathews relates that the other fast growth areas are in the salad entrees that have been added, with the new breakfast fare (that boasts homemade biscuits and sausage gravy) fast surpassing the salad trade's booming growth.

More than an equal opportunity employer, Matthews tells of his oldest and one of McDonald's most cherished employees, Virginia Autry who comes in every morning to make the famous melt-in-your-mouth biscuits that are baked fresh daily. Virginia is past retirement age.

Mathews and his brother, Walter, own McDonald's at Springdale and Siloam Springs and are building a third McDonald's to be opened by early 1989 located near the bypass in west Springdale.

"Most everyone understands the franchise principle. My brother and I own the business, McDonald's owns the prime real estate (land and building itself). We are simply leasing, in a sense, from them. I'm proud of the fact that since we took over the Springdale management, sales have increased more than 100%," Mathews remarked.

Rated AAA, for the four years the brothers have owned Springdale's McDonald's, both are extremely proud of this performance award.

McDonald's maintain strict control over restaurant practices, menus and policies. Adherence to rigid standards of cleanliness, quality of food staples, food handling, service and over-all performance is enforced. This triple A rating is based on all of these factors. Rated from A through F, (marked similarly to student report cards) only 10% of the McDonald's, internationally, receive this AAA rating.

Mathews' wife, a former 4th grade school teacher, spends a lot of time with their daughter, Melissa, age three; and son, William Cody, a month old. According to Mathews, they agree that if he must spend as many as 60 hours a week at his place of work, the children need at least one full time parent.

Walter Mathews' wife, Bette, is the entire office staff for both stores and is in charge of payroll, billing, correspondence and local public relations. She keeps on top of free coupons or give-aways that are a weekly part of businesses like McDonald's that are frequently solicited for donations for charitable events.

Mathews admits to being a hard taskmaster. He tends to be a perfectionist (claiming most people are particular about the preparation and handling of the food they eat) and keeps a watchful eye on all aspects of the business, working right alongside his crew.

The one thing he frowns on as a boss and as a person who is primarily concerned with the feelings of others—is public criticism of his crew.

"Our motto is 'Praise in public, criticize in private,'" Mathews said, "You receive friendly, personalized service at our Springdale store, and that's what people deserve. If you aren't people-oriented and don't want to deal with the tastes and habits of the American public, then you shouldn't accept a job on my crew," he added.

Eighty-five are employed at Springdale and 50 at Siloam Springs. Mathews reports a great nucleus of workers at both locations.

The interest in what the customer wants is primary to the maintaining of excellence in the quality and selections of the food for a McDonald's restaurant. Matthews points out that nutrition is a vital and ongoing part of the selection process. Itemized food values, sodium content, amount of fat used and other nutritional information is available at the counter for the asking.

Even the enriched buns are chosen for the additional calcium added keeping in mind the older customer's need to combat osteoporosis. Less sodium is used than in former years, and 2% milk is used to cut down on butterfat usage.

McDonald's, Springdale, as in other locations, is a meeting place for Kaffeeklatschers, (beverages outsell other menu items with French fries a close second) and regular customers who stop in on break or simply to visit with friends.

There's rarely an American who hasn't been introduced to the "McDonald's way of life" through taste-testing firsthand or via television commercials (fabulous productions worthy of broadway spectaculars). For those not aware of its history, there are a few facts about how it started:

Dick and Mac McDonald started a drive-in restaurant business before World War II in Riverside, California that offered ten-cent hamburgers and standard drive-in items.

After the war, not wanting to lower standards in order to maintain a menu with low prices, the brothers opened a restaurant trying to avoid mistakes by similar operations. They felt sanitation could be more effective with all disposable paper containers. They shortened the menu and did not offer carhop service in order to speed up service—making it self-service. It proved both efficient and economical. In 1950 the first "McDonald's" style building was constructed. By 1953, the brothers had sold twelve franchises.

Ray A. Kroc, the exclusive sales distributor for Multimixer met the brothers in 1954 recognized the potential of their operation and bought the exclusive licensing rights from them. By 1961, he bought the entire rights to the McDonald's system. By 1966, McDonald's was listed on the New York Stock Exchange.

Through all these years, the restaurant remained and continues to remain a small individually owned and operated system and still seeks to keep the menu varied and affordable for the average American customer.

Mathews' contribution to McDonald's present decor was a result of his interest in the history of Springdale. He spent hours going through Springdale photos at Shiloh Museum, had them copied, framed and displayed for all of Springdale's enjoyment.

His collection depicts a different era, a Springdale that no longer exists. This early Springdale comes to life on the walls of his business showing how it was before Highway 71 was widened and before the building boom and population was increased with so many "newcomers" to northwest Arkansas.

Community ranks high on Mathews' priority list. He's on the board of directors for Rotary Club as well as the board of the Springdale Chamber of Commerce. He and his wife maintain an active interest in the First Methodist Church, and he claims that he wouldn't change careers, interests or lifestyles to return to Massachusetts or any other area in America.

McGoodwin, Williams and Yates, Inc.

In 1946 Mr. L. M. "Mack" McGoodwin, after spending the "Second World War" years with Oklahoma Ordinance Works, came to Fayetteville to establish a toy manufacturing business. Prior to establishing his manufacturing company, however, he met and was persuaded by Mr. W. R. Spencer, then head of Civil Engineering Department of the College of Engineering at the University of Arkansas, to establish a consulting engineering business instead. Thus, in 1946 the firm of L. M. McGoodwin, Consulting Engineer, was established as a sole proprietorship with Mr. Mack being the sole employee.

After operating as a sole proprietorship for a short time, a partnership with Mr. R. E. "Dick" Sullivan, of Oklahoma, was formed under the name of Sullivan and McGoodwin, Consulting Engineers. The partnership continued until 1954 when it was dissolved and Mr. McGoodwin resumed operation under the original name. The firm continued to operate under the sole proprietorship until 1966 when it was incorporated under its current name—McGoodwin, Williams and Yates, Inc.

From the beginning Mr. Mack decided that the major direction of the newly formed consulting engineering business would be the providing of engineering services to cities, with particular emphasis being given to planning, design and construction of water and wastewater facilities, including treatment facilities. His firm was one of the first to be established in the state of Arkansas. Up until that time, many cities had to rely on engineering firms located outside the state to provide the needed services.

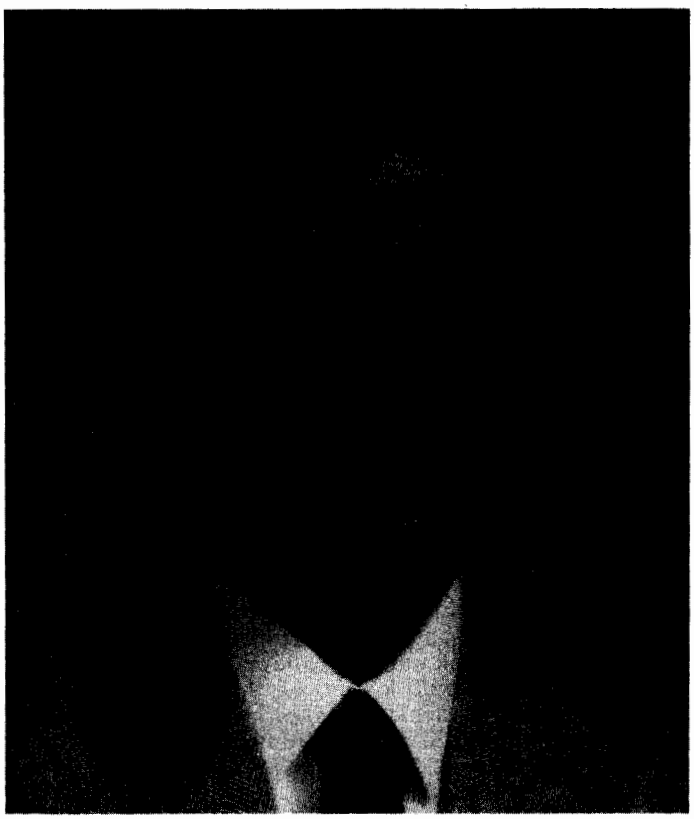
As a native of South Central Oklahoma and a 1928 civil engineering graduate of Oklahoma A & M University (now Oklahoma State University), Mr. Mack concentrated much of his effort in the early years to working in Oklahoma. As the firm became more established in Arkansas, the ratio of work in Oklahoma diminished and that in Arkansas increased.

Upon incorporation in 1966, Mr. McGoodwin took the position of vice president and chief engineer, a position he held until his retirement in 1971.

The foundation for the present-day firm laid by Mr. McGoodwin was a good one. His ability to foresee the potential of the Northwest Arkansas area and his determination to succeed and to provide the highest quality engineering services to his clients greatly influenced those who later joined the firm.

In 1953 O. T. "Terry" Williams, Jr., a West Texas native and a 1948 civil engineering graduate of Texas Tech University, was between jobs and came to Fayetteville to visit his parents. He was employed by Mr. Mack on a temporary basis to inspect a raw water line being constructed from Lake Fayetteville to the water treatment plant on Mount Sequoyah. This temporary employment eventually lasted 33 years (with the exception of a year in Florida in the late 1950s) until his death in 1986. Upon incorporation Mr. Williams took the position of vice president and senior design engineer. When Mr. McGoodwin retired in 1971, Mr. Williams assumed the position of chief engineer, a position he held until 1986.

In 1956, L. Carl Yates, a native of Washington County, was attending the University of Arkansas, working toward a civil engineering degree and needing a part time job. He was employed by Mr. Mack on a part time basis until his graduation in January of 1958 at which time he began working full time. Upon incorporation in 1966, Mr. Yates assumed the position of president and chief executive officer of the firm, a position he still holds.



Carl Yates, President and C. E. O.

The growth of the firm has paralleled the growth of the northwest Arkansas area. In 1958, the firm consisted of Mr. Mack, Carl (and Terry upon his return from Florida in 1959) and Jacqueline Ross, a long time secretary and administrative assistant who had begun working for Mr. Mack in the early years and remained until her retirement in 1984. One to five projects might have been under way at any given time. Today the firm has grown to an average of approximately 30 to 35 employees, with 12 engineers and other professionals including an architect, an economist, and administrators. Now, at any one time, the firm is involved in 45 to 50 projects.

Personnel of the firm are highly motivated by the fact that the services they provide to client cities and counties relate directly to improvement in the quality of life for the citizens of the area in which the various projects are located. This improvement in the quality of life is at least twofold.

First, the development of adequate and safe potable water supplies provides water for personal use. Further, the development of sewage collection and wastewater treatment facilities helps to maintain the quality of the environment, including water quality in the streams.

Secondly, the provision of adequate water supplies and wastewater treatment capacity for industrial and commercial development led directly to job creation, thus promoting a higher standard of living for the citizens of the area.

The services that the firm provides range from studies to determine needs and preliminary design studies to plan the needed facilities through detailed design, preparation of construction plans and specifications and management services during construction. Additional services to client cities include training activities, preparation of operation and maintenance documents, and services to assist cities in meeting regulations of the various federal and state regulatory agencies. The firm has also developed expertise in the area of methods to finance the development of needed projects.

Although the major emphasis has been in development and improvement of water and wastewater treatment systems, the firm also provides services in the design and construction of streets, highways, airports, sanitary landfills, and other miscellaneous work.

Over the years the firm has provided services on a number of projects which have had a major impact on the development of the northwest Arkansas area. A brief list of some of the major projects is included. However, a couple merit special attention.

The first of these is the Beaver Lake water supply and treatment facilities. In the years preceding the mid-1950s, unsuccessful attempts had been made to secure the construction of a dam by the Corps of Engineers across White River near the community of Beaver. In 1957, the U. S. Congress passed legislation to authorize inclusion of water for industrial and domestic use in such projects, provided that local interests would provide the funding for such storage facilities.

In 1957 the Arkansas Legislature passed legislation authorizing the creation of regional water distribution districts. Based upon this legislation, the Beaver Water District was created in 1958. A contract between the District and the Corps of Engineers was negotiated providing for sufficient storage in the proposed Beaver Lake to provide a firm water supply yield of 120 million gallons per day for domestic and industrial use in Washington and Benton Counties.

With this contract, the Corps of Engineers was able to justify the construction of Beaver Dam, thus creating Beaver Reservoir. Construction of the lake and dam began in 1960 and was completed in 1966. The inclusion of this large quantity of high quality raw water has been aptly termed the life blood of northwest Arkansas.

The firm of McGoodwin, Williams and Yates, Inc., (initially, L. M. McGoodwin, Consulting Engineer) was very deeply involved from the very beginning in the creation of Beaver Water District and the development of the facilities to utilize Beaver Lake water. The firm provided advice and counsel to the District concerning all aspects of its development, including negotiation of the contract with the Corps of Engineers. Technical computations to determine the volume of water that should be stored in the lake were provided by the firm.

Additionally, personnel of the firm were intimately involved in negotiations between the District and the four cities of Fayetteville, Springdale, Rogers and Bentonville in creating an agreement under which the District would build and operate the facilities and provide treated water to each of them. This original agreement (with modifications) is still in effect today.

The firm provided engineering services through design and construction of the intake on Beaver lake prior to filling the lake. This intake structure had an initial design capacity of 50 million gallons per day. It is now planned to modify the structure to allow withdrawal of water at rates of 80 million gallons per day.

The initial water treatment plant (constructed by the City of Springdale), having a capacity of 10 million gallons per day, was designed by the firm. Since the initial construction, the plant has been expanded twice and now has a capacity of 50 million gallons per day.

The firm provided all engineering services through this last expansion. Additionally, the firm provided the necessary engineering services to design and construct pumping and transmission facilities to each of the four cities served by the district.

In the early 1979s the firm commenced work with the Carroll-Boone Water District, a regional water district serving Carroll and Boone Counties, in the development of a water supply. In 1981 the construction of an intake structure having the capacity of 24 million gallons per day was completed on Beaver lake near Beaver Dam along with a waste treatment plant having a capacity of six million gallons per day. In 1985 the construction of a 30-inch and 24-inch line from the water treatment plant to the city of Harrison was also completed, thereby providing an adequate water supply for the cities of Eureka Springs, Berryville, Green Forest and Harrison (a distance of 46 miles).

While the firm has been busily engaged during its 42 years of existence in providing services to various clients, it has also been preparing for the future. In 1968 the firm moved into its present headquarters at 909 Rolling Hills Drive, in Fayetteville. Growth necessitated an expansion of these offices in 1985.

The present staff includes many highly qualified, long time employees. Jerre M. Van Hoose, also a native of Washington County, joined the firm in 1960 on a part time basis while attending the University of Arkansas. Upon obtaining a degree in economics, he was employed full time and now serves as Senior Vice President. The top level management staff also includes: James C. Ulmer, a native of Jonesboro, and Charles R. Nickle, who grew up in Fayetteville. Both now serve as Vice Presidents.

Over the years a concerted effort has been made to maintain a staff that is fully qualified and up to date in the latest technological improvements, both in the area of processes and equipment appropriate to services being provided to our various clients, as well as the equipment and techniques available to provide the latest in engineering design and production.

In the area of processes and equipment available for utilization in water and wastewater systems, personnel of the firm attend various seminars as well as special courses presented at the University and make on-site visits to the latest state-of-the-art equipment installed in actual projects.

As an example of latest technologies, the Springdale wastewater treatment plant expansion and the new wastewater treatment plant in Rogers utilize biological nutrient removal of both nitrogen and phosphorous. The incorporation of this technology in these plants was the first use of such technology in the state of Arkansas.

In the area of water treatment, new technologies will be required to meet more stringent standards. These new technologies include the use of ozone and granular activated carbon. Personnel of the firm have made a special effort over the last two years to become knowledgeable in these areas. These processes will be utilized in projects now under consideration.

In order to assist in the timely completion of the various assigned projects, the firm is equipped with the latest state-of-the-art office and production equipment. These include computers, computer-aided drafting equipment, word processing equipment, and electronic distance measuring surveying equipment compatible with the computer-aided drafting system.

While personnel of the firm are proud of the accomplishments of the past, they look forward to the future with anticipation. It is believed that the firm has the basic staff and equipment and is set up to move into the 21st century providing the same high quality services as has been rendered in the past.

McKinney Rexall Drug

A Family Tradition of Service

Since 1971 Charles McKinney and his family have operated one of Springdale's best known and oldest drug stores. Today McKinney's Rexall Drug is managed by Charles' son, David, who is carrying on the family tradition of neighborly service.

"The full-service drug store is a personal business and over the years we have established some close relationships with our customers and we have had many opportunities to share sorrows and joys with them, " Charles McKinney said.

During their years of owning and operating drug stories in Springdale, the McKinneys have developed a reputation for extending outstanding service to their customers. Before the time of a 24-hour emergency room at the hospital, McKinney often rendered late night emergency prescription service and free home delivery. Unlike today's discount pharmacy outlets and supermarket pharmacies where the emphasis is on rapid product turnover, the McKinneys have continued their practice of providing patient counseling. This means taking the necessary time to chat with customers about their problems and worries, while explaining the use of the medicines sold. The McKinneys also established charge accounts for their customers' convenience, and still provide free delivery and after hours service. With grocery stores and discounters selling medications on a cash and carry basis only, these features have helped the McKinney drug store compete and retain its business.

Born and raised in Springdale, Charles is the son of J. C. and Helen McKinney. J. C. was from Ozark, in Franklin County, and Helen was from Fayetteville. For years J. C. McKinney was a merchant with Springdale Cash Dry Goods, and after it closed he worked as a shipping clerk for Welch's Grape Juice.

Charles began working for Asa Coger at Coger's Drug Store as a soda jerk before graduating from Springdale High School in 1944. Soon after graduation, Charles enlisted in the Navy and undertook pharmacy training. From 1945 to 1946, he served as a pharmacist mate on the light cruiser Oklahoma City and on the attack transport General Callahan. Returning home to Springdale in 1946, Charles found employment at Joyce's Drug Store.

Diligently applying himself to pharmacy work while raising a family, Charles became a partner in Joyce's in 1951, when he and Charles Hovey bought out Clay Carter.

In May of 1955, Charles McKinney and his wife, Thelma, would name their second son David Clay, after Mr. Carter.

The soda fountain at Joyce's was a popular gathering spot with teenagers before there were drive-ins in Springdale and before most teenagers had their own cars. While working behind the counter jerking sodas, making milk shakes and talking to the young people, Charles McKinney established close relationships with many who eventually became life-long customers and friends. After spending 25 years at Joyce's, Charles decided to sell his interest to Hovey and buy the Rexall drug store. This change was both financially and personally gratifying.

"When you have been in a particular location for as long as I had been," Charles said, "it was nice to make a change." "Also, the customers were kind to me because a lot of them followed me to the new store. It makes you feel good when people have that much confidence in you," McKinney added.

The Rexall store, purchased by Charles and Thelma, was started by W. G. Ownbey in 1902, and according to his daughter, Marguerite Walker, it was probably the first drug store in Springdale. The store's original location was on West Emma Avenue, on the west side of what is now the First National Bank. The store was purchased by Tim Applegate, who sold it to Steve Lawrence shortly after World War II. Lawrence renamed the store Springdale Drug, and eventually sold it to Rudy Moore in the late 1950s.

Moore received a franchise from the Rexall Drug chain, and the store became Moore's Rexall Drug. Moore accomplished two significant milestones in the store's history. First, he moved it to its present location at 130 West Emma, and he added a gift department. In those days, many drug stores had a general gift and variety department, and the move was quite successful. In the late 1960s, Moore sold the store to John Sallis, who sold it to Charles McKinney in April, 1971. By this time there were four drug stores in downtown Springdale.

The McKinneys were able to increase the store's business, and in 1978 they bought the Coger Drug Store. Until 1984, they operated the store as Cogers, but then merged it with McKinney's Rexall Drug. In the 1970s, Springdale saw the addition of specialized gift shops, which cut into the drug stores gift business. To compensate for this development, David dropped the general gift line and in October of 1985 established the Artisan's Gallery to offer arts and crafts of local artists. This addition has proven beneficial.

While still a partner at Joyce's, Charles decided to enter public service and successfully ran for the Springdale city council in 1961. His philosophy is to give back to the community what you take out, and certainly the Springdale community responded generously to the McKinney's business efforts. In 1978, Charles successfully ran for the Springdale mayor's post, a position he holds today. During his terms on the city council and as mayor, Charles McKinney has participated in and overseen Springdale's growth into a major business and industrial center in Arkansas.

Today's McKinney's Rexall Drug is Springdale's only downtown drug store. When Charles was elected mayor in 1978, David was in his first year of pharmacy school. When he graduated in 1981, Charles relinquished managerial duties to him. Over the years, there have been quite a few changes in the pharmacy profession. New medications and research have made a dramatic impact, and today there is little compounding of medicines. The cost benefit ratio of medicine has improved in the McKinneys' opinion, and they strongly feel there will always be a place for the full-service drug store to give the customer the type of personal service that has made the McKinney family successful, and earned them many friends.

McPherson's Home Furnishings
"You Can Depend on Us"

For 62 years the McPherson family, owners of McPherson's Home Furnishings, has set a sterling example of consistency in the operation of their business, and have proven that the small family-owned business is still a viable dream for Americans in a period when discount chains have mushroomed and gained wide popularity.

Founded in 1924 in North Little Rock, Arkansas by R. W. McPherson, McPherson's Home Furnishings is now entering its fourth generation of family ownership. Operating successfully for 43 years in North Little Rock, Walter Edwin (Ed) McPherson, R. W.'s son, decided to move the business in 1966 to the booming northwest Arkansas area along the Highway 71 corridor in north Springdale. Prompting this move was an urban renewal project that was encompassing McPherson's North Little Rock location; furthermore no other suitable location in the city could be obtained. Moreover, the McPhersons were attracted to the more rural, small-town lifestyle of northwest Arkansas, the family having visited the area many times. Ed's son, Robert (Bob), was familiar with the area, having attended the University of Arkansas.

The McPherson family originally migrated to Arkansas from Missouri at the turn of the century. In 1930, R. W. McPherson became the first RCA dealer in Arkansas, the store sold furniture, appliances and radios. In the mid-thirties, Ed McPherson became co-manager of the store. During a portion of the World War II period, the McPhersons closed the store. In 1946, Ed McPherson took over management responsibility. Then in the early sixties, came the push for urban renewal in North Little Rock, and the subsequent need for the McPhersons to move their furniture store.

With the need to move, came the inspiration to relocate to northwest Arkansas. Ed McPherson purchased a piece of property along Highway 71 in a small shopping center on the north edge of Springdale. The shopping center was developed by the Beaver Land Development Co. headed by Joe Robinson. The McPhersons had a steel and masonry structure built for their store. Groundbreaking for the store took place on September 20, 1966, and the McPhersons officially opened for business in February, 1967. The store's grand opening occurred April 13, 1967 (with a drawing for merchandise). The McPherson's motto was (and still is), "You Can Depend on Us."

In their first year in Springdale, the McPhersons did more business than any time during their previous 43 years in North Little Rock. Their motto's success has been reflected in strong customer loyalty, with grandchildren of customers who started trading with the McPhersons 20 years ago now buying furniture from the store. In 1973, five thousand square feet of floor space was added, and in 1985 the McPhersons added a six thousand square foot warehouse and converted the old warehouse to display space, making a total of 15,000 square feet for furniture display and storage.

The McPhersons made a vitally important business decision in 1969 to eliminate their appliance, electric and carpet inventories and become the first furniture store in Springdale to sell only furniture and accessories. The store's current president, Robert (Bob) McPherson, said when they originally made this bold move, many others in the business told them they could not do it and still survive. But, as things turned out, the decision to sell only furniture and accessories proved extremely successful, and has resulted in other furniture stores doing the same. Since the conversion to offering only furniture, the McPhersons have enhanced their profits, and as Bob said, "The move to selling only furniture was probably the best move we ever made, because it allowed us to concentrate on what we do best." Today, McPherson's Home Furnishings is the largest exclusive furniture dealer in Springdale.

In 1976, the McPhersons received the Berkline Corporation National Merchant's Merit Award as, "The merchant cited most outstanding in commercial maintenance, consistent excellence in merchandising, displaying, practicing impeccable standards of courteous service and adhering to the highest principles of reputable business practices." This award can be credited to the McPhersons faithful execution of their philosophy of quality, value and service, as they have gone the extra mile to do the many little things customers appreciate.

One of those "little" things has been the McPhersons store charge account. With a small down payment, a customer can take possession of the furniture he or she wants. They also offer Visa and MasterCard.

McPherson's 10:00 a. m. December 6, 1966, north side.

Frugality has been a hallmark of the way the McPhersons have done business over the years. Never have they resorted to extensive borrowing to finance the store's expansion. Their view has always been, "the store comes first," and consequently they have poured a lion's share of the profits back into the store. In this way, McPherson's Home Furnishings has grown within itself, and today the McPherson's business is debt free. Their examples of frugality and fiscal self-discipline are the foundations of a successful, small, family operated business.

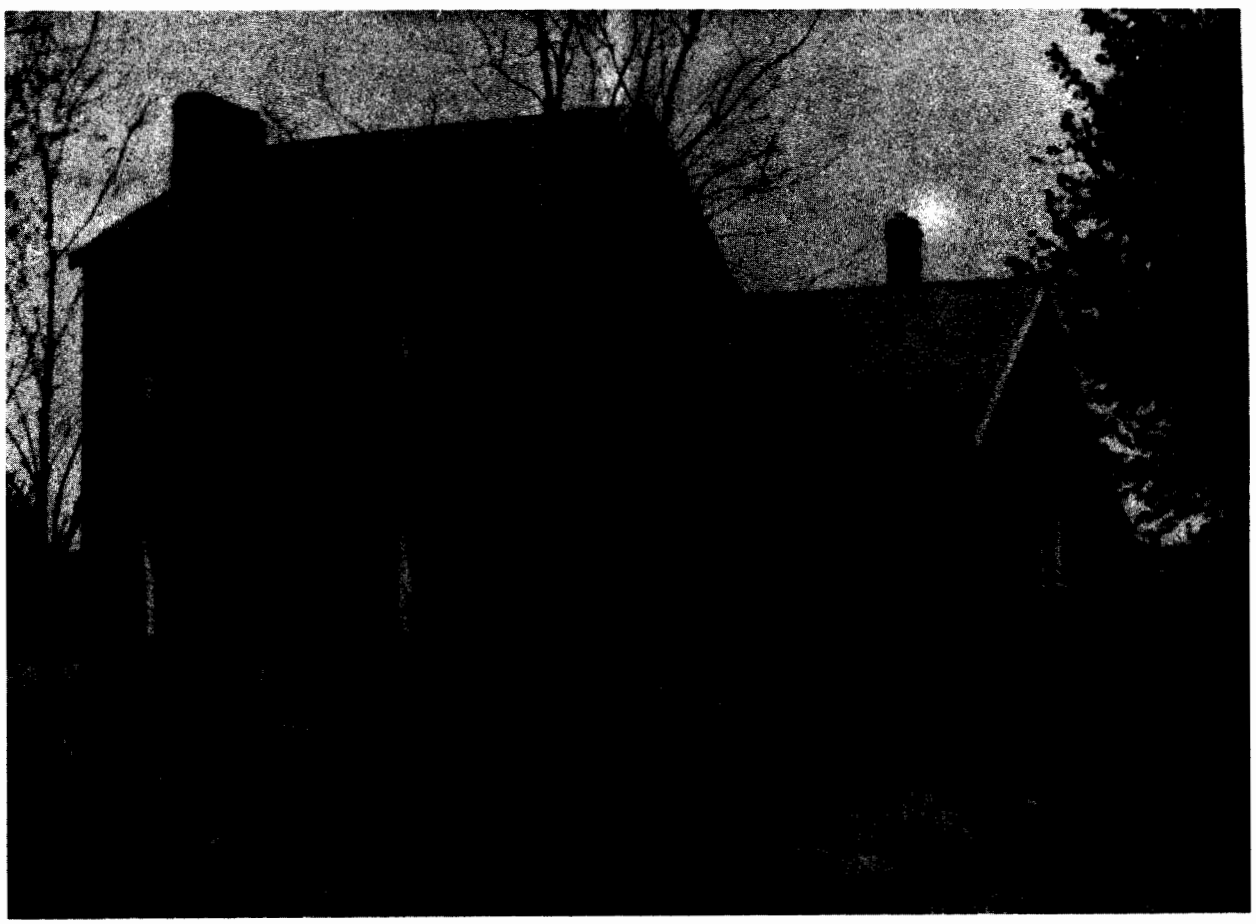
McPherson's Home Furnishings has never had a losing year since its inception. While things were difficult during the Depression, and the 1981 recession when the store showed no growth, over the 63 years of operation, the furniture business has provided a good living for the McPhersons.

The business has attracted the attention of several McPherson generations. When the business was moved to Springdale in 1966, Bob McPherson was 21 and beginning to take a very active role in the business. By the mid-seventies, Bob was in charge of day-to-day operations. During the years, Bob's mother, Arta (Billie), worked in the capacity of bookkeeper and treasurer, and still keeps a hand in the business today. Despite the advent of the computer age, the McPhersons still use their original bookkeeping methods.

Bob's wife, Carol, serves as treasurer and bookkeeper today, and their oldest son, Vincent, is vice-president. Bob and Carol's daughter, Karen, has helped with the store's office work while attending the University of Arkansas. Michael, their youngest son, has worked in the store during summer vacations and holidays from high school. The McPhersons have been active in youth activities in Springdale, with Bob coaching baseball. Several of Bob's baseball teams have gone to state championships. In addition, Bob and Carol have been active in the PTA. The McPhersons' move to Springdale was a stroke of business genius sparked by their desire for a congenial atmosphere in which to raise a family. "We've had a good life up here. It has been a great place to raise a family," Bob and Carol commented. But the McPhersons have not just received from the Springdale and northwest Arkansas community. Through their business practices—providing excellent value for quality merchandise—and through their involvement with the community's youth, the McPhersons have helped make Springdale an attractive place to live.

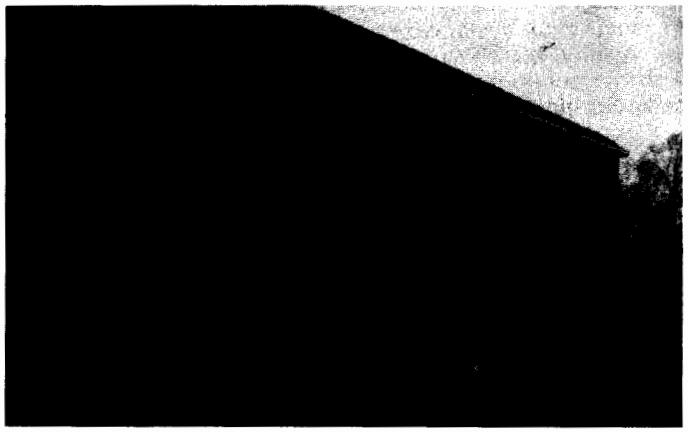


Northwest Arkansas Radiation Therapy Institute

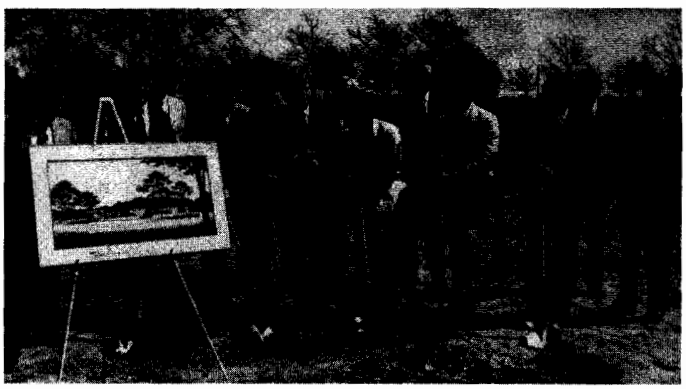
NARTI Is Winning Against Cancer

In October of 1985, Northwest Arkansas Radiation Therapy Institute (NARTI), a non-profit, tax exempt treatment facility opened its doors to provide state-of-the-art radiation treatment to cancer patients throughout northwest Arkansas, southwest Missouri and northeast Oklahoma.

This is the most complete and modern technological facility of its kind in a 600 mile radius (the nearest larger facility of its kind is in Houston).



Northwest Arkansas Radiation Therapy Institute.



Groundbreaking for NARTI - completed in 1985.

Patients must be referred to the center by a physician. There are physicians and nurses on staff to make patients physically and emotionally comfortable. Revenues from the use of patient services and donations enable the institute continuing operation.

Building and staffing a medical institution so specialized met an important need in the tri-state area, and the visionaries involved were countless, but the impetus began with the Northwest Arkansas Hospital Association.

Hospitals worked together without competing for but contributing toward making a patient-care center and centrally located repository of research and information available that each of them could share.

According to C. Edward Bradford, FACHE, the present executive director of NARTI, Hugh Means, (administrator of Springdale Memorial Hospital at that time) was instrumental in pleading the case for an area facility without traveling to Tulsa or Little Rock.

Cancer radiation treatment programs necessitate a five-day a week regimen for six to eight weeks. Such extended and extensive care meant patients were away (at critical times of needed support) from families and jobs. A centrally located facility meant that these same people could remain at home, commute and hold their jobs.

Every hospital in the association supported the campaign to construct such a cancer treatment center. They included: Bates Memorial Hospital, Bentonville; Boone County Hospital, Harrison; Carroll General Hospital, Berryville; Eureka Springs Hospital, Eureka Springs; Fayetteville City Hospital, Fayetteville; Gravette Medical Center, Gravette; Huntsville Memorial Hospital, Huntsville; St. Mary's Hospital, Rogers; Siloam Springs Memorial, Siloam Springs; Veteran's Administration Medical Center, Fayetteville; Washington Regional Medical Center, Fayetteville; and Springdale Memorial Hospital, Springdale.

Once the hospital association was in agreement to work together to promote NARTI, Nolan Richardson, (head basketball coach at the University of Arkansas) agreed to chair the fund drive to raise $900,000.

J. W. (Bill) Ramsey (state representative, Prairie Grove) introduced legislation requesting a million dollars be appropriated for the construction of NARTI. When granted, monies from the Jones Foundation (Harvey and Bernice Jones, Springdale) matched the appropriation.

Gifts and donations came from private industry, medical practices, hospitals, schools, churches and from private benefactors. The George family, Springdale, donated three and a half acres of land west of Springdale for the construction of NARTI. Its location on Highway 68 West, was central to both Benton and Washington Counties and close to Highway 71. Gary George served as NARTI's first president, on the board of trustees.

Although a total of three and a half million dollars was needed to complete the 14,500 square foot medical facility, an additional two million was needed to keep NARTI operational (in order to provide care for patients who couldn't pay). Miraculously, the money was raised. Contributions will always be needed for private institutions such as NARTI, but with private industry, individual contributions and government funding, NARTI stands on solid ground, financially, at the present time and has exceeded the patient load projected for 1988.

One of NARTI's donations came from Springdale's Centennial Evening Lion's Club and the Lions Club International Fund. It is a van which is used to transport patients who have no means of transportation.

An ongoing donation of time and patient support is given by NARTI's Ladies Auxiliary. They provide refreshments, daily, to the patients and families who use NARTI services. The women are trained to give the TLC that the patients need, and many fill in to help with clerical work.

This totally voluntary service has provided a service that can't be bought. Dedication to the needs of the patient and the institution are uppermost in the hearts of these loyal workers.

John Phillips (president, Phillips Food Stores) organized the first Phillips Pro-Classic Golf and Tennis Tournament in 1986, and NARTI was sole recipient of the proceeds from that benefit-tournament. Phillips continues, through the Annual Classic, to be one of NARTI's staunch supporters. John Phillips is presently serving as president of NARTI's board of trustees.

Because of his dedication to the cure of cancer and his service, the Executive Director, Ed Bradford, has placed Phillips name in nomination for the Arkansas Hospital Association Distinguished Service Award given annually by the association.

An ironic twist with a happy ending occurred about a year after NARTI became operational. John Phillips, who served on the original board of NARTI, was diagnosed as having cancer of the mouth. He is totally free of cancer at this time.

NARTI currently has one Radiation Oncologist (a physician who specializes in cancer radiation treatment), Dr. Ken Gardner. Skilled radiation therapy technologists and a doctoral level medical physicist are on staff in addition to clerical staff.

Present (1988) NARTI employees include: Earl Bashaw, Louise Bashaw, Merlin Beerman, Edward Bradford, Elizabeth Brooks, Melvin C. Cheney, Sondra Owen Clark, Verita Louise Dickerson, Sandra K. Franklin, Shirley Gann, Jeff Geiger, Elaine Hardy, Nancy Kennedy, Mary E. McCutchan, Cindy McMahon, Lucy McNair, Lori Oliver, Patricia E. Overton, Cheri Riley, Sharon Samuels, Tom D. Sigmon, Dorothy Sims, Bev Walker, and Jamie Walker.

One of the most positive aspects of dealing with patient tumors is the Tumor Registry. This is a computerized registry and one of only two in operation in the state of Arkansas. It combines cancer data that can be evaluated and made available to all hospitals using NARTI services. This research is invaluable in treating not only specific tumors but in determining if certain cancers may or may not be more prevalent in certain geographic locations.

Two pieces of radiation equipment have a capability of treating skin cancers or body surface tumors, and three pieces of equipment are designed to treat deep embedded tumors or cancers.

The Ximatron 5 Radiotherapy Planning Simulator determines treatment volume within the body. This simulator most accurately reproduces geometrical condition on the treatment equipment. Low intensity lasers are used in the simulator as well as in treatment rooms to assure precise positioning of the patient from treatment to treatment.

Two linear accelerators (linacs) are manufactured by Varian Associates. One is the Clinac 6/100, the other Clinac 1800. These machines accelerate electrons to a range of energies from six million electron volts (MEV) to 18 MEV. The electrons may be used directly for treatment or to generate high energy x-ray (photon) by placing a high atomic number target in the beam. Photons are used in the treatment of disease deep within the body, sparing normal surface tissue. Electrons are used to treat disease near the surface, sparing the underlying normal tissue.

The NARTI Cobalt Machine is very similar to the linacs but it produces the radiation beams differently. Cobalt machines use a radioactive isotope which continually emits radiation called gamma rays, which are normally absorbed by shielding when the machine is not treating patients. The gamma rays affect tissue in the same way as photon beams from the low voltage linac, but its energy output is only slightly more than one million electron volts (MEV).

The other piece of state-of-the-art equipment is the treatment planning computer. This highly sophisticated Computerized Medical Systems (CMS) assists the physician and technologists and gives them the information needed to administer treatment in a way that destroys the most cancer cells while destroying as few normal cells as possible.

Education and counseling are a part of the treatment given patients and families of patients at NARTI. Outreach Services provide financial assessment and referral, transportation and even housing assistance when needed. The program offers support groups and seminars conducted by a licensed professional that deal with the necessity of treating the family as well as the patient.

Worthy of mention is NARTI's first board of directors: Gary George, president, David McClinton, Vice President, Barbara Roberts, Secretary, Mark Simmons, Treasurer, Rick Allen, Richard B. Atkinson, Joe Basore, Barbara Broyles, Lewis Epley, J. D. Erwin, Vic Evans, David Gates, John Phillips, Dennis Shaw, Dick Trammel, and Alice Walton.

Many are still serving on the board of directors. Members more recently added to the board include: Jim Von Grump, Dorothy Hanby, Wayne Lawson, C. R. Magness, M. D., John Meade and Willard Walker. Allen C. Meadors, FACHE, PhD., was the first Executive Director.

The Physician Advisory Board includes doctors Joe D. Bennett, Harrison; James H. Bledsoe, Rogers; John

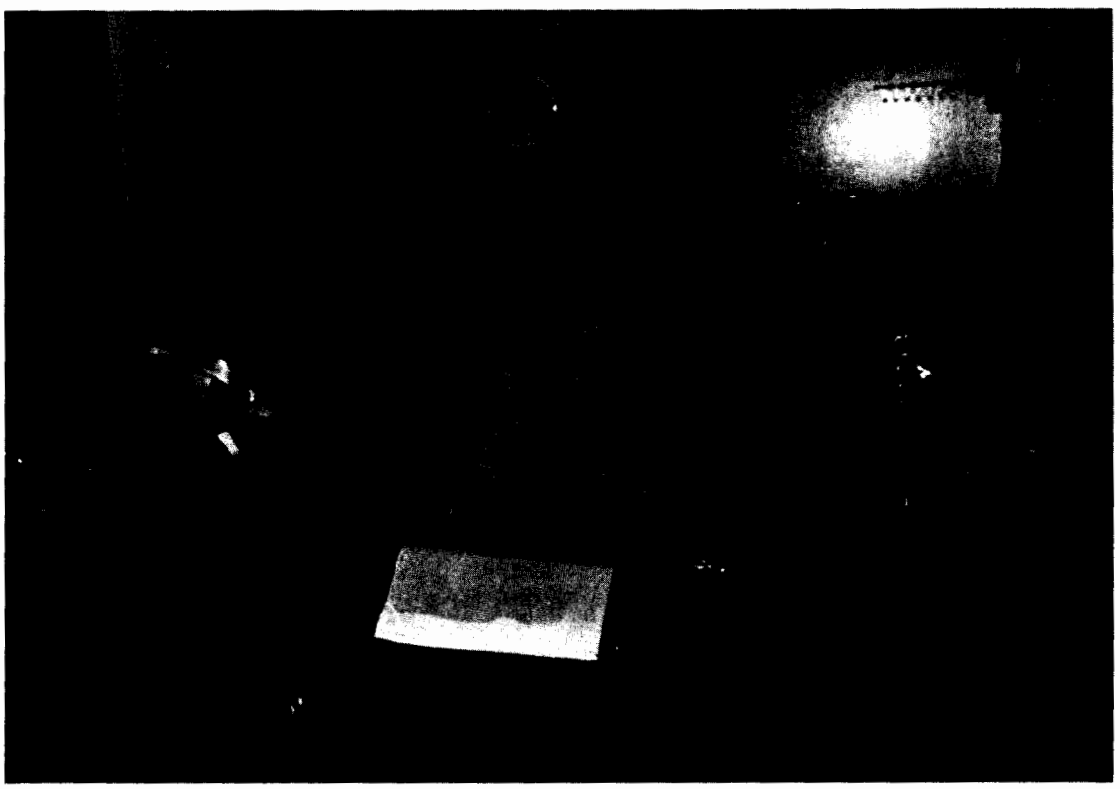
Garrett, Gravette; Malcolm Hayward, Fayetteville; Robert Holder, Bentonville; John Kendrick, Springdale; Hilton Lacey, Huntsville; C. R. Magness, Fayetteville; Frank Panettiere, Rogers; Michael C. Reese, Rogers; Earl B. Riddick, Fayetteville; and Jan T. Turley, Rogers.

With all the equipment, technology and top medical personnel, what is the "good news" in regard to cancer and the rate of cure? Ed Bradford states that according to the latest statistics, three million people diagnosed as having cancer have been cured.

Bradford also points out that cancer charts indicate a cyclical up and down of cancer cases being treated, and the trend seems to be on the down side of the cycle. Bradford claims statistics bear out over 50% of all cancers are being cured, the highest rate ever. Deaths due primarily to cancer become less and less with earlier and more effective treatment available. This is good news in light of statistics indicating 985,000 new cases of cancer will be diagnosed in 1988.

The greatest hope for the future has always been our young people. It is no different in the field of medicine. On a day devoted to planting daffodils at NARTI, a day planned to include all the students from northwest Arkansas who cared to participate, was filled with smiling faces of young people beautifying the grounds with hand spades and flower bulbs. One young man spoke up, "This is fun. If you have to be sick, it's a great place to come, not a bit scary."

NARTI endorses the hope and enthusiasm of such youth who tell us: The future can be bright. Don't let your fear prevent such a future.

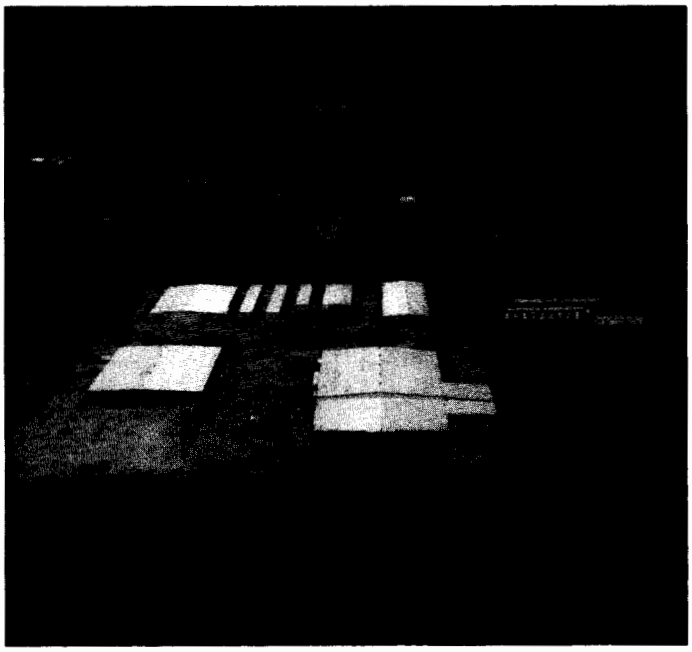


National Home Center

Person-to-Person Service Fuels Home Center's Growth

National Home Center has grown from a small Springdale window company to the largest independently owned building supply and home improvement company in the state of Arkansas.

Presently on Highway 265 in Springdale and spanning several acres, this multi-faceted homegrown business experienced several expansions and moved to its present location in 1983.



National Home Center, Highway 265, Springdale, Arkansas.

In the last 20 years, this business has grown to include similar operations in Fort Smith (1977), and in Rogers, in 1985. One superstore location was added in North Little Rock in 1985 and encompasses 11.6 acres with approximately 240,000 square feet of building materials and supplies, including 90,000 square feet of home center showrooms.

When Handy Dan Stores had a nationwide reorganization in 1985, the parent company, Channel Home Centers of New York, opted to sell 50 of its 200 Handy Dan stores. Two of these stores in Little Rock provided ideal locations for extending National Home Center's coverage of the central Arkansas market. These two stores were acquired in early 1988, bringing the total home center operations to six.

National Home Centers are retail stores which are built on the concept of "one-stop" shopping with complete home centers, one-site warehousing and full-line lumberyards directed to meeting the professional contractor, remodeler and do-it-yourselfers' needs.

The Home centers' inventories include a broad variety of lumber, plywood, siding, doors, windows, mouldings, floor, window and wall coverings, plumbing electrical, cabinets, appliances, hardware, housewares and paint.

An important division of the company is the manufacturing operation which produce prehung doors, kitchen cabinets, vanity and bath counter tops. All of the roof and floor trusses and prefabricated products are assembled in the Springdale truss plant.

A complete line of kitchen and bath cabinets are produced by Cabinet Craft, a three year old operation and wholly owned subsidiary of National. This division also manufactures such specialty items as fireplace mantles, work benches, and redwood ventilation products. This operation is located just off Highway 68, east of Springdale.

Dwain Newman, owner, president, and chief executive officer of the company since its incorporation in 1972, oversees the company's operations from the Springdale Home Center location.

Newman's background in selling building materials and in business management include experience as a contractor salesman and general manager of Gateway Plywood and Door Company of Springdale (a division of International Forest Products) and regional manager of operations for International Forest Products until 1972.

In 1970, in an off-hours business venture, Jim Cypert, a life-long friend, and classmate, and Newman became co-owners of National Window Company, a small company originally located on Old Wire Road in Springdale. The company moved to 418 East Emma Avenue that same year. Then in 1972, Newman bought out Cypert's interest in the business.

Newman made the decision to take the business on a full time basis and hoped to develop its full growth potential. Changing the name from National Window to National Window and Building Supply, then to National Lumber Company, the "new" business remained at its Emma Avenue location. Then as the company grew, it became apparent that more space was needed and Newman purchased the twenty-one acres on Highway 265, where the new Home Center and manufacturing divisions were built.

"As a young man transplanted from Texas to northwest Arkansas, in 1951, I feel pretty homegrown. I graduated from Springdale High School in 1952. I love northwest Arkansas and, Springdale, in particular; this is a great area of the state," Newman said.

Newman credits some of the growth of the early business in part, to Richard Burr, his vice-president from late 1972 until 1979, stressing again the value of having top people in management, asserting that good productive people create growth and opportunity.

On the growth of the company, Newman says, "We have had very good growth, but are still very small compared to some of the Springdale and northwest Arkansas giants, such as Tyson Foods, George's, P. A. M. Trucking and Willis Shaw Trucking. These companies have had great growth and expansion and this has provided many opportunities for Springdale and northwest Arkansas."

"National has doubled in sales growth every two to three years, but that is insignificant compared to the Tyson's, J. B. Hunt's, Wal-Mart growth and other companies in the area. Obviously, these companies have helped create growth opportunities for National Home Centers in northwest Arkansas," he added.

Newman's present executive staff includes: Danny Funderburg, Vice President, Michael Brandkamp, Vice President of Sales, Royce Pennington, Vice President of Finance, Roger A. Holman, Vice President of Purchasing and Operations, and Don R. Stockwell, Company Treasurer.

"We have employees who have been with the company ten to fifteen years. Tom Worthy, is a local Springdale boy that came up through the company and is now the Home Center manager. There is also Jerry Mounce, manager of Truss Manufacturing; and Euall McCarty, in charge of the Springdale lumber yard and warehouses.

"Another local Springdale boy is Tom Tisdale in contractor sales," Newman said. "Roger Holman, Vice President of Purchasing, was born and raised in Springdale," Newman noted.

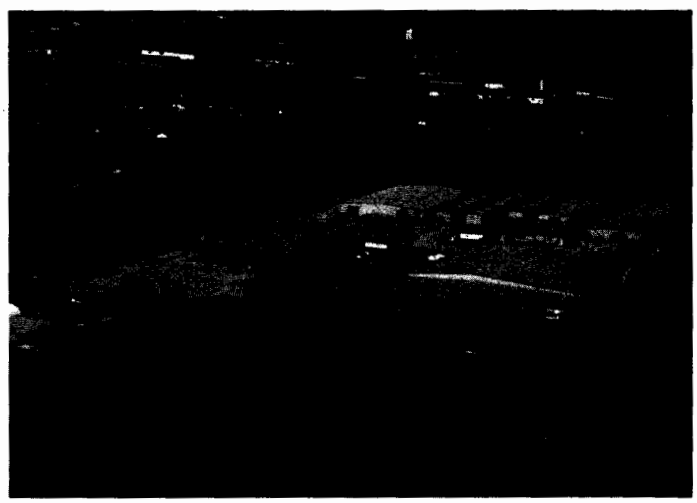
Newman's wife, Glenda, is active with the company. Her organization skills, her 'sounding board' qualities and home decorating ideas have made her well-qualified for her job as special projects coordinator.



Aireal view of present facilities - National Home Center.

"Five years ago, the Home Center was 30% of the business with contractor sales accounting for the remaining 70%. They are now almost equal in sales. I've seen the amount of hours Dwain has put into this company. My involvement gives me an understanding of the time he gives. I don't complain and I try to ease his workload. He does expect a lot from his employees in time, energy, enthusiasm and loyalty, but never as much as he requires of himself. He knows what has to be done, because he knows and understands the business and the customers' needs," Glenda pointed out.

Newman has two sons and a daughter. Kristy Newman, his daughter, trains show horses in Arlington, Texas. Jeff, Newman's youngest son works at the Springdale facility in purchasing. Mike, his oldest son, is employed with a printing company in Springdale. Brent Hanby, Glenda's son, works in the finance department of the company.

All home center operations are supported by modern computerized inventories, pricing, shipping and billing systems. Rapid delivery is assured via National's fleet of over 100 trucks.

The Springdale facilities employ 150 people and are headed by Phil Alger, General Manager of both Springdale and Rogers operations. Overall, the company employs over 550 people. Newman claims that any of his employees can start at the "bottom" and move right on up through the company. "All it takes is a willingness to achieve. There are excellent opportunities in our company for young people. A good job with the company isn't like a pie on a shelf to be grabbed, but it is within reach for anyone who wants to work for it," Newman said.

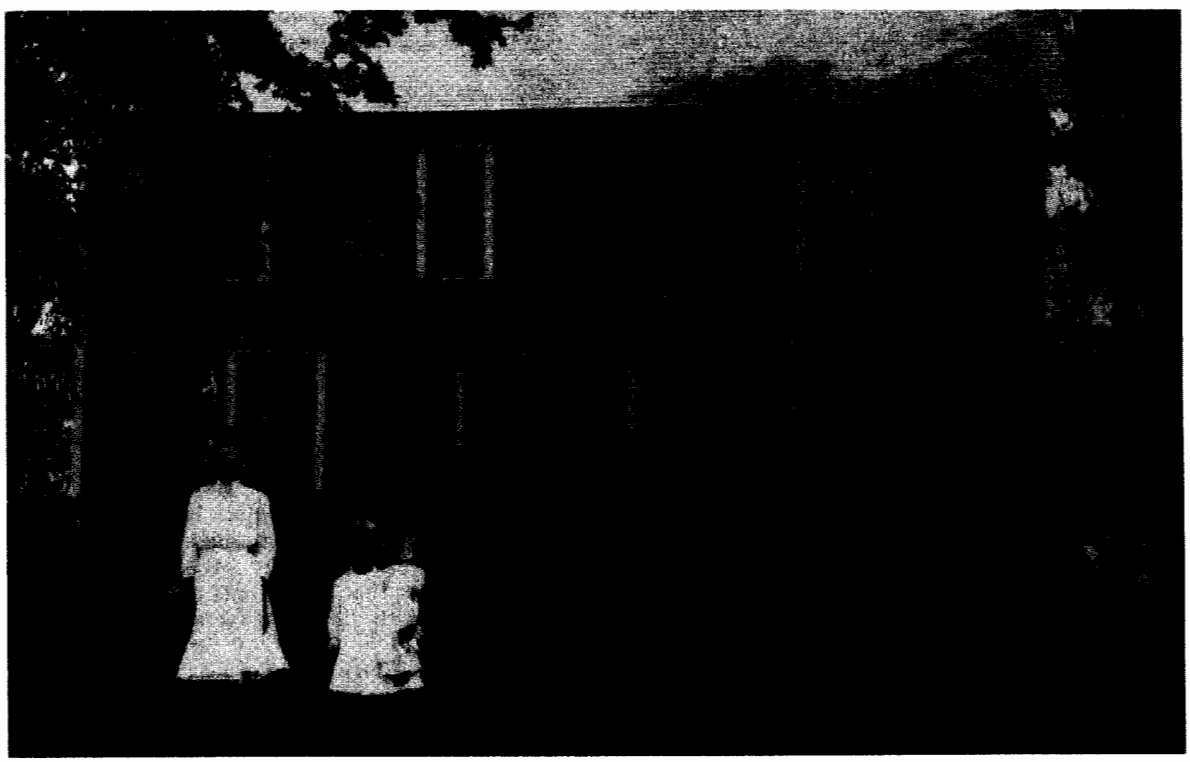
"Job opportunities are created because of people doing an outstanding, productive job effort. This effort is judged, not by the employee, but by his peers, the customers, the suppliers and, of course, his bosses," Newman's boss, he said, is the customer; "If the customer likes what we do in the stores, he will buy from us and hopefully return and continue to do business with us over many years," Newman added.

National Home Center has memberships in the Northwest Arkansas Home Builders Association, Arkansas (state) Home Builders Association, and National Home Builders Association. National maintains memberships in Springdale, Fayetteville and Arkansas State Chambers of Commerce, and in the local organizations of the National Home Center locations.

Newman regrets that he has so little time to play an active role in civic organizations, but his schedule and the demand of out-of-town business will not permit it. He financially supports many of the local civic and community organizations and charities, however, and is a frequent contributor to churches and local fund raisers.

"The aim of our company is to offer lower prices, a better selection and good customer service. If we can continue to do this, I see no reason why our company can't continue to be the dominant supplier in each of our markets in Arkansas in the future," Newman said.

"I want to see the new business developments of the 1990s. I want to keep abreast with progress. I still have too much excitement about the business to think about retirement. I think I'll stick around and make sure we live up to our commitment to ensure our continued excellence of service, merchandising, pricing, and of course, profits. That's the name of the business game," Newman concluded.



Odom, Elliott & Martin: Tradition

Tradition. It's an unusual word to apply to a law firm that has only been in existence since 1982. But, tradition—a tradition of hard work, determination and working-man's values—is what Odom, Elliott & Martin is all about.

The tiny, free-standing gold-lettered sign before the door of the Guisinger Building at 1 E. Mountain in Fayetteville which announces the firm, attests to the sense of tradition Bobby L. Odom, Don R. Elliott and Mark L. Martin bring to their profession.

"We don't advertise the firm—just a phone number in the Yellow Pages," Odom said. "The small, unobtrusive sign is a traditional English concept, which we think is appropriate for Fayetteville and our office."

Guisinger's Music Store built in 1925 home of law firm of Odom, Elliott and Martin.

The Guisinger Building was chosen as headquarters for Odom, Elliott & Martin with the traditions of Fayetteville in mind. The building, constructed in 1886, sits on a corner lot of historic Fayetteville Square. It has housed, at various times: a hardware store, a wholesale grocery, a harness and wagon business, a dry goods business, and—from 1925 until the firm purchased the property in 1982—Guisinger's Music Store.

Since Odom collects antiques, the Guisinger Building seemed an appropriate place to set up shop for the new firm. All three of the men were working for Niblock Law Firm in 1982. Odom had been with the firm since 1971. Elliott had joined the firm as a law clerk in 1977, then after taking the bar exam, went to work as a lawyer in 1978. Martin followed in 1980.

Odom, who was admitted to the bar in 1970, came to Arkansas from Alabama. After graduating from the University of Southern Mississippi in 1961, he began working for Crawford and Company in Lafayette, Louisiana, for an insurance adjusting company.

"I was dealing with lawyers all the time on claims," Odom recalled. It made me want to be an attorney, although I never dreamed it was possible."

When the company transferred him to Fayetteville in 1966, Odom enrolled in the University of Arkansas Law School. After clerking for Associate Justice John A. Fogleman of the Arkansas Supreme Court from June of 1970 to June of 1971, Odom joined Niblock. It was with Niblock that Odom's sense of tradition and his own personal history combined to give his practice the emphasis it has now: worker's compensation and personal injury cases.

Walter Niblock gave Odom damage and workers' compensation cases to handle. The firm accepted either management's or the worker's side of a case. But Odom's bent was toward handling workers' suits. "My mother—who only had an eighth-grade education—was secretary/treasurer in the union at Swift and Company (in Alabama)," Odom said. "She used to take me to all the union meetings when I was a child. What went on at those meetings stuck with me."

As the Niblock firm grew, more and more law clerks passed through its doors. Don Elliott passed his CPA exam while he was in law school, "Just in case," he said. "It seemed like a good thing to have at the time. I think that was why I was hired (as a law clerk) at Niblock. I don't think I'd have gotten the job without it."

Elliott did some criminal defense tax work with E. J. Ball. He received his CPA certificate in 1980. But, when he left Niblock, he gradually quit handling tax cases. The more he worked with Odom, the more he became involved with personal injury and workers' compensation cases. He liked the work.

Although Elliott was born in Frankfort, Germany, his family is squarely rooted in Arkansas. "My family has been in both southern and northeastern Arkansas since the Civil War," he said. "I haven't checked back any further than that."

Elliott received his bachelor's degree from Ouachita Baptist University in 1975 with the help of a football scholarship. He received his law degree from the University of Arkansas in 1978. Elliott's parents, who are both longtime educators, encouraged him to go to law school.

Like Odom, Elliott is family-oriented and has a deep sense of the Arkansas values of tradition and hard work. Both think these values help in relating to their clients. Neither belongs to any outside civic or social organizations, preferring to pour their energies into helping their clients.

"We work hard, but we have a good time, too," Odom said.

Each year for the past 15 years, Odom has held an outdoor get-together at his home outside Fayetteville for the community businessmen. The party is held as near to the Fourth of July celebration as possible—but never on the Fourth or on Friday or Saturday night. The idea is one of fellowship, to drop hostilities for at least one day of the year.

It is not uncommon, however, to find all three partners in the office on Saturday or Sunday afternoons, talking with clients and making future appointments.

"On Sunday, I go to church with my family, go out to eat, then sue the hell outta the heathen companies all Sunday afternoon," Odom said, laughing. "But nobody gets me on Friday or Saturday nights. That's the time I spend with my family."

As representatives of the working man, the partners work weekends in order to better serve their clients. "They (our clients) can't get off work just any time to make an appointment," Elliott said. "We work around their schedules. I think that our clients associate with us that we enjoy working with people, that we work hard, and that we're honest."

By the time Mark Martin was in law school at the University of Arkansas, he had heard about the personal injury and workers' compensation cases Odom was handling for Niblock. Although Martin's home state is California, his roots are firmly planted in workers' rights and union law in both California and northwest Arkansas.

"My great-grandfather was a contract laborer in a rock quarry in Hawaii," Martin said. "He had 11 children and his leg was blown off when he stepped on a blasting cap while on the job. The quarry kept him on as a watchman after his accident—just long enough for the statute of limitations to run out for filing a claim."

Martin said his great-grandfather was fired from his job, which left him no means of supporting his children. Martin's grandfather was sent to live with California relatives when he was 11 years old. His grandfather became a militant union activist and founded the Sheet Metal Production Workers Union Local #355.

Martin's brother, Steve, is now executive secretary for the Alameda County Labor Council of California. Martin was an active labor organizer in Arkansas before turning to the law, and currently serves on the Arkansas State AFL-CIO Executive Board.

Martin's tie to Arkansas is through his mother. She was born in Clarksville, so family is still here. It was one of the reasons he chose to study music at the University of Arkansas. An accomplished cellist at 17, he began a bachelor's program in music at the university. "I also wanted to go to school where my older brother was," Martin said.

He forged another link with Arkansas when he met his wife at the university. Although the music program didn't pan out and Martin returned to California to complete a degree in English at Berkeley, his family ties would eventually bring him back to Arkansas.

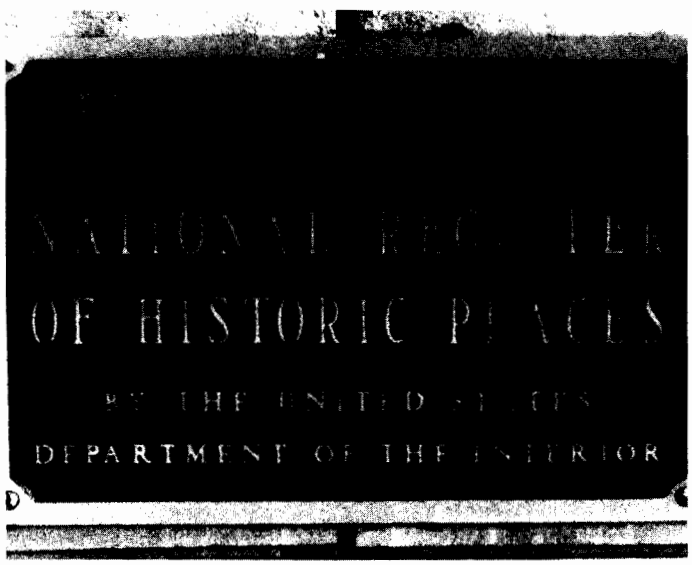
His wife accepted a position with the University of Arkansas a few years after he graduated from Berkeley in 1973. But a BA in English from Berkeley wasn't much of a recommendation for employment in conservative Washington county in the 1970s. Martin went to work as an orderly at Washington General Hospital. It was at the hospital that he began working with the area labor movement, trying to organize hospital personnel.

A short time later, Martin switched to the University of Arkansas as a laborer—and also worked as a union organizer for Local #965 of the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees (AFSCME). During the seven years he worked as a laborer for the university, Martin was constantly active with organized labor. The more he worked with labor organizations, the more he wanted to assist them with their legal rights.

"I wanted to help people," Martin said, "and being a lawyer was one of the best ways to do that."

Odom interviewed Martin for a clerk's position with Niblock in 1979. Martin knew that Odom worked with unions and that the firm represented either side, not just labor. He told Odom that he wouldn't represent "anything that closely resembled management— ever. I thought I wouldn't get the job because of that," Martin said. "I was wrong."

Today the firm represents such clients as the Northwest Arkansas Labor Council, AFL-CIO; the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers Local 700; Graphic Communications Workers Union Local 673; the Plumbers and Steamfitters Local 29 of the United Association of Journeymen and Apprentices of the Plumbing and Pipefitting Industry of the United States and Canada, AFL-CIO; and, Teamsters Local #373. The partners think that the firm's success is attributable in part to limiting their practice to personal injury and workers' compensation cases by representing the people's side—and because they work hard as a team to provide the best legal expertise possible.



"We not only work together on cases," Martin said, "but there's the feeling that we really want to help each other, too—rather like a marriage."

A homey, familiar feeling is evident in the meticulous restoration of the building, which has been included in the National Register of Historic Places. The 8,300 square-foot building is filled with antiques and comfortable period furniture. The only hint of modern technology is the CPT computer terminals in the offices which keep track of the more than 300 new asbestos-related workers' compensation cases.

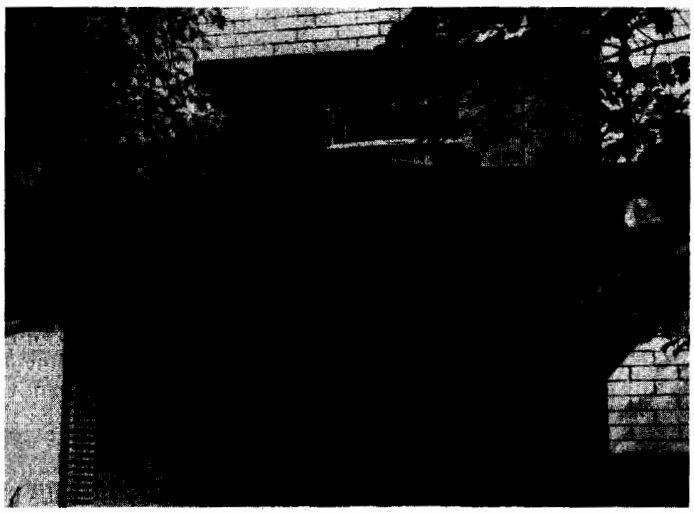
The building houses five attorneys—Laura J. McKinnon and Amber Carter are new attorneys with the firm—six law clerks, a business manager and eight staff members, who handle cases ranging from maritime oil field suits, to wrongful discharge cases, to social security benefit claims. The firm's attorneys often travel state-wide in connection with their cases. The asbestos cases take them to Missouri as well as throughout Arkansas.



Because the attorneys travel frequently and often see clients on weekends, the building was also furnished with a full kitchen and bathroom equipped with a shower. The decor for both is in keeping with the 19th century flavor of the rest of the building. A deck off the kitchen provides added "living" space, as well as a fire escape. Both the Kitchen area and deck are popular gathering places for the staff during rare moments of free time.

The attorneys' seven-day work weeks are a necessary part of their client-attorney relationship. Odom said he is not above "firing" a client who, according to him, isn't interested enough in his own case to keep in close contact with the firm. Cases usually take a minimum of six months to handle, so the firm likes to see its clients at least once a month—preferably more often.

"The people support this firm," Odom said. "We believe in the system, and so do they. I think of myself as a 'grassroots' lawyer."

Odom's favorite case occurred when he was with Niblock. He defended a woman's daughter in juvenile court. "She couldn't pay me for handling the case," Odom said, "but I did receive a sincere letter of thanks. She believed in the system and wanted to let me know she did."

Elliott recalled a favorite case which occurred while he was also with Niblock. He represented a woman who had been falsely arrested for shoplifting. The store only offered $100 in compensation for the arrest, but the jury awarded her $5,000. Elliott said he was stunned when the verdict came in.

The firm's expertise in personal injury suits has had an impact on workers' compensation and social security benefits for the entire nation. In a landmark case in 1983 heard in the Federal Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals, the court ruled in favor of George Hillhouse's right to social security benefits. The Department of Health and human Services' policy of "non- acquiescence" was slapped down in favor of the firm's client.

According to Martin, who handled the case, the court heard oral arguments. "The case was covered extensively by the press," Martin said, "including coverage by T. V. stations from Texas. The ruling, in effect, told Patricia Roberts Harris (then secretary of Health and Human Services) to comply with our federal court law regarding disabling allegations of pain—or face jail time."

Although the firm has been involved in landmark cases, plans are to remain small—four or five attorneys—and in the Fayetteville area. A large firm would mean a loss of quality and rapport with clients, and a loss of the ability to keep tabs on each other and help each other out, according to Odom.

As things stand now, the "marriage" of the firm—built on traditional values and goals—is solid. Honesty, hard work and each member's area of expertise have created a team effort for Odom, Elliott and Martin.

"Since we're expert in different areas, we represent the entire spectrum of personal injury law," said Martin. "As a result, we're excellent in negotiations because each complements the others and completes the circle," Odom concluded.

Original Homes, Inc.

Sandy Boone: A Springdale Winner

Joe Sanford "Sandy" Boone has been a jack-of-all-trades and master of some, but always in the back of his mind he knew he was meant to design and build houses.

Joe Sanford Boone

Together, Sandy Boone and Fred Schroeder formed a corporation called Original Homes, Inc., in 1950. Boone later bought out Schroeder's interest in the business becoming sole owner.

Boone's development and construction of houses did not start with Original Homes but had been an ongoing pursuit of his. He had developed land and constructed houses prior to this business venture. In addition, he was and is involved with several other corporations.

Unique to Boone's construction of houses was his combining his decorating interest into the built-in options that accompanied his houses. Some he decorated in completion—everything from floor to wall to ceiling. Boone often had a free hand relieving couples of the burden of choice and arguments that can accompany home-decoration.

After World War II, Boone built some of the houses along Maple Drive in Springdale. This was part of the first land development and property subdivided for postwar housing. It was the height of the postwar housing boom, and houses were in demand as servicemen returned from active duty ready to start families that had been postponed for the duration of the war.

"I planted the Maple trees along that street. I hauled the gravel and I poured every bag of cement to be mixed for that street to be paved. I had cement poison over my whole body to prove it," Boone said of that early venture.

"I knew from my school days that I'd be dealing in the design or construction of homes. The only school scrapbook project I ever completed was on interior decorating. I still have the thing," Boone added.

Original Homes, Inc., under the presidency of Boone, extended to the design and remodeling of offices and office buildings as well. The face of the old Springdale News Building on West Emma was one of Boone's designs.

At present, some of Boone's business interests include rental properties such as the San Jose Manor Complex on East Emma Avenue. This office and business complex was a result of the periodic flooding that occurred in Springdale's downtown area causing a serious cleanup problem for businesses and a constant wearing away of the older buildings.

After the City Council approved an Urban Renewal program in 1969, homes and businesses in the area were torn down, families relocated. The Corps of Engineers came in and widened the Spring Creek channel from Old Missouri Road to beyond Shiloh Street.

At first a shopping mall was planned for both sides of Emma Avenue, but when lack of financial backing for such an undertaking fell through, Boone went to Joe Steele and drew out a plan for a building that eventually became San Jose Manor.

Sandy, Koni and Sandy Lee Boone.

Steele joined Boone to form a corporation they called J & S Developers. Together, they built the San Jose Manor in 1970, covering the length of the entire block between Commercial and Spring Streets. A new Springdale was in the making.

At present (1988), Boone rents space in San Jose Manor to six businesses at street level and at least that many offices on the second level of the building. For over two years one of the upstairs offices was the home of the Washington County History Book project.

"My ancestors pioneered Arkansas. My great-great-great-grandfather, James Boone came here in around 1830-1832 and was the first doctor in Washington County and one of the first state legislators who helped draft the Arkansas Constitution. My fifth great-grandfather was Daniel Boone's grandfather, George Boone III, of England. A lot of my family including my dad went into chiropractic. Some of the family chiropractors opened a health resort and clinic in Texas."

"My dad (Percy Wayland "Doc" Boone) used to want me to go into medicine or dentistry, but that wasn't ever part of my plan. I've always had a great time organizing all the businesses I've been involved in, even the ones that failed, and I've had a few of those. A men's clothing store and a restaurant, both, were among the businesses that didn't succeed," Boone said.

One of the more successful of Boone's businesses was the Boone-Ritter Insurance Agency. Not purchased as a family business, his father had also once shared an ownership in one of the first insurance agencies in Springdale.

"Doc" Boone and Howard Ewalt (brothers-in-law) were partners in the United Insurance Agency located on Emma Avenue. They later dissolved their partnership with Ewalt taking the casualty business and Boone maintaining the fire and property insurance business.

Sandy Boone's insurance agency evolved from his connection to a Springdale insurance company started by Bill Ritter in 1939, who later formed another insurance agency in Fayetteville. It was after World War II that Sandy Boone went to work for Lynn Ritter, under the GI Bill's on the job training program.

Not one to work for someone else for very long, Boone opened his own insurance agency. It was first called Boone Insurance Service Agency and was opened in 1954. It was several years later before his lifelong friend, Jim Ritter joined him in what became the Boone-Ritter Insurance Agency. They remained in business until 1985 when they sold to Larry Clinkscales (Jim's nephew presently sole owner).

Although retired from the insurance business, both men maintain offices in the Boone-Ritter building (still owned by them) on Johnson and Spring Streets. Boone still actively participates in maintenance of his rental properties and keeps a hand in the management of several other corporations under his ownership.

Boone is as well-known for his horsemanship and love of horses as he is for his diverse business interests. Forty-one years on the board of Rodeo of the Ozarks, he helped build the rodeo grounds and remodeled the arena (he and Shorty Parsons scouted all the telephone poles available in the area and hauled them in order to build the chutes and the stands above the chutes).

Sandy has been on the board of the Miss Rodeo America Pageant since 1971. Together with Shorty Parsons and Don Hoyt, they organized the Northwest Arkansas Cavalcade, one of the first trail riding clubs in the tri-state area.

Boone was also instrumental in forming what later became the Washington County Sheriff's Posse and Jr. Posse. It was originally called the Springdale Mounted Patrol, and about 20 children made up the "Midget Patrol."

The American Paint Horse Association was a result of Boone's meeting with Rebecca Tyler of Texas and together they made this association a reality. Boone's interest began when he was given his first Paint Horse as a six year old.

Boone and his two daughters, Koni (now Mrs. Richard Power with two sons, Preston and Justin) and Sandy Lee (now Mrs. James Graham with daughter, Heather) raised and showed seven National Champions including a National Champion reigning horse three years.

Boone's wife, Juanita, has watched him incorporate one business after another, and she supported all his business decisions and continued with rearing their girls and volunteering her time with the Springdale Hospital Auxiliary, Beta Sigma Phi Sorority, and church work.

Boone represented Arkansas in the Rose Parade in 1957, a governor appointee. Boone has been listed in the American Biographical Institute in both the first and tenth editions as well as the Who's Who of the South.

As first president (serving two years) of the Northwest Arkansas Home Builders Association, he was among its founders and won the national contest in 1960 for bringing in the most new members.

Boone has received a lifetime membership from the Kiwanis Club and was one of the founders of the Jaycees (has served as president of Kiwanis). One term he was president of Kiwanis and Springdale Chamber of Commerce at the same time. In 1988 the Jaycees awarded Boone the Pioneer Citizen Award.

As a member of the board of directors of the Springdale Hospital, Springdale Chamber of Commerce and First State Bank, Boone has been active in just about every area of Springdale's growth, care and history preservation.

To quote from a speech he gave in honoring two of his friends, Mace Howell and Shorty Parsons, he said to them: "You know I've never played cards, but I do know the guy holding the aces usually wins. The winners in life need to play with four aces. The aces are attitude, commitment, enthusiasm and service."

These are the aces that Boone has always held and played. He has come out a winner. He has enjoyed his life. That's not a bad legacy to pass on to family or to business. His ace qualities are basic traits that many of the movers and shakers of northwest Arkansas share in common.

Ozarks Electric Cooperative Keys County Growth

Why shouldn't Fayetteville's "country cousins" have all the conveniences electricity provides?

That was the question behind the seven signatures on the articles of incorporation for Ozarks Rural Electric Cooperative Corporation on May 10, 1938.

Early days of stringing lines for electricity.

Rural electricity was scarce as hen's teeth in northwest Arkansas in 1938. Stringing lines to farms that dotted the hillsides in Washington County just wasn't very profitable for the large utility investors. So, the Rural Electrification Administration (REA), born under President Franklin D. Roosevelt with the help of some much needed legislation in 1936, made $25 million available for the states to begin rural electric cooperatives.

Ozarks Electric was the 11th cooperative to be incorporated in Arkansas. Although it wasn't the first to be incorporated, it has been one of the most successful, according to Millard Goff, general manager of Ozarks Electric. Goff has been with Ozarks for 23 years.

"One of the main things the women in rural Washington County wanted." Goff said, "was to get rid of their 'sadirons'— to be able to iron with an electric iron. Ozarks Electric made that possible for them in 1938."

As soon as a farmhouse was wired, other electric appliances were added to the list. The cost of electricity from Ozarks Electric in 1949 averaged 11 cents per kilowatt hour. As electricity consumption increased over the years, the price has gradually gone down. In 1986, Ozarks' average price per kilowatt hour was 6 cents. Ozarks offers the lowest priced electricity rates of any cooperative in the state.

By 1940, Ozarks Electric was approached by Roberta Hitchcock, of Eldon, Oklahoma, to extend its service to that state. Negotiation began and on July 25, 1940, articles of incorporation were approved for Adair County, Oklahoma. The incorporators borrowed $58,000 from the REA to start operations for 207 members, an approximate investment of $280 per consumer.

Cherokee County and Adair County, Oklahoma, joined Ozarks in early 1941. Judge E. G. Carroll of Stilwell, Oklahoma, was elected its first director on February 3, 1941. Today, Ozarks Electric's territory extends from the eastern part of Cherokee County, Oklahoma, to Huntsville and the southeast portion of Madison County, Arkansas, and includes all of Adair County, Oklahoma, and Washington County, Arkansas.

As the third largest co-op in Arkansas by subscriber (with 33,000 members, Ozarks' growth can be traced to the phenomenal growth of northwest Arkansas after World War II. The corporation has experienced an average growth rate of five percent per year since its incorporation, doubling its membership almost every 20 years, according to Tom Townsend, Ozarks' administrative assistant.

"Road relocation in the area has really helped business over the years," Townsend said. "And, of course, people moving into the area—retirees, and faculty, students and staff at the University of Arkansas.

"But probably the biggest growth factor has been the expansion of the poultry industry in northwest Arkansas." Townsend concluded.

With the proliferation of rural electric cooperatives in the nation in the 1940s, the need for a national organization was realized when the National Rural Electric Cooperative Association was formed in 1948. Clyde Ellis from Garfield, Arkansas—just outside Rogers—was elected its first General Manager. He served until his retirement in 1967.

The membership voted to change the corporate name from Ozarks Rural Electric Cooperative Corporation to Ozarks Electric Cooperative Corporation at the annual meeting of August 20, 1962. Ozarks Electric grew by leaps and bounds right along with Washington County. By 1955, Ozarks had moved its headquarters to 200 West Center in Stilwell, Okla., a new office building was dedicated April 2, 1956, to service Adair and Cherokee Counties more efficiently. Two years later, another new Oklahoma office was opened in Westville on October 17, 1958.

Early days Ozarks Electric Office on Center Street in Fayetteville.

The lean years of the early 1950s recession were gradually giving way to a burgeoning economy. New people were moving into northwest Arkansas and the rural areas of Washington County, reversing the farm flight of the decade. New families meant new members of Ozarks Electric. New members meant increasingly higher demand for electricity.

Groundbreaking for the Thomas B. Fitzhugh Power Facility—Ozarks' first corporate-owned power plant—was held June 30, 1961. The plant went into operation at 4:23 p. m. on May 18, 1963. Today, through Arkansas Electric Cooperative Corporation (a federation of Arkansas' eighteen distribution cooperatives), Ozarks owns three power plants outright, and three more jointly with Southwest Electric Power Company (SWEPCO) and Arkansas Power and Light (AP&L)

Arkansas Electric Cooperative Cooperation has also begun construction of a hydroelectric plant in Barling, Arkansas, on the Arkansas River which is scheduled for completion in 1989. Another is planned near Morrilton, Arkansas. Nuclear and hydrogenerated electricity comprises about 10 to 15 percent of Ozarks' power, according to Goff.

"Eighty-five to ninety percent of our power comes from coal-powered plants," Goff said. "We'd like to be able to use hydro-electric power more, but this area just doesn't lend itself to that very easily."

By 1967, Ozarks had outgrown its headquarters again. On April 23, 1967, the Co-op moved into its present building at 3641 Wedington Drive, just outside Fayetteville. The communities of Washington County and northwest Arkansas were also outgrowing their boundaries. By the early 1970s, rural "bedroom" communities had grown up in the county from Fayetteville to Springdale and beyond.

"Family-owned farms were giving way to smaller and smaller tracts of land owned by families who worked in Fayetteville," Goff said.

Millard Goff

Agri-businesses like Tyson and Cargill, which had evolved in the area during the 1950s and 1960s, were expanding offsetting the decline of the large family-owned commercial farms.

"Washington County is still the greatest producer of agricultural products of any county in the state," Goff said, "It also has the highest rural population of any county in the state, too."

The new breed of people generated a new response from Ozarks Electric. The Co-op increased its communications efforts with newsletters which address issues and concerns of its rural-urbanites. The Co-op revamped the meter-reading system in the early 1980s as a cost-saving measure in response to increases in power production costs.

The old system consisted of each member reading his own meter each month. Because the turn-around time between members reading their meters and billing receipts was so slow, Ozarks developed a plan to "hire" a member to read all the the meters in his or her neighborhood. The new program saves its members substantial dollars each year in operating costs and the savings have been reflected in the customers' bills.

Even so, there were complaints when the new system began. "Actually, the worst thing to happen to electricity is the digital clock" Goff said.

"Every time there's a fluctuation in the current—and that's often in any rural electric cooperative—the darned things go off and start flashing. We get a lot of calls about a 'power outage' when there really hasn't been one, " Goff said.

Because keeping power on is a tricky business in rural areas sometimes, Ozarks has made sure its response time to power outages is short. "We've brought power-operated equipment with their own battery backups to help keep us going during a power outage," Goff said. "After all, our members are also our stockholders, so we've got to keep on top of things much better than other utility companies."

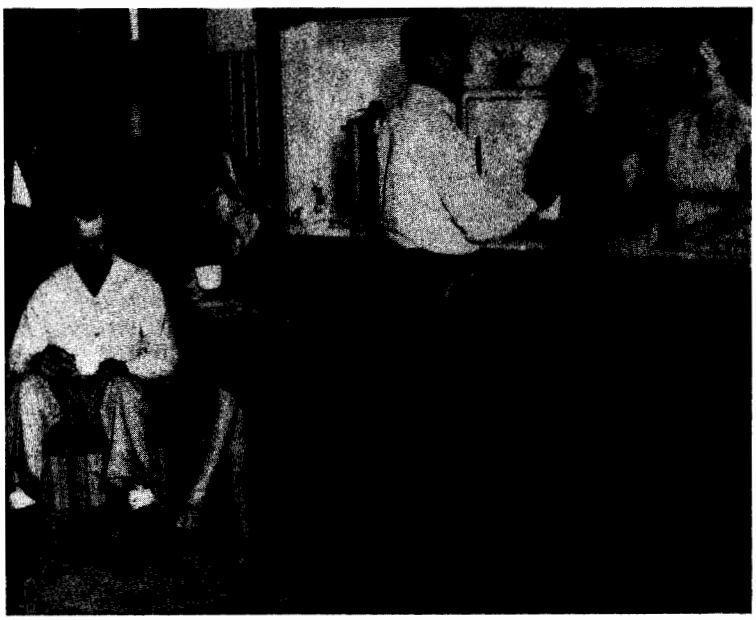
In 1983, Ozarks installed its 30,000th meter. Its members include some of the largest agricultural-related businesses in the state. "But most of our members are rural families," Goff said. "Our membership probably only has bout 12 to 15 percent farmers and five percent businesses. The rest are rural residents who work in Fayetteville, Springdale and Rogers."

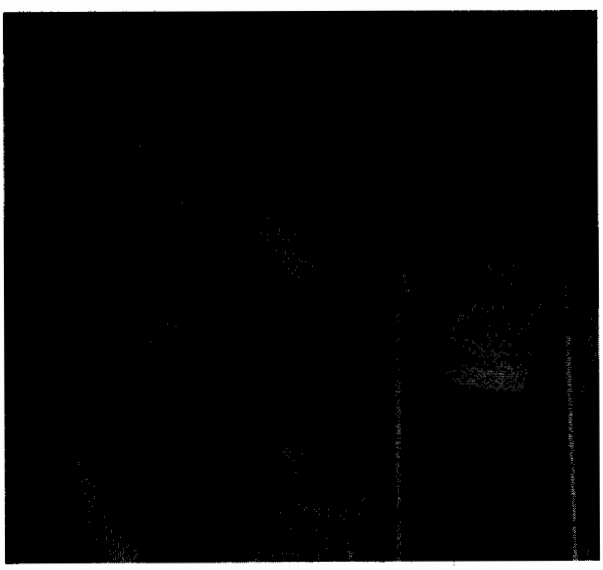
With 135 employees and over 33,000 meters in northwest Arkansas and northeast Oklahoma, Goff stated the Ozarks is the "biggest thing to happen to the area we serve, because without electricity, the area could not have developed to this extent.

From its beginnings in 1938 in a small room in downtown Fayetteville, Ozarks Electric Cooperative Corporation has focused on one thing, according to Goff: People wanted something. They wanted what the city folks had.

"Farmers wanted something—electricity—and we made it available to them," Goff said. "Even state line didn't stop us from providing that service. That's why we're always searching for newer and better ways to serve our members."

From "sadirons" to digital clocks in 50 years, the history of rural northwest Arkansas is Ozarks Electric's history—and vice versa.





P. A. M. Transport, Inc.

In March 1980, Tontitown native Paul A. Maestri and co-founder Robert Weaver began their own trucking business. By the end of 1986 they had 460 trucks and about 700 employees. How did they do it?

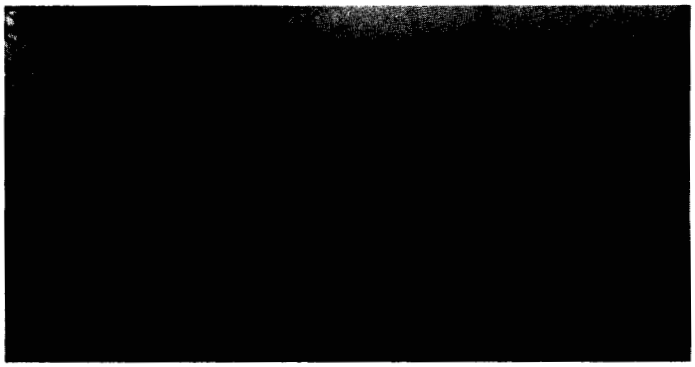
Maestri's father came to Arkansas from Italy with a group of immigrants, and Paul A. Maestri was born in Tontitown in 1930. After serving in the U. S. Paratroopers, he moved to Tulsa, where he lived from 1953 until 1964; he was associated with J. B. Hunt from 1964 until 1980. Weaver also worked for J. B. Hunt until 1980, at which time the two men pooled their knowledge and resources to form their own trucking company.

"We started P. A. M. Transport, Inc., in one room of a two room wooden building (the other half of the building was a barber shop), with six used tractors and $3,000 in savings," said Maestri. "We hired only two people, Nancy Johncox and June Erisman, and they are still with us today."

Built 1893 as family home was moved and converted to executive offices in 1986. It is oldest house in Tontitown.

Warehouse built 1945 and converted to office in 1981.

Maestri and Weaver purchased an acre of land with a warehouse, remodeled the warehouse, and kept on working. By the end of 1981 they had 23 trucks serving Minnesota,



From 1950 - 1980 former barber shop was leased and converted office.

1985 - Original warehouse was enlarged forming larger offices.

Wisconsin, Oklahoma, Texas, Kansas, Nebraska, Tennessee, Louisiana, Missouri, and Arkansas.

People who had known Maestri and Weaver when they worked for J. B. Hunt used their services for partial shipments. "Many still do," said Maestri. Their first shippers were Wal-Mart Stores and Ralston Purina Company. They also transported shipments for Union Carbide, Scott Paper and Mobil Chemical.

At the end of 1986 they had 460 trucks and about 700 employees. They had doubled in size each year.

Nature of the Operation

P. A. M. Transport is an irregular route common carrier and transports dry cargo throughout the contiguous 48 states, using non-refrigerated equipment. P. A. M. has more than 400 shippers now. Johnson & Johnson is their #1 shipper, accounting for 5% of their business. P. A. M. trucks make the longest haul per trip in the Central U. S. - about 1300 miles - with many of these trips being made to New York.

In February 1986 P. A. M. bought out the $10 million revenue producing Shaver Trucking, Inc. in Springdale, Arkansas. By June, 75 new trucks had been added and between July and December another 100 trucks were added.

On September 10, 1986 P. A. M. went public, selling 1-1/2 million shares of stock. P. A. M. went to England and Scotland, where they had road shows, selling stock. They also sold stock on the East Coast. The company is now worth $70 million; its net worth is $20 million.

Shortly after the firm went public, the story of its public offering appeared in Newsweek Magazine. It is the only company in the area ever to appear in that publication. The story was repeated in other magazines, such as Success Magazine and SITCO Magazine.

Marketing

P. A. M. employs seven salesmen throughout the contiguous 48 states who do nothing but acquire new business for P. A. M. and promote the company.

Maintenance

P. A. M. has four acres containing their own maintenance facilities. They do 100% of their own repair work on such things as engines and drive trains, and 95% of accident damage is repaired in their body shop.

P. A. M. believes strongly in preventive maintenance - and practices it with mileage inspections every 15,000 miles. Maestri also says that in 18 months there will be a new licensing act for drivers which will require that all drivers - although they can get their licenses in any state - to be registered with the Federal government. This will happen automatically, and will make it easier to hire drivers as there will be a centralized record of their driving records and health records and any tickets or fines or whatever they may have accumulated over the years.

At P. A. M. employees are constantly in contact one way or another with the other 48 (continental) states, either by telephone, computer, mail, or in person. Self-reliance is emphasized, and P. A. M. has its own telephone maintenance service that constantly monitors telephone lines which are open 24 hours a day, seven days a week.

Hiring Practices

Maestri appreciates people's interest and investment in P. A. M., and says that it has been a challenge developing the business and its resulting jobs, and helping the part of the state that is his home. P. A. M. employs about 750 people, most of whom are from Tontitown or within a radius of 100 miles of the area.

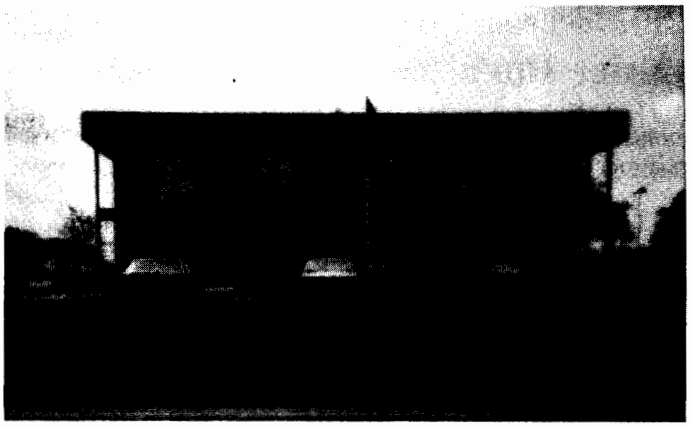
When P. A. M. hires drivers now, they must all pass a drug test and have had a health exam within the past six months or they are asked to undergo one at Springdale Clinic. A lie detector test is also given.

Training

Drivers are trained to drive P. A. M.'s trucks at Tontitown, Arkansas, where a group of 50 trained drivers teach new drivers as they are hired. If they are experienced, they are still required to attend a driver orientation class which includes a driving test.

Main Office

The headquarters of P. A. M. Transport is in Tontitown, Arkansas, in a wonderfully refurbished building that was once a private home. The two-story building is the oldest house in Tontitown now; it was under construction in 1894, when Maestri's father came with an Italian settlement to the area.



This is a picture of P. A. M.'s new office completed in November of 1987.

The Maestris bought the home, and in September 1985 had it remodeled by Clarence and Paul Ceola, grandsons of the original builder. John Doty redid the interior; the only thing inside the building that isn't original is a beautiful spiral staircase built by Bob Weaver, a Rogers staircase builder who also has the same name as Maestri's former partner, Robert Weaver.

Office Grounds

The refurbishment of the building was completed in April of 1986; however, the area where it sits was five acres of pastureland and chickens at one time. The Maestris bought that acreage and made the land surrounding the house into a park for employees. The area is equipped with miniature golf, a horseshoe court, and picnic tables. When the weather is nice many employees eat lunch there, and after work they bring their children there to play. The land value has increased 100% since they bought and landscaped it.

Mr. Maestri wants people to know that P. A. M. is a local business gone public. He appreciates people's interest and investment in the company and says that it has been a challenge developing the business and its resulting jobs and helping this part of the state.

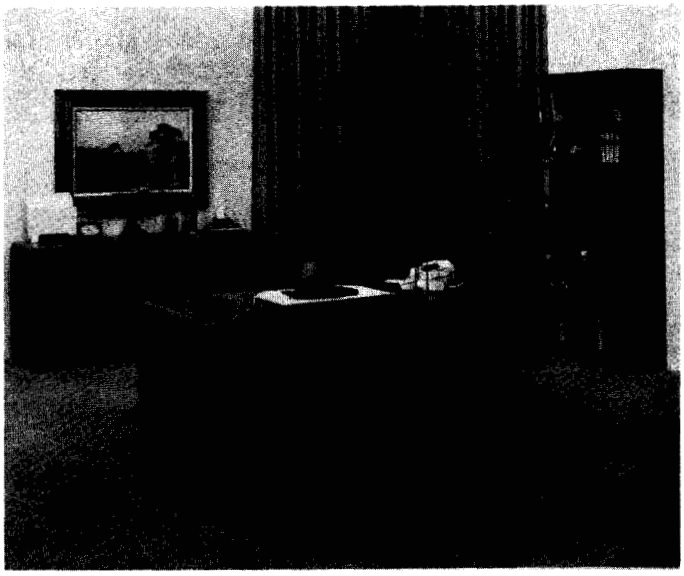
PFI, Incorporated

Office Furniture Manufactured in Springdale

The Petersons, Ed and Lucy Lee, with their two children Edward and Deborah moved to Springdale in the summer of 1978.

Ed Peterson had been in office supply and furnishings for more than thirty years before deciding to open his own manufacturing plant in Springdale.



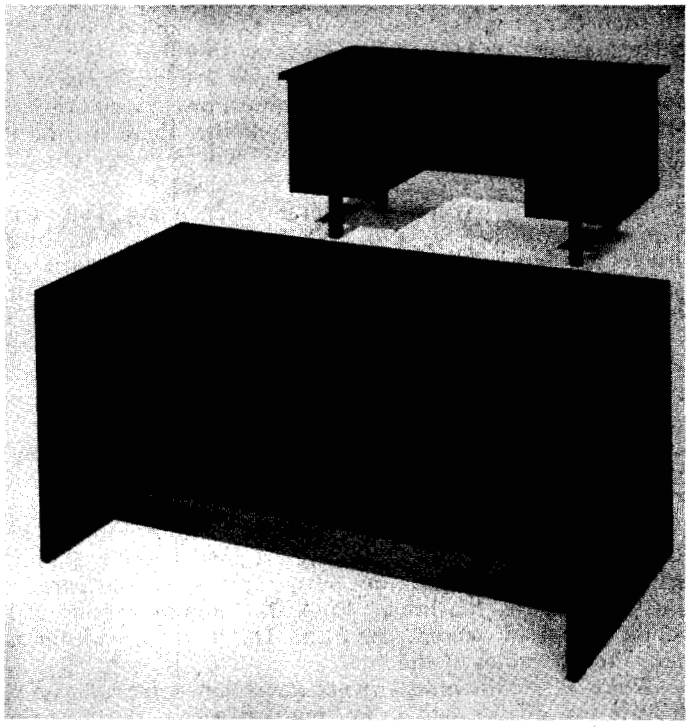
Sliding door credenza, executive conference desk and bookcase.

Bookcases

Peterson brought with him the experience that came from selling, sales management and administration with well-known companies like Samsonite, Denver; United Chair, Birmingham, Alabama; Hon Industries of Muscotine, Iowa and Fort Smith Table of Arkansas.

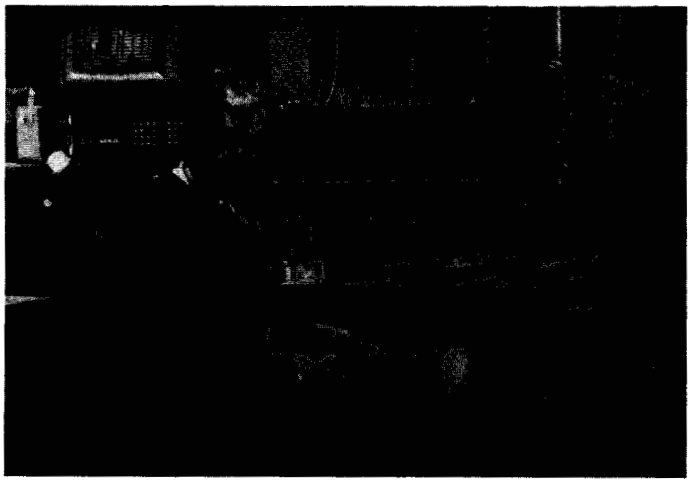
The Petersons were not strangers to the area since Lucy Lee was born in Fort Smith and had graduated from the University of Arkansas, and Ed spent a great many years in Fort Smith too. His desire, in his words, were "to do what I want to do—where I want to be."

PFI Inc., became a reality in 1978 when ground was broken at the location at 801 North Jefferson in Springdale. The work of course had begun much sooner. Peterson had worked with the Arkansas Industrial Development Commission, local banks, Lee Zachary and the Springdale Chamber of Commerce, the trucking industry (a vital part of his business) and, in fact, Peterson had an order for seven truck loads before the plant ever opened.



Desks

That first year, the ten acres Peterson had purchased had 20,000 square feet of buildings and office space constructed and employed 13 people. By 1981, it had doubled in size and by 1985 another 20,000 square feet were added to bring it to today's total of 60,000 square feet with employees numbering, at present, 75.



Ed Peterson, 1987.

By 1987, the success of his venture proved the need for an additional assembly plant in Marshall, Arkansas. This plant is 50,000 square feet in size and employs 35. It is managed by Tim Stephens.

Furniture parts sold are made and assembled on premise at the Jefferson Street location with the use of the most sophisticated tools and computerized machinery available today. This equipment is quite specialized and isn't made in the United States.

PFI manufactures and sells to wholesalers, distributors and dealers throughout the United States. In 1986, a private label program was instituted manufacturing furniture for hospitals and nursing homes.

PFI's staff includes: Henry Runkles, vice-president, operations; Jim Whittle, vice-president, production; Jim Woody, vice-president, sales; Lucy Lee Peterson, secretary of the corporation; Shirley Harriman, office manager; Valerie Matthews, credit manager; and Ed Peterson, chief executive officer.

The traditional and contemporary furniture made at PFI includes: Wall Units, Vertical Files, Secretarial and Executive Desks, Computer Tables, Occasional Tables, Utility Tables, Typing Stands, Credenzas, and Bookcases, to mention a few.

Available in Valencia Oak, walnut, white oak and mercury grey, these pieces are finished with laminated surfaces combined with hardwood trim. All drawers made by the company have lifetime guaranteed slides and brass pulls (those made with pulls).

The style and designs run from the budget conscious to the top of the line in office furnishings and from the most modern contemporary to the most basic traditional. All furnishings are made with the same care and precision using the same exacting machinery.

Computer use is not limited to PFI's plant. The office staff, as well, exhibits monitors, printers and keyboards throughout the area to take care of everything from payroll to production and purchasing and scheduling to inventory control.

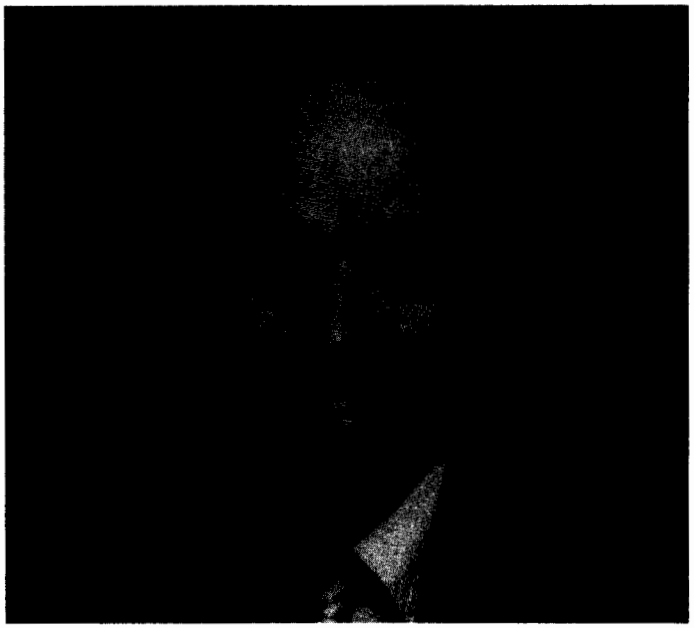
Plans are presently underway to acquire other related companies and facilities to "fill up" the acreage still available at the Jefferson Street location, and there seems to be an ever growing need for jobs in the area as the population continues to relocate to northwest Arkansas.

Peterson has served on the boards for the Chamber of Commerce, The United Fund, the Private Industry Council and has chaired the Local Employee Advisory Council. He is a Shriner, and a member of the Sportsters Go-Cart Patrol.

He and Lucy are both active in church work at St. Thomas Episcopal Church, and Peterson is a former Vestry Member.

Pat Henry Leads Growing Dealership

Pat Henry's Chevrolet-Oldsmobile dealership is located on Highway 71B North. It was built in 1965, but its first location was on East Emma Avenue in Springdale (where the San Jose Manor presently stands), owned at that time by Ralph Late.



Pat Henry

Earlene (Brown) Henry

The present dealership fills an entire block and a half. It includes a car lot for new cars and trucks, a used car lot, a large showroom, sales offices, executive offices, parts department and servicing and repair areas for all new and used cars and trucks sold.

Pat Henry, owner and operator, was born in Conway, Arkansas, son of Wendell and Anna Henry. He graduated from Conway High School in 1944. After high school, he attended Hendrix College where his major was pre-med. Upon graduating from Hendrix, Pat taught science at Fordyce, Arkansas and coached junior high football and basketball there for two years.

Henry met Earlene Brown while at Hendrix. They were married after she received her degree from the University of Arkansas, and they started their married lives together in Springdale.

Henry went to work for his father-in-law, Jeff D. Brown, and learned the poultry business. No job proved too small for Henry, and his first jobs with the company included catching chickens, blood testing the hens, calling on farmers and establishing a live haul division for the company.

After learning the poultry business, he became an executive in the company, working with the Jeff Brown firm for more than 19 years.

This association resulted in his serving on all the local poultry festival boards and as director of the Arkansas Poultry Federation. He also served as president of the Arkansas Feed Manufacturing Association. (See related Heritage Profile of Jeff D. Brown Company, Inc. in this book).

It was while working for Brown that Henry first gained experience and developed his interest in buying and selling cars and trucks. Henry purchased both company cars and company trucks for Jeff Brown Company and installed a company garage to service the fleet.

In 1970, after Jeff D. Brown, Inc. was sold, Henry considered real estate, insurance and other career changes, but it was his interest in buying and selling cars that made him contact Ralph Late and his wife who were selling their Chevrolet-Oldsmobile dealership. Ralph pointed out that he would be unable to buy the dealership without any experience.

Pat Henry and Jim Woodruff, who had been a dealer in Mississippi, purchased the dealership from the Lates, and Henry worked with Woodruff until he became fully experienced and could assume full dealership responsibility. After three years Woodruff returned to Leland, Mississippi where he opened his own automobile dealership.

Only two cars were parked on the lot at the time of Henry's purchase, because General Motors, in the throes of a nation-wide strike, had been negotiating an agreement that had not yet been signed.

December 15, 1970, Henry and Woodruff became Springdale's Chevrolet-Oldsmobile dealers, and by the middle of January, 1971, a grand opening was publicized and well-received by the public and potential customers.

General Motors had made the distribution of new cars and trucks to Henry a priority, as they still do for new dealers, and Henry was able to show more than the two cars he started with.

Despite the ups and downs in the economy, Henry's very first month as owner and operator of the dealership put him in the black, and the year 1973 was a banner year for sales (despite the oil embargo).

In 1981, after a 24 month recession ended in northwest Arkansas, the economy finally recovered from prolonged inflation. New company records were set in 1986 and 1987.

Henry leased the land on Highway 71B North in those first years, but expansion of the business, addition of a new body shop, and used car lot made him aware of the need of purchasing the adjacent property. He and Earlene bought the dealership property in 1976, and the adjacent land for a used car lot in 1979 from the Joe Steele estate.

Henry's business has seen many changes, some through less than pleasant circumstances. Twice, the business has been remodeled because of fire. The first fire occurred in February of 1971, shortly after Henry bought the business. The fire was the result of a frustrated burglary attempt. A burglar, unable to open the safe, emptied wastebaskets and started a fire that gutted the offices making it necessary to remodel the entire office and showroom.

There were seven cars in the showroom at the time. Luckily, a policeman passing by saw the smoke, phoned the fire department and contacted Henry. Quick action resulted in the preservation of all seven cars.

A second fire in 1985 resulted in a loss of $140,000, mostly in the service and parts department. This time three vehicles were also lost. Fortunately, no one was hurt in either blaze.

Two of Henry's employees, Eddie Morris and Ernest Reynolds, worked for the previous dealer. Eddie Morris is the new car "get ready" manager and the employee with the most seniority. Ernest Reynolds has been the service manager for 17 years.

Wayne Warntjes has been Henry's general manager and sales manager for three years. Ken Brewer has been parts manager for six years, and James Millsap has been the manager for the used car operation for four years. Patricia McKeown has been office business manager for six years, and Darrell Allred established the finance department in 1986.

At the present time (1988), Henry has 35 employees. This is an almost 100 percent increase since the dealership was purchased in 1970.

Pat Henry Chevy-Olds Team (L to R): Pat Henry, President, owner, 18 years; Wayne Warntjes, Executive VP, 3 years; Pat McKeown, Business Manager, 6 years; James Millsap, Used Car Manager, 6 years; Ernest Reynolds, Service Manager, 18 years; Kenny Brewer, Parts Manager, 8 years; and Darrell E. Allred, F & I Manager, 3 years.

Although Henry's wife, Earlene, worked in the dealership office in the early days, she opted to stay home and raise their four daughters: Wendy Anne Fenn, an IBM Systems engineer for four years; Ginger Sue Geyer, who assists the Dallas Museum's curator in her position as special projects manager; Linda Dickinson, a teacher; and Holly Jan Maxwell, a teacher and aerobics instructor. The girls have made the Henrys grandparents nine times with another baby due this coming fall.

Pat Henry looks back on his twelve hour days (in the beginning) and enjoys more leisure these days.

"With good people in top management, the business no longer requires 12-hour days," Henry said.

Part of Pat Henry's time is taken up with board positions related to his profession. As one of four vice-presidents for the Arkansas Auto Dealers Association and chief executive officer of the American Western Life Insurance Co. (owned by the Arkansas Auto Dealers Association), and his participation on the Springdale Civil Service Commission (recently completed two years as secretary), Henry still has a full day.

Over the years, Henry was an active participant in Chamber of Commerce projects and served as their president in 1967. Henry has served as chairman of the United Fund Drive and as president of United Fund and the Kiwanis Club. Henry was made a lifetime member of the Springdale Kiwanis Club in 1988.

He received the Springdale Jaycees Distinguished Service Award in 1954 and was named Boss of the Year ten years later by the same organization. The most recent award given him by the Chamber of Commerce was a 1987 Outstanding Civic Service Award. A banquet was held to mark the 65th annual meeting and Walter Turnbow, the previous year's winner, presented the prestigious award to Henry.

Both he and Earlene have been active members and participants in the United Methodist Church, Springdale. He has served as chairman of the official board, chairman of the building and finance committee and served four years on the Fayetteville District Finance and World Service Board.

Traveling has been a rewarding part of owning a GM dealership. Many trips have been sponsored and awarded the Henrys through GM sales contests. Some trips they've won took them to Europe, China, the Greek Islands, Australia, Japan, Hong Kong and Thailand.

Henry sees future dealerships changing somewhat. "The trends are already beginning, movements afoot to sell stock, making it available to the public, rather than the privately owned dealerships we've experienced in the past," Henry said.

The other change Henry mentioned was fleet sales. "Companies that buy cars or trucks in fleets of 100 or more are on the increase. More than half the sales will be due to fleet sales in the very near future. The other ever-increasing trend is more and more cars being leased. Foreign built car sales are increasing each year and are being sold under the "Big Three" nameplates, as well.

Earlene Henry said of her husband: "Pat has always worked hard. He worked his way through college as an usher in a theater and worked in a supermarket for four years. He has always been, above all, a family man who puts his wife and family first."

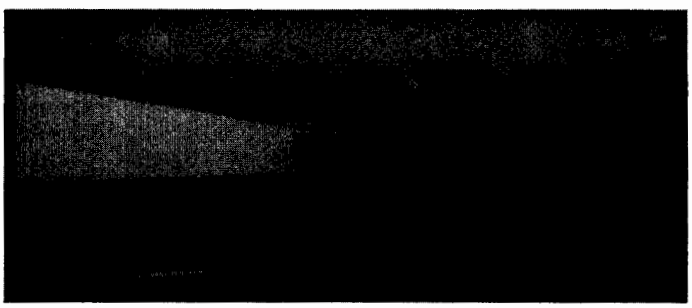
Henry, himself, is reluctant to speak of tributes paid him over the years or of his business success. He underplays his contribution to the community but is quick to point out his wife's, daughters' and grandchildren's achievements.

"There have been many changes over the past 18 years with families as well as with cars and trucks. We can expect a tremendous number of changes in the future as well. They have a word for it—progress," Henry said.

Printing Prospects Look Bright for Phillips Litho Company, Inc.

On May 13, 1973, Phil Phillips, Jr., purchased the commercial print department of the Springdale News located in Springdale, Arkansas. At that time the entire operation consisted of the art department, bindery, a linotype and three small presses. The first building was 5,000 square feet. There were seven employees. The company has now expanded to 42,500 square feet with 75 professional employees. Of the seven original employees, three have remained with Phillips: Kathy Poore, Robert Hoyt and Richard Heefner. At that time the "Rodeo of the Ozarks" program was our largest job with 2,000 copies collated and inserted by hand.

Phillips Litho expanded their company in 1975 at its location (807 South Old Missouri Road) in Springdale.



This 1988 expansion boosted square footage for Phillips Litho to over 42,500 square feet.

Over the years many different types of equipment have been added. The old Linotype was replaced with the Compugraphic MCS, a computerized typesetting system which allows for many photo direct typefaces with type sizes ranging from a 5-point to a 36-point, disc storage and editing capabilities. The small press department consists of several high quality, fast production type duplicators. The bulk of the flat sheet printing is done on Heidelberg Off-Set presses that, along with quality workmanship, guarantees a high caliber of printing, not found with other models.

The bindery department is one of the largest in Arkansas. It includes folding, trimming, perforating, die-cutting, collating, stitching and other finishing touches. Two computerized Polar Cutters speed the trimming process, the Muller-Martini Collator-Stitcher-Trimmer puts a book together, staples the spine and trims the edges all in one operation, finishing 12,000 books in one hour. The In-line Perfect Binder will collate, glue the spine, trim, count and stack the finished product for boxing. With the acquisition of the afore-mentioned bindery equipment Phillips Litho has become a trade bindery utilized by many area printing companies.

In 1984 Phillips Litho acquired roll label printing, which will print self-adhesive labels. Two roll label presses can produce many different shapes and sizes of labels designed to customer specification. Quantities of millions can be printed for producers of re-sale merchandise.

While the primary printing of the original company was on a flat sheet-fed basis, the new Web press, added in 1987 involves a roll-fed paper method and is used in the printing of newspapers, flyers, inserts, telephone directories and certain types of books.

The Composition Department specializes in design, illustration, calligraphy, and film assembly. Talent, experience and modern technology turn the customers' ideas and concepts into the printed image. The NuArc SST Camera reduces down to 20% and enlarges up to 300%, and the Dupont 26C film processor insures fast, consistent negatives for accurate reproduction of the image to be printed. Our Fuji color-art machine allows us to show a process color proof before going to press.

One unique service provided by Phillips Litho is warehousing. Customers who use large quantities of printed materials can request storage and shipping to any designated point. Current computerized inventory is provided as needed.

In 1979 a Quick-Print copy shop was opened on Emma Avenue to accommodate customers who needed one-color business cards, envelopes, letterheads, business forms and flyers. Printing was done with camera-ready copy and had a 24 hour turnaround time. With the latest expansion this division has moved to the parent plant and is part of the small press division.

The economy of northwest Arkansas has allowed the company to become a major printing service for the four state area. An excellent business climate and a dedicated work force have permitted the large growth of the company, and future prospects look bright.

Photo Center

One-Hour Quality Photos A Springdale Reality

Photo Center, Inc., was the start of the American dream for its co-founder and president, Stan Bedford. It has grown from one small retail store in Springdale, to a corporation with three northwest Arkansas stores with plans to expand.

In 1974 when the Bedfords purchased Photo Center at 210 West Emma, Springdale, the store consisted of 500 square feet. That first year's sales volume grossed $30,000. In 1987, sales approached $2,000,000.

Fort Smith and Rogers stores were added to the corporation in 1979 bringing Photo Center from the smallest privately owned camera store in Arkansas to one of the largest photo-video retail stores in the state.

Stan Bedford's dream hadn't fully formed when he was in college at Hardin-Simmons University in Abilene, Texas. He didn't know that he would marry his wife, Tonya Irion, follow his brother, Jack Bedford, into a wholesale business and, from there, start a related retail business.

Jack Bedford moved to Fayetteville in 1970, from Texas, and opened Color Mate Photo, a wholesale film-processing lab. Stan came to Fayetteville in 1973.

After researching the northwest Arkansas area and seeing the same tremendous potential for growth that other industry had seen, Bedford's dream for himself and his family's future took hold. He saw the need for a retail store that would combine sales and service for the family photographer, the amateur and the professional.

"I guess the key-word for what I wanted to do was 'personalize'. I wanted to offer specialized and individual attention and service to the customer who purchased cameras and equipment. Unlike mass merchandisers, I placed emphasis on 'detail'. . . taking a personal interest in each individual customer, knowing my customer by name, addressing individual need, nurturing a permanent customer," Bedford continued.

These same customers returned to purchase film and accessories for their cameras, and have their film processed. Until the early 1970s when the Bedfords came to northwest Arkansas, a roll of film would take between one and two weeks to be developed. One-day service was quite an achievement.

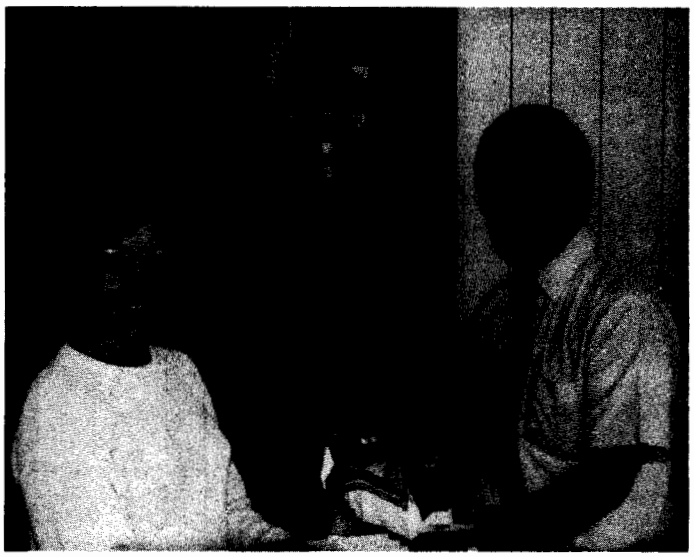
As the Bedford brothers sought more aggressively to serve the customer, one-hour service was made available, making photography more exciting than ever. Bedford credits his brother, Jack, for bringing fast film developing to northwest Arkansas.

According to Stan Bedford, credit for the success of Photo Center is due to many people, including his wife, Tonya and his children, Cari and Jason. "The joy that my family gave me every day was all the motivation I needed," Bedford added.

A good business relationship between brothers is a rarity, but Stan and his brother Jack (Photo Center's vice-president), have made every effort to maintain good personal and business relationships.

"Jack has an unbeatable combination of love of photography, a sharp business mind and the ability for hard work. . .I learned from him," Bedford pointed out.

Attributing Photo Center's success to more than a supportive family, Bedford mentions that a good staff is necessary, stating that managers Steve Elkins (Bedford's nephew), Gary Cox and Jeff Beauchamp, are committed retailers with a clear understanding of what makes a specialty retail operation work.



Stan Bedford's Family, his "motive for success," examine color prints from the processor. (L-R) Tonya, Cari, Jason and Stan.

Bedford gives much of the credit for his company's success to Jeff Beauchamp, Photo Center's executive vice-president. Operating from the Fort Smith office, Beauchamp is largely responsible for the sales volume from the Fort Smith store which generates half the total sales from all three stores.

Much of the Photo Center business comes from commercial accounts and large companies' purchase of photo and video equipment and the servicing of that equipment. "Commercial accounts are a much sought after and vital part of the success of Photo Center," Bedford adds.

In 1977, a unique and innovative service policy was offered by Photo Center and was the brain-child of Stan Bedford. This plan takes total service responsibility for customer equipment purchases for a full five years. The store has several thousand policies in force.

Photo Center, Inc., as a member of an international and industry-wide recognized association called Photo-Marketing Association International, has received certification for four of its employees (from all three locations). They have been designated as certified photographic counselors. This means each employee was tested in the areas of their competency, knowledge and skill in all areas of photography.

In addition, two men are certified photo finishing engineers who have completed rigid testing requirements for film processing and servicing equipment. These certifications help insure the quality for which Photo Center wants to be remembered.

Together with a charter membership in Kodak Color Watch Systems, Bedford feels quality from sales through service and competitive pricing is maintained in all areas.

The Kodak Color Watch Systems is a quality control center based in Rochester, New York, and linked to its membership by a computerized network system that daily monitors the quality of the processed color film. This insures customer satisfaction in the uniformity of the color and clarity of their film in processing.

Bedford's dream has not been fully realized, and plans for expansion are always a possibility. Another store has been proposed and is expected to open before the end of 1988 at a new location.

"My greatest satisfaction has come from watching our growth and meeting the changing needs of my customers. Total computerization of the Photo Center chain allows rapid and controlled growth, providing endless exciting products and services for our customers. The Bedford family recognizes the primary source of Photo Center's success. Jesus Christ provides an abundant life for those who accept Him and are willing to allow His authority in every area of their lives. . .including their business."

Polar Express, Inc.

Trucking Industry A Family Concern

Bill and Louise Ferguson came to northwest Arkansas almost 30 years ago. They moved to the area to start a family trucking business and to raise a family, both of which are thriving today.

Bill Ferguson was born and raised in Gainesville, Georgia. He came from a family of artisans. His family crafted handmade pottery for their livelihood, and it was a good life, but Ferguson, after his discharge from military service, decided to go into business for himself. His choice was the trucking industry, and this choice brought him to Springdale.

In 1959, Ferguson formed Polar Express, Inc., and began the brokered and leased operator business that is still in operation today. Located on Highway 68W, Springdale, Polar Express has continued to grow adding a branch in Ferguson's home town of Gainesville, GA, and plan to add a terminal and dispatch office in Tontitown at the intersection of Highway 412 (68W) and Highway 112.

Hauling freight and commodities involved scheduling loads for pickup and delivery on a load to load basis. Tractors and trailers were leased from independent owner-operators on a permanent basis in the beginning.

In 1980, Polar bought its own trucks and tractors, starting with only five. Today, the fleet has grown to over 100 trucks and the company employs more than 140 people.

While the business was growing, Ferguson's three sons were growing up. As each son, in turn, graduated from Springdale High School, they joined their father and mother in the business.

Ferguson, as president of Polar Express, gives full credit for Polar's success to the work efforts contributed by his wife, Louise, who started in the company with him filling the job of company bookkeeper and growing in the company to her present position as secretary-treasurer of the corporation.

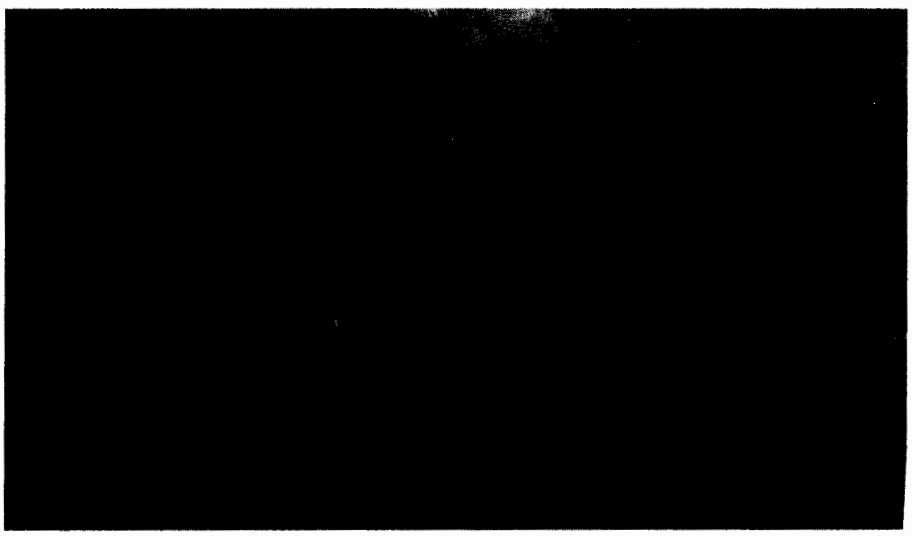
Each son, in turn, upon graduating from Springdale High School came into the company, working their way up into their present positions. All three sons work together successfully. Mike, the oldest son, is general manager and corporate vice-president. Steve is load solicitor (sales), and Kenny is primarily a truck broker. All have learned the business from the ground up.

Their sons have provided the Fergusons with six grandchildren, and both Bill and Louise are safely assured of keeping Polar Express operational as a family-controlled business.

Polar Express mainly transports foodstuffs but hauls some general commodities. Poultry and eggs are two primary products carried by their trucks. Their refrigerated carriers haul produce and merchandise for such familiar national companies as Tyson Foods, Wal-Mart, Campbell's Soup and Anheuser Busch. In fact, according to Ferguson, Polar Express was one of the first companies to haul for Tyson Foods. "We hauled for them when they had only one plant out on Randall Road," Ferguson said.

Because of Springdale's central location to the rest of the continental United States, Polar Express and other northwest Arkansas trucking firms are in a prime location for continued growth potential.

Competition in the trucking industry is fierce, but Polar continues to succeed. In spite of the rising fuel costs, turnover in personnel high insurance increases and deregulation of the trucking industry, Polar remains a viable, growing industry within an industry in an area that has continued to boom.



Putman & Maglothin

"The Law May Not Be Perfect, But It Is Better Than Anything Else Anybody Has Ever Come Up With"

The southside of the Fayetteville Square includes a heritage of noted trial lawyers, Putman & Maglothin Law Offices. The lineage stretches back a long while through a series of some of the best lawyers this area has ever offered.

It began with Rex Perkins, said by many to be the best criminal lawyer in this part of the country, until he was perhaps surpassed by the next of whom they said the same, William B. Putnam, III. When one spoke of defense attorneys who gave their clients the bet, both were considered the men to know in northwest Arkansas.

There remains such a strong influence of Perkins in the Washington County System of Justice that his name still rings in the corridors of the courthouse. Perkins' bequest to many was nothing less than supreme competence, but most of all it was to William B. Putman, III, and he took it up. When Putman died, Judge Thomas F. Butt said, "I suspect we think of him most as the finished lawyer; the complete advocate. His conduct of a case was a joy to behold."

Now there is E. E. "Scotty" Maglothin, Jr., who may or may not be the best criminal lawyer in these parts. But if he isn't, he has at least had the benefit of counsel from those kinds of giants in the courtroom.

Early in his life, Putman had no interest in the law. Rather, after having served combat duty in World War II, in Europe, he returned home and became a language expert in both German and Spanish. His expertise in Spanish took him to South America with an oil company, but this life had nothing to offer him.

Putman once again returned to his hometown and became intrigued with the law. He attended law school and graduated from the University of Arkansas (U of A) with honors. Thereafter, he joined in practice with his stepfather, Price Dickson, in Fayetteville, Arkansas, and became the great attorney people of this area remember with respect and admiration.

Putman achieved high honors in the profession of law. He was an editor of the Arkansas Law Review, a United States Commissioner, Lecturer on law at the University of Arkansas, Board of Election Commissioners, Arkansas Board of law Examiners, Arkansas Supreme Court Committee on Jury Instructions, Special Justice of the Supreme Court of Arkansas and a member of The American College of Trial Lawyers.

In the course of events, or fate, Putman visited the house where he had lived while growing up in Fayetteville and there met a young lawyer who had just begun his struggle to join the legal community. The young lawyer's name was Ezra E. Maglothin, Jr. Over some period of time these two men came to know and respect one another and eventually Ezra (better known as "Scotty") became the partner of William B. Putman, whom he knew as "Billy Ben" as did all his other friends. So this man of whom we speak now and who is the living embodiment of these others is Scotty Maglothin.

Maglothin, like Putman, had no interest in the law at the time he left Truman, Arkansas. After attending Harding College and Arkansas State University, he received his B. A. in political science from the U of A, Fayetteville. Following a sequence of job interviews wherein political science was not a major interest of employers, Maglothin was directed toward completing his education in law and received his juris doctorate in 1978.

Experience being the best teacher, Maglothin was given the opportunity to learn from the best when he became an associate for the Law Firm of Putman, Gallman & Dickson. He had acquired valuable practice while a deputy prosecutor for the Fourth Judicial District and now it was time to round out his personality under the supervision of William B. Putman III.

Mentor and student soon formed Putman & Maglothin Law Offices. The firm's practice is litigation both criminal and civil.

In the all too short time these two men knew each other before Putman's death in 1984, Billy Ben passed on to his young friend the wealth of his knowledge of people and their interaction with the law. As Scotty has said many times to associates or law clerks awed by a certain courtroom practice, Hardly any courtroom techniques are invented by the lawyer, they are taught to you by other lawyers and adapted to your own style. That one was taught to me by Putman and to him by Perkins."

"The beauty of this whole system is Rex and Billy Ben knew it as I know it; the one guy teaches the next. Which means that nowhere is there any better system of justice than in this country. It may not be perfect but it is better than anything else anybody has ever come up with."

Rodeo of the Ozarks

Roping, Riding and Rodeo-ing Ozark Style

The first rodeo held in Springdale, pre-Rodeo of the Ozarks, began during the Second World War. Springdale was just a small town of 3,000 at that time, and with the war going on, recreational facilities in the area were limited.

Many of Springdale's young men were away either in the European Theater or the Pacific Theater "at war". Rationing of gas and tires allowed a minimum of travel by car. Cars weren't even being produced with automobile factories being converted to the manufacture of airplanes, jeeps, tanks and maintenance parts.

It was a time when the American people were nostalgic about horse and buggy days forgetting the pioneer hardships that accompanied those times. The war casualty lists and news reports were a daily routine that made those early days seem happier, more exciting, more American, somehow.

Based on this premise, the roping and riding days of the "Old West" held a strong appeal for men like Walter Watkins, at that time president of Welch's, Springdale; and Shorty Parsons, Springdale cattleman and rancher at that time, Paul Bond, a part time cowboy, bareback rider and rodeo producer, and T. W. Kelly, a small rodeo producer. Others first involved with that original rodeo include: Dempsey Letsch, Claude Harp and Ivan Perry.

The lots backing the old Farmers Livestock Auction (still standing) were used as the first rodeo grounds. Dittman Mitchell was asked to be the first rodeo announcer for the big show.

Sandy Boone remembers going out with Shorty Parsons in a pickup truck to round up telephone poles to make the chutes. They not only gathered poles but built the chutes.

The box office receipts didn't cover expenses that year, but Walter Watkins and Bob Sharp were convinced the rodeo would succeed as a community project in which every business could be involved. He engaged the help of Shorty Parsons and others and all worked together to help make it an annual event.

The lucky spectators that first year were the ones who took their own folding chairs. The bleachers collapsed, and 300 people were injured and taken to area hospitals, although none were seriously injured.

The rodeo name chosen for the annual event was Rodeo of the Ozarks It was agreed that rodeo days would be July 1, 2, 3 and 4 each year just as it had been that first year.

After joining the Rodeo Cowboys Association (RCA), help was available in regard to rules, regulations, organization and membership to call upon for gaining help with promotion.

One of the biggest promoters of the rodeo, in the beginning, was Don Hoyt who has headed both Rogers Chamber of Commerce and Springdale's Chamber of Commerce. He obtained news coverage in the Little Rock papers to promote the Springdale rodeo on a year-around basis. It has been said: "If there hadn't been any news to promote—he'd have made it himself or hired someone to create a scandal just to get Springdale in the papers."

The Chamber of Commerce recognized the importance of being a part of promoting such a venture, but could ill afford to take on the entire sponsorship at the time.

Parsons agreed to borrow $28,000.00 from Shelby Ford, president of First State Bank at that time. The money was used to build a permanent (non-collapsible) grandstand to hold 5,500 people.

More than $12,500.00 was raised by subscription for parade prizes. Prize money, in the beginning, was set at only $2,000.00. Governor Ben Laney was invited to attend, and Bryan Work and Bob Sharp handled ticket sales, selling so many tickets that the rodeo continued for 16 years before exceeding that second year's sales effort.

By now everyone could see the potential for spreading good will (and making money from all the rodeo-ers and spectators coming in each year), and a committee of Bob Sharp, Luther Johnson, Howard Ewalt and Fay Stafford (all well-known business men) was appointed to see that a permanent organization be formed to perpetuate or exceed that year's good fortune.

This was when the Springdale Benevolent Amusement Association was formed. This non-profit organization was formed with Harvey Jones as president that first year. Shares were sold at $25 a share. The following year John Tyson filled the office of president. After that, Shorty Parsons held the presidency until his death in 1988. Mace Howell served as treasurer (upon Shelby Ford's recommendation) after that first year until 1988.

Active participation by many community business men was an ongoing supportive part of creating a successful rodeo. In addition to those already mentioned: Carl Head, Otis Cardwell, Jerry Hinshaw, Slim Bayley, U. A. Lovell, Wayne High, Joe McKim, Cecil Brown, Charles Tansey, Roscoe Cuen, Bob Sanders, Wayne Hyden, Phil Phillips, Sr., Phil Phillips, Jr., Gene Thompson, James Littrell, Stanley Applegate, Austin Cravens, Roger Edmondson, Cecil Phillips, Dusty Richards, Johnny Gladden, Mike Tatman, Jim Fuller, Don Harp, Tex Holt, Harold Sargent, Roy Bowman, Jim Rollins, Lloyd Johnson. Mace Howell and Sandy Boone, after 40 years, were made honorary members.

The property for the rodeo grounds was purchased from Shorty Parsons, and when the arena (as it presently stands) was built, it was dedicated and named in his honor.

Those first rodeos were heralded by an advance caravan that would leave each morning for three days in June. Business men would donate their time to go along and help promote the Rodeo of the Ozarks. Western Wear sales flourished. Horses and buggies would make their way to the border towns of Oklahoma, Missouri and Arkansas for this annual promotion.

The caravan would return to Springdale each night for the travelers to catch some sleep before starting out again the following day. Speeches were delivered, live music and entertainment such as Doc Boone's Skunk Holler Band would draw viewers to the sound of music.

The time given by those involved in the rodeo's promotion and success is even more amazing when you take into account the opposition it first met during the organization of the first one. The townspeople weren't enthusiastic, the elements even seemed to conspire against them with unseasonable rain, and the bleachers didn't hold up. Nothing seemed to dampen the backers' enthusiasm.

That ill-fated first attempt at producing a Springdale Rodeo was the impetus for Rodeo of the Ozarks, a rodeo known and respected all over the United States.

From the hand-rigged chutes made by Shorty Parsons and Sandy Boone to the all-steel holding pens now used, from wood bleachers that gave way under the weight of its burden to the steel underframed bleachers that now hold 13,000 spectators, changes continue to come.

Original Rodeo Arena - wagon left foreground with children has been in every rodeo from the first year. (1944)

That first rodeo endeavor didn't even offer a purse; ribbons were awarded. The following year, the purse was determined by box office receipts. The purse is now set by the committee and is known each year in advance.

Some constants have remained, however. Residents look forward to the rodeo parades held on July 1st and 4th. They still line both sides of Emma Avenue to watch it.

Two weeks preceding the rodeo, Shiloh Square is turned into Stagecoach Inn with children receiving free rides on the horse-pulled stagecoach.

For those two weeks, Shiloh Square is a-bustle with business men and families lining up to eat fried chicken lunches served Monday through Friday by Tyson's Chicken Kitchen. The Chamber of Commerce, under Lee Zachary's leadership, has continued to promote and sponsor this annual gathering which offers live entertainment on stage. Contests are held, daily, for the best-dressed western and frontier costumes worn by men, women and children and prizes awarded. All of this is overseen by Lee and the present Chamber of Commerce.

Many Springdale businesses join in the festive rodeo atmosphere by encouraging employees to wear western clothes during rodeo week. Most Springdale residents agree that the rodeo does a lot of good for the town. Open opposition is rare. The fact that it remains successful year after year is not overlooked.

Some of the rodeo box office receipts return to the city in the form of building construction such as the present Springdale Chamber of Commerce Building, the Community Center across from the rodeo grounds and, of course, the continued maintenance and yearly improvements on the rodeo ground.

For years carnival was an added rodeo attraction for the younger set (some oldsters too) each year, and lights enable rodeo fans, who can't take all that Arkansas sunshine, to enjoy watching evening competition events when it's cooler.

Clowns and animal acts are a part of each performance as well as the traditional riding, roping and barrel racing. The attraction of bareback riders is still as strong as ever, and bull riding brings the same cheers today that it did over 40 years ago.

The contestants have changed from those first years. The cowboys and cowgirls entering in competition those first years were more likely to be from the tri-state area (Missouri, Oklahoma and Arkansas) and to attend all four days in the competition. It is a more professional group competing now, more specialized. An entrant is more likely to be entered in only one or two events coming on the same day and leaving that night from Springdale Airport in his or her own private plane.

Before rodeo-ing became such big business, the cowboys and cowgirls used to look forward to an evening meal out at Shorty Parsons' place where his wife, Inez, always had platters filled with fried chicken (and bologna sandwiches), pots of brown beans and strawberry shortcake waiting for the contestants.

Pat Parsons Hutter, Shorty and Inez's daughter is carrying on the family tradition as director of the Miss Rodeo Arkansas Pageant. Pat, was known as a pretty good barrel racer back in the early 1950's and won a few ribbons herself. She is also a member of the National Women's Barrel Racers Association.

This year's (1988) Miss Rodeo Arkansas, Gina Sargent, will be Arkansas' representative at the Miss Rodeo America Pageant.

The Rodeo of the Ozarks is seen by more than 35,000 spectators each year. Revenues in and around the county from visitors generate more than a million dollars in sales for local merchants. Rodeo planning never ends from one year to the next.

As Rodeo of the Ozarks continues to build a following and remains on a level with other similar national rodeos, purse monies increase. More than 400 contestants pay entry fees to be allowed to compete.

The residents of Springdale celebrated the end of World War II as the war to end all wars, but there is no end in sight for the Rodeo of the Ozarks. The annual celebration goes on commemorating Independence Day and a return to an "Old West" that, perhaps, never was, but one that, since improved upon, may prove to be more lasting.

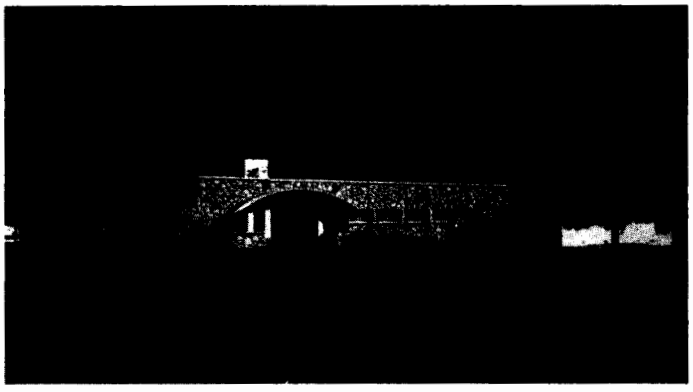
Schmieding Produce Company, Inc.

Putting food on the family table has always been a vital activity for the survival of every nation of the world. No country has produced and fed its people better than the United States.

The Schmieding brothers of Springdale, Arkansas have played, and continue to play, an important role in helping bring this nation's essential crops to America's marketplace and ultimately to the family table.

At the same time, the Schmiedings and their employees have helped develop modern shipping and packing techniques necessary to the growth of the food distribution industry.

Despite its quiet, low-profile style of business, the impact of the H. C. Schmieding Produce Company operations today extend far beyond the borders of Arkansas and benefit many thousands of people.



Schmieding Produce Company, Inc.

Quality Arkansas dairy cattle, at a low price, first drew August Schmieding and two of his sons, Herbert and Hubert from their Lincoln, Nebraska dairy farm on buying trips to northwest Arkansas in the 1930s.

"Dad and I came to Arkansas to buy Jersey cows at $10.00 a head to take back to our Nebraska farm," Hubert recalled.

These cattle buying trips soon evolved into buying, selling and transporting various fruits and vegetables. To the north and west were markets for Arkansas' abundant produce, while on the return trip, Colorado peaches, and Nebraska apples and potatoes were ideal for the Little Rock market.

The Schmieding family, August Schmieding, wife, Martha Schmieding and five sons had, for many years, a successful dairy operation in Lincoln. But, their early trips to growing northwest Arkansas sparked Herbert and Hubert to see the need and opportunities in farm produce. So, in 1936, the brothers moved to Springdale and established their new produce company.

The brothers, identical twins, started their business in a home at 526 Spring Street. The back bedroom served as the company's office. Hubert married Beulah Irene Brown in 1938 and Beulah's talents as a bookkeeper were quickly pressed into service.

In 1942, Herbert married Polly Ann Grapes and for a time the two brothers and their wives lived together. A daughter, Patrica, was born to Herbert and Polly in 1944. "Many days you had to walk through hanging diapers to get to the back bedroom and the office," Polly remembered.

Herbert and Polly bought a house at 803 Johnson Street and one of their bedrooms served as an office for the produce company.

Younger brother, Lawrence Schmieding, joined the company in 1947 after a tour of duty with the Air Force.

By the late 1940s the brothers had six or seven trucks and their business was growing. "My brothers and I drove trucks and worked deals all over the country, we were real 'fruit tramps' back in those days," Hubert said.

In a major expansion move in 1948, the brothers acquired the White Truck dealership in Springdale and built a two-story building to house the dealership and their produce company. The building is currently located at Highway 471 and Schmieding Lane and is now Eagle Body Inc. "Our produce business was upstairs and the truck dealership was downstairs," Hubert said.

With their successful produce business and truck dealership, the Schmiedings were helping build modern northwest Arkansas along with some of Washington County's other successful businessmen of the period, Delbert Allen, Harvey Jones, Joe Robinson, Willis Shaw, Joe Steele and others. "Schmieding Brothers worked closely with Allen Canning Company and the Steele Canning Company when they were developing the area's processing and canning industry," Lawrence pointed out.

Patty (Schmieding) Berry works with Lawrence and Hubert Schmieding in the family business.

From the early days of their produce business, the Schmiedings have been very active in buying, transporting and selling peaches, especially Colorado peaches. The company established a seasonal office in Palisade, Colorado in the early 1940s and maintained this office until 1975. Hubert and Beulah would operate the Palisade office during the peach season with the help of Doris Porter. Doris would later move to Springdale to work for the company in developing the company's accounting system. In 1958, she married Lawrence.

In the late 1940s and into the 1950s, the Schmieding business slowly turned more and more to potatoes as its major commodity. "Most other crops are very seasonal, but potatoes are available all year, even in the winter," Gary Owens, executive vice president and general manager of H. C. Schmieding Produce, pointed out. Owens joined the company in 1967. "And," Owens added, "potatoes are a solid, staple crop that is strong even when the economy is down."

In 1954, the White Truck dealership was sold and Schmieding Produce moved to its present location at 1419 S. Thompson. The present Schmieding building has been expanded three times due to the company's growth.

The rising costs of maintaining a truck fleet and deregulation caused the company to merge its trucking operations in February 1971. Carl Richardson, former head of truck procurement for Schmieding, drove for the company for some 22 years and witnessed the rising operating costs. "When I started, you could operate a truck at around 25 to 28 cents a mile, now it runs 90 cents or more," Richardson said.

Today the Schmieding company doesn't own any trucks but, a Schmieding subsidiary, Delp Inc. of Springdale, handles some of the Schmieding hauling needs with other trucking concerns providing the majority of the transportation needs.

Heart of the business at Schmiedings'.

The early 1970s brought continued growth for the company, along with tragedy for the Schmieding family. Beulah Schmieding, who served the firm so well as bookkeeper in the early years, died in June of 1970. The next year was also a difficult one for the Schmieding family, when Herbert died in April and Lawrence's wife, Doris, died the same month.

On a happier note, and in the tradition of a family-run business, Herbert's daughter, Patricia Schmieding Berry, joined the company in 1974.

Despite the loss of family members, Hubert and Lawrence kept the company on a positive course, especially with the large processors.

"Schmieding Produce deals in any fruit or vegetables that a canner would need, but we specialize in potatoes and watermelons," Owens said.

In addition to the canning factories, the company supplies wholesalers, repackers, grocery chains, potato chip and french fry manufacturers.

"We have to meet very high quality standards set by the processors and our other clients, so we establish long-term relationships with growers around the country and have our own field men to insure the quality of produce being delivered by our company, " Owens explained.

Because of the company's expanding list of customers for its potatoes, the firm opened a Loxley, Alabama field office in 1951 to better oversee the summer potato crops coming out of the south. Other Schmieding seasonal offices included Grand Forks, North Dakota; Palatka, Florida; Sand Mountain, Alabama, and Sikeston, Missouri.

Schmieding Produce is one of the few companies that deal in potatoes all year long. The company concentrates on supplying potatoes which are used for all purposes. In the course of a year, the company will handle some 20,000 loads of potatoes which is over nine million pounds of potatoes.

The three Schmieding brothers have guided Schmieding Produce from the wheeling-dealing, 'fruit tramp' days into an aggressive, well-respected firm that operates throughout the nation.

At the heart of the firm's day-to-day operations is a smooth running telecommunications center that is constantly juggling ever-changing customer needs, pricing, produce availability and transportation requirements.

"We move 75 or more loads per day and never see the produce. . .it's all done by telephone. We make and receive some 1,500 phone calls a day," Owens revealed.

"The goals of the company are to serve our customers and growers. We are actually a service company," Lawrence Schmieding pointed out.

In 1987 some 36 full-time employees are involved in the Schmieding company activities. A computer system, added in 1978, aids in the company's tremendous accounting and recording requirements.

"We have always surrounded ourselves with good, hard working people. I contribute part of our success to our employees," Lawrence stressed.

Hubert and Lawrence Schmieding continue to direct the company's growth and continued success into the 1980s.

The modern day H. C. Schmieding Produce Inc. is a tribute to three Nebraska-born brothers who saw the many opportunities available in northwest Arkansas and possessed the foresight and determination to built a successful business. (See H. E. Schmieding cornerstone family story)

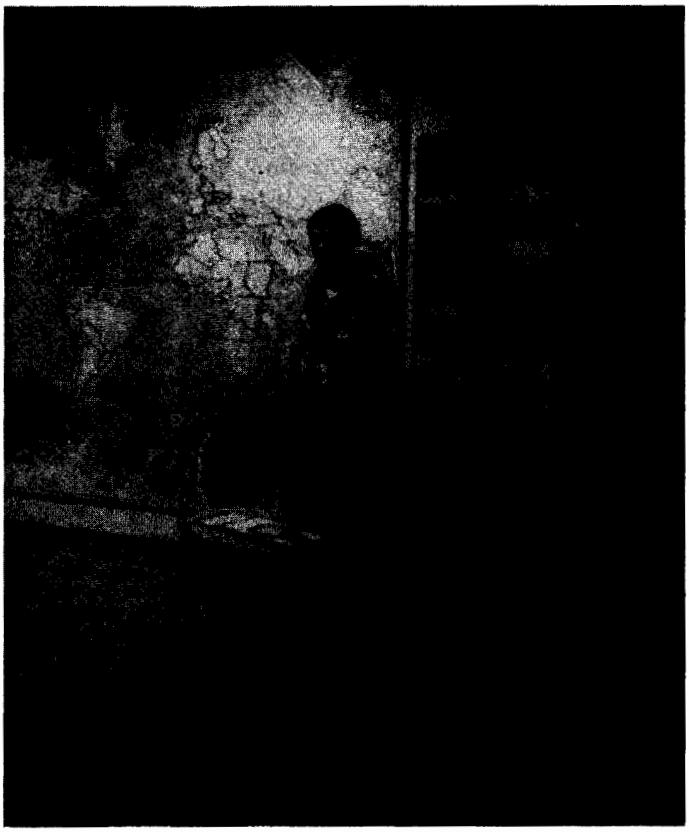
The Shiloh Travel Agency

Travel Experience Shared

When John and Jeanne Justis opened northwest Arkansas's second travel agency, Plaza International Travel, in 1972, they dedicated themselves to making their customers' dream vacations a reality. The Justises operated Plaza International for five years, and then sold it in 1977 to World Wide Travel based in Little Rock. As part of the sale, they continued to manage the agency for another two years.



Original Shiloh Travel

After seeing to the continued success of World Wide Travel, John and Jeanne saw the need for a travel agency in Springdale. So in July 1979, they opened Springdale's first travel agency, Shiloh Travel, in the Boone-Ritter Insurance Building at 109 N. Spring. The business remained at that location for just over a year, and in September 1980, the Justises purchased a building at 1004 W. Sunset, and Shiloh moved to that location where it continues to operate today.

For the successful operation of any personal service business, such as a travel agency, tailoring the product for the customer's individual needs is vitally important. And, this is exactly what the Justises have strived to do during the last 14 years, and will continue to do.

"A beautiful trip lasts forever. You buy a memory that lasts a whole lifetime," John Justis said. "We give the customer what is most valuable to him or her," Justis continued, "The first object is to give them their money's worth. To accomplish this requires detailed experience with all aspects of the travel business."

After working in the travel and airline industry for 13 years in the crowded and pressurized environment of southern California, the Justises decided in 1972 to return to the place of their roots in the Ozarks and northwest Arkansas to share travel experiences with local residents. The slogan of their first agency was " Jeanne comes home to share her experience."

The Justises met in 1956 while both were working for Ozark Airlines in Springfield, Illinois. Jeanne Hudson Justis, whose family are long standing residents of West Fork and Greenland communities, had gone through training in an airline academy in Kansas City before gaining employment with Ozark Airlines from 1956 to 1959. John, originally from Springfield, MO, and Jeanne both had duties with the airline that encompassed handling baggage, cleaning the aircraft interior, making reservations, ticketing, communications and everything short of a plane's mechanical maintenance.

Then in 1959 they both were given the opportunity to move up in jobs with Continental Airlines and American Airlines in California. Jeanne worked for Continental in its first reservation office in Los Angeles. John worked for American as a ticket agent and quickly progressed to station manager—a position requiring the management of the airline's airport operations and a job with Pacific Airlines. In 1964, John was chosen to inaugurate Pacific's service to the tourist haven of South Shore Lake, Tahoe.

By 1971-1972, John and Jeanne decided they had remained long enough in the helter-skelter environment of Los Angeles, and they saw the wide-open opportunity available to them for their own travel agency serving northwest Arkansas.

When the Justises returned in 1972 to Fayetteville, they knew the area was relatively hidden from the awareness of major travel businesses and would present an exciting challenge to their considerable abilities acquired over the past two decades. For instance, it was not common for folks from this area to embark on a world cruise booked by a local travel agent. Literally building their first office from the ground up in the newly built Northwest Arkansas mall, the Justises began a rewarding and pleasurable life's work.

"The first time I set up a world cruise, the cruise company I called thought I was putting them on, especially from a travel agency in Fayetteville, Arkansas," John reminisced.

"Because we could communicate with people in touch with the world," said Justis, "and because we had an intimate knowledge of the trade language, we could judge when something wasn't quite right, even if it appeared right. This was a key factor in helping overcome travel problems from this area."

Based on the depth of their experience and knowledge in travel and tourism—"the world wasn't a mystery tour"—the business exploded into immediate success. The Justises were able to overcome problems of arranging flights and tour itineraries, and they could steer customers around thorny problems with reservations and bookings. These factors led to a rapid build-up in the agency's clientele.

Beginning Shiloh Travel proved to be no problem for the now well-known couple. Many customers they had served while operating Plaza International and World Wide Travel followed them to their new Springdale business. The satisfaction they derived from customer loyalty lay in their clients' expressions of friendship and knowing that they had done their job well.

Since their return to northwest Arkansas, the Justises have had a profound influence on the growth of the area's travel business.

"Over the years we have trained a number of people who now compete with us," Justis said. "One former employee now owns an agency, and four others manage agencies. We don't feel this is a negative. It is a very positive development for the travel industry in this area."

During the past 15 years in business, the Justises have witnessed a boom in the travel industry. Today there are over 30,000 travel agencies in the U. S., while there were only half that many in 1972. This growth has also affected northwest Arkansas. Since 1972, there has been an 85 percent increase in the number of travel agencies, growing from two agencies to fourteen in the area.

The rapid growth of travel agencies and tour businesses, along with the deregulation of the airlines, greatly increased the complexity of the travel business, Justis said. The result of these developments over the past 10 to 15 years has thrust the travel agency into being the front line selling point in the industry. For example, there are on the average, in the current deregulated environment, 15,000 fare changes daily.

In addition, with all the cut-rate fares and travel itineraries offered to the public, the question of what one is getting for his or her money is often not clear. This has created an exciting challenge for the Justises and other travel agents. It means selling the customer what he or she needs is vastly more important and exacting.

A big help with these problems has been the communications revolution. Back in 1972, travel agencies were wedded to slow teletype machines and the telephone in making reservations and bookings. Today the computer has changed all that. The Justises have virtually instant communications with all major travel companies in the world. They can send and receive messages direct on a world-wide basis, using the American Airlines SABRE system. At times they have used this capability for their customers to send business and personal messages. But even though the computer has given them the capability for speed and quick problem solving, they still rely heavily on the telephone to answer and verify questions.

Increasing complexity in the industry requires constant updating of skills and knowledge. When John and Jeanne first started in business, they could hire an employee who had little or no experience in the business. Today, however, they must hire people who have had previous experience, or who have been trained at a travel agency school. It is vitally important for the travel agent to know how to search the computer for the best deals, and then ferret out the pseudo-bargains from the quality tours. Customer satisfaction and the avoidance of a possible error or omission depends on the skill of the travel agent in these matters.

Hard work has built Shiloh Travel into an agency that gives top-quality custom service to its clientele. Its success speaks volumes about commitment to excellence. Such dedication to helping customers help fulfill lifetime travel dreams. John and Jeanne Justis have played a crucial role in northwest Arkansas business history.

Sisco Clinic Continues Medical Heritage

Thomas Sisco and his family came to Arkansas from Monroe, Tennessee in Overton County. At that time, 1840, he had six children. The oldest two sons were named after a well-known congressman from Tennessee who later became governor, Sam Houston. They thought so much of this folk hero that they named their first son Samuel Sisco and their second son, Houston. Houston would later become a veteran of the Mexican and Civil wars.

Thomas Sisco's wife was Nancy Miller, daughter of Hugh Miller. Both the Sisco and Miller families immigrated to Carroll County, Arkansas at the same time and settled in the valley of the Osage Creek a few miles east of the present town of Osage.

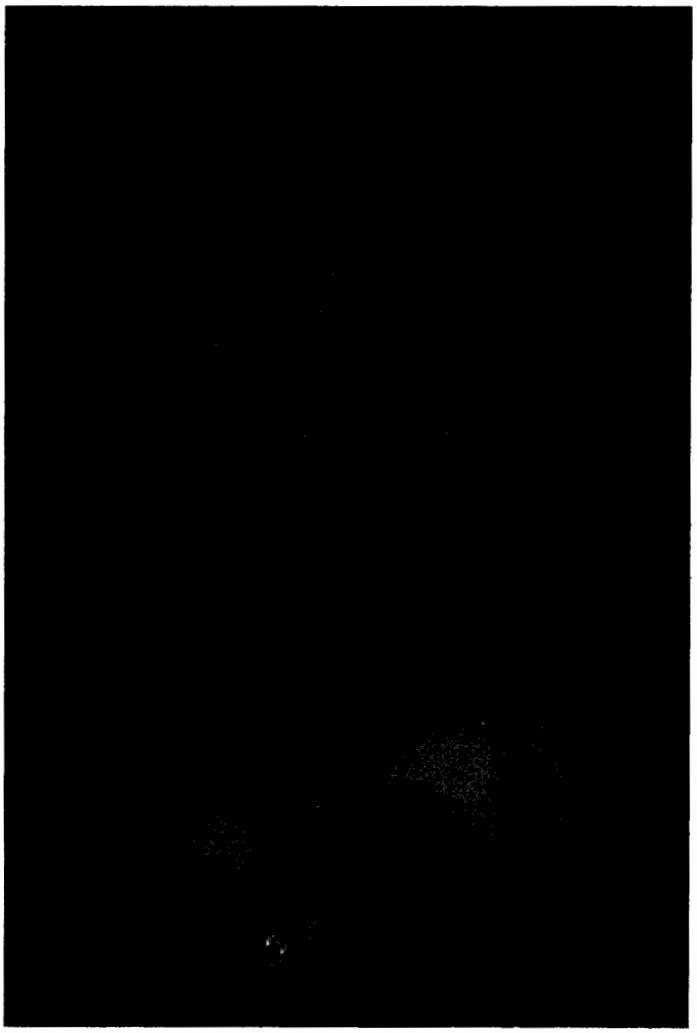
The first child born in Arkansas to Thomas and Nancy Sisco was a son named Thomas Fancher Sisco. In the years subsequently, the family lived peacefully, with many of the children marrying and starting families of their own. In 1860, however, the Civil War disrupted their lives, as it did with so many of the early citizens of Arkansas. Houston, Franklin, and Thomas Fancher joined the Confederate Army. Franklin was killed in February 1863, leaving a wife and two small children. The youngest brother, Thomas Fancher Sisco, joined Crawford's Battalion of the Arkansas Cavalry, becoming one of the youngest sergeants in the Confederacy.

Thomas Fancher Sisco survived the war and later married Mattie Coker Rowden. Their only child was named Maggie. After Mattie died, Thomas married Cynthia Armer. They were blessed with many children, all of whom produced prominent Washington County families in the years ahead: William Collier Sisco, Lewis Rufus, Crandle Pleas Sisco, Jennings Bryan and Lydia Belle Sisco.

One of the sons, Crandle Pleas Sisco, nicknamed "C. P.", excelled in school, graduating head of his high school class. C. P. was interested in a career in medicine and had a girlfriend, Lucy Sims, who lived in that well-known bustling town of Springdale.

After starting medical school at Little Rock in 1907, C. P and Lucy corresponded by letters and postcards with scenes of Springdale as well as his medical school class. During his training, he apprenticed in Washington and Boone counties, often accepting food and lumber, as well as cash for his services. Of course, the opportunity to visit with Lucy was not overlooked by the young medical student.

In 1911, he graduated, married Lucy, and initially settled in his home town of Osage. These were the "best of times and the worst of times". Within two years, his father, Thomas Fancher, would die under the young doctor's care and C. P.'s first and only child, Friedman, was born. C. P. practiced medicine in the rural community for about 10 years. However, it soon became obvious that the population growth was occurring mainly around neighboring Washington County. Then came the news that the new "interstate highway" would soon be constructed through Springdale. This was enough to convince him and many other families in Osage to move to Springdale, Lucy's home.



Charles Sisco

After arrival in Springdale, C. P.'s medical practice grew. He found space on the second floor of an office building in downtown Springdale, directly over the Arkansas Western Gas office on the corner of Emma Avenue ("main street") and Holcomb Street.

Not all of his patients could be adequately cared for by office visits and house calls. He saw that it was necessary for some to have in-patient supervision because, in those days, no hospital was near enough (City Hospital in Fayetteville was not yet built). He therefore fashioned a six-bed infirmary, complete with nurses, IV's, etc. across the hallway from his second-story medical office. This would provide the care needed by his patients until City Hospital in Fayetteville was ready. He and Lucy, along with nurses and an x-ray "taker" (technicians were unheard of), would be the main personnel in this office until Friedman graduated from medical school in 1937. C. P.'s health was not good, having suffered from arterial hypertension for many years. Adequate treatment was not known in those days.

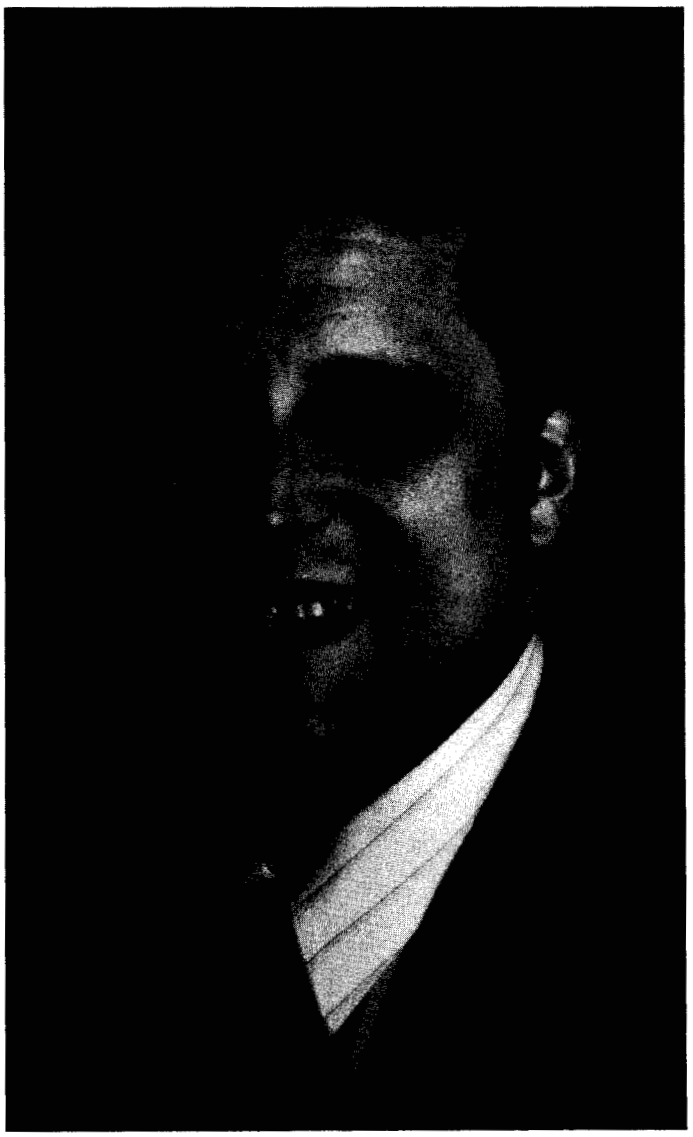
During the early 1930s the government realized that there was a shortage of medical doctors and formulated a program to accelerate the training of physicians. Friedman was one of the few that were able to complete his undergraduate college education in two years, and began medical school in 1933. After graduation, he went to San Antonio, Texas to do his internship at Santa Rosa Hospital, where he met a beautiful young nurse, Helen Vierheller. They were married in 1939, after he returned to help his father in their medical practice.



Kenneth Sisco

Unfortunately, Hitler and Hirohito made this reunion short-lived. After the bombing of Pearl Harbor, Friedman joined the army and served in the Pacific theater until 1945. During his absence, his first son, Charles Paul, was born. Helen and Charles spent much of the war years in San Antonio with her mother, Ella Lutz Vierheller. Friedman's second son, Kenneth Lee, was born after his return in 1946. It was not too long after Friedman came back to Springdale that C. P.'s health rapidly deteriorated. He suffered several strokes and developed renal failure. His death in 1948 was a great loss to the community that had depended upon him for so many years.

After returning from the war, the medical practice that Friedman shared with his ailing father, was getting too much for both of them to handle. Dr. John W. Dorman was an early associate, having met Friedman during the war, and was persuaded to join them afterward. In 1953, the crowded conditions forced Friedman to build a larger and more modern facility several blocks west of their current location. This was completed and Friedman had two other physicians join him in practice, Dr. R. P. Edmondson and Dr. Ed Wheat. The new building was large enough for three doctors.

Friedman hoped that his two sons would eventually join him in practice IF they "decided" to become physicians. Little did Charles and Kenneth realize at the time, there was never to be any real choice in the matter; the dye was cast.

Lucy was always a key part of Friedman's practice. She was "keeper of the books", along with Claudia Thornsberry; they were the ones that kept him going.

Wedding picture of C. P. and Lucy, standing are Maggie and Cora (Sims).

A humorous tale, frequently told, was about the time in the late 50's when a young man about 25 years old came in and handed Lucy a $20 bill. She asked his name but couldn't find his account. He explained that C. P. delivered him many years ago and that his parents were too poor to pay the bill. All this time his mother told him that she would "take him back if he didn't behave himself" because he "still wasn't paid for." He wanted to make sure that she could not possibly make good on her threat.

As was expected, Charles and Kenneth eventually fufilled their father's dream and became doctors. Both graduating from the University of Arkansas Medical School, Charles in 1967, Kenneth in 1971. Their return to Springdale would be delayed for some time due to the expanding Vietnam War.

They both were also determined to not entirely follow in their father's and grandfather's footsteps with regard to the intense practice pressure (up to an 80-hour workweek including eternal night calls, house calls, etc.). They felt that "specialization" was the answer. Charles decided on a career in internal medicine and allergic diseases. During medical school, he met and fell in love with a nursing student, Rebecca Ann Miller. They were married in 1964 and had two children: David William, born in Tulsa in 1967 during Charles' internship, and Carol Ann, born in Denver in 1971 during allergy fellowship training.

By 1974, Charles had completed his specialty training and military obligation. He returned to join Friedman in practice. Friedman's health was gradually declining as did old C. P.'s after a myocardial infarction in 1969. He was never able to resume full practice volume and had to struggle to keep his office open until Charles' return. In 1978, after a long illness terminated by renal failure, he died. After a divorce from Rebecca, Charles remarried Sheryl Sue Foss in 1980.

Kenneth, on the other hand, decided to become a pathologist. This, he felt, would lend himself to a more research-oriented career. In 1976, he met Jan Arotta, who he married in 1977. They have two children, Kennen and Kristina. In 1985, he completed his pathology residency and moved to San Diego to serve two years in the Navy.

Sisco Funeral Chapel of Springdale

The Sisco Funeral Chapel of Springdale is located in a 21,000 square foot, aesthetically appealing building at 705 West Meadow Avenue. It offers all funeral-related activities, including facilities for the funeral service, itself. All this is in marked contrast to the modest beginning of the firm, which has a 73 year history of service to the Springdale area.

Charles Farmer

The funeral home opened in Springdale in September, 1915 as the Nix Callison Undertaking Co. The partners were Joe S. Nix of Springdale and A. D. Callison of Rogers. Nix was the manager. The undertaking part of the business shared a building on Emma Avenue with the other part of the business, which dealt in wallpaper, paint and picture framing. An announcement at the opening gave the address as 23 East Emma Avenue.

Some residents 80 years of age or older remember Nix-Callison as being located in a building between Spring Street and Mill Street on Emma Avenue. Mrs. Wilma Hicken Sohl thinks back to November, 1931, when a dear friend of hers was killed in a car accident. Friends went upstairs in that building to pay their respects. The fact that the funeral home by then offered a visitation room would have been an innovation, for in earlier years, a body was always kept at home until time for the services. Indeed, sometimes, the services were held at the home.

At first, a horse-drawn hearse was used and was stored at the Carroll Livery Stable. One historical article says that Nix-Callison brought their first motorized hearse to Springdale in 1919.

Joe S. Nix, a native of Fayetteville, spent all of his life in Fayetteville and Springdale except for one year with the Oscar Fentress Mortuary in Fort Smith. He built each wooden coffin in the back of the business and trimmed it by hand, as a coffin was needed. It is said that the cost ran between $27 and $60, and that he charged $1.50 to deliver the casket. If the family wished, he would wash, dress and place the body in the coffin for a $7.50 fee.

Like his successors in the funeral home, Nix was active in the community. He was member of the Masonic Lodge, IOOF, AOUW, Springdale Fire Department, Springdale Community club, Springdale Rotary Club, Order of Eastern Star and he served several terms as Washington County Coroner, was a city councilman and was a member of the Paving District Commission.

His health had been frail for some years, and on February 28, 1927, Nix died at the age of 44. His survivors included his young widow and four children ranging in age from four to twelve. A member of the Presbyterian Church, his funeral service was held at the larger sanctuary of the First Baptist Church, with pastors of the Methodist and Christian Churches officiating.

Nix's obituary stated that his partner, A. D. Callison, was at his bedside when he died. Shortly before his death, he said to Callison: "I've thought it all over from beginning to end, and I can't think of anything to keep me from getting by up yonder, can you, Cal?"

Over half a century later, Nix's widow died in another state. She was brought back to Springdale for burial at Bluff Cemetery beside her husband. The same funeral home that he had founded handled committal services for her.

Two months before Nix died, Glenn M. Riggs had joined the Nix-Callison Undertaking Co. With Nix's death, Riggs became a junior member of the firm, and its name was changed to Callison-Riggs Funeral Home.

The next week after Nix's death, Riggs was appointed by Governor John E. Martineau to finish Nix's term as county coroner. The voters returned him to that position each election thereafter until his death 14 years later.

Riggs, too, was actively involved in Springdale and the area. He was the first chairman of the Northwest Arkansas Apple Blossom Pilgrimage Association formed in 1929. He served on the board of governors of the Springdale Rotary Club and was active in the Methodist Church and Boy Scouts.

Born at Vandalia, Missouri, December 7, 1904, Riggs went to Rogers in 1924, where he became associated with Callison's Funeral Home. As soon as he served his apprenticeship, he attended Worsham School of Embalming in Chicago. Graduating in 1925, he was licensed on his 21st birthday to practice in Arkansas, holding the distinction for a few days of being the youngest licensed embalmer in the United States.

On his 22nd birthday, Riggs married, but his wife died two years later. In 1931, he married Miss Rachel Eicher of Springdale.

In 1935, Riggs and Callison purchased the large residence at 316 West Emma Avenue that had been built as a home by Dr. J. E. Martin, who died December 22, 1930. Situated at the corner of Shiloh Street, the building now houses the Anne Lynn's Dress Shop. The remodeled structure contained an upstairs apartment for the manager of the funeral home. Here the firm would serve the Springdale area the next 32 years, under the management of three different men.

In 1940, Riggs moved to Fayetteville to become manager of Moore's Funeral Chapel, the major portion of the stock which had been purchased by Riggs and A. D. Callison.

Riggs died April 4, 1941 at the age of 36. An estimated 750 persons from throughout Arkansas attended the service held at Springdale's First United Methodist Church. Following Riggs' request, the service was kept short, and in addition to the prayers, included only a statement made at one time by Riggs, himself, at a civic club meeting: "If when I pass away, my friends can stand at my bier and say, 'He lived a Christian life as he saw it,' I will feel that my life has not been in vain."

When Riggs had moved to Fayetteville the year before, he had been succeeded in the Springdale firm by Maurice Russell, and the firm's name was changed to the Callison-Russell Funeral Home. Riggs had made a statement at that time about Russell, in which he said: "We feel fortunate in having a man such as Maurice that we can put in complete charge of the Springdale home. And we can recommend him to the people as being capable of carrying on the high type of service which we have tried to make a part of Callison-Riggs Funeral Home. He is familiar with everything that goes on with the management. He is well known and well liked by the people of Springdale and his many friends through his work with the Boy Scouts."

Maurice Russell had come to Springdale with his parents in 1923, while still in high school. Following graduation, he attended the University of Arkansas for two years, then worked at a railroad job in Colorado. Returning to Springdale in 1929, he began serving his apprenticeship with the Callison-Riggs Funeral Home. Completing that, he attended the Williams School of Embalming in Kansas City and was licensed.

Seven years later, Russell left the funeral industry and Gilbert Sisco became a partner of A. D. Callison in the Springdale firm. The year was 1947. Sisco, his wife, Ted, and teenaged son moved into the manager's apartment at the funeral home and the name of the firm was changed to Callison-Sisco Funeral Home.

A native of Delmar in Carroll County, Sisco had been born January 26, 1913. Having no high school at Delmar, he had gone to Chicago to stay with a married sister, graduating there. He attended the Worsham Mortuary School in Chicago, and then entered active duty as an Army medic during World War II. He served 27 months in the European Theater of War.

Returning home, Sisco was employed at Nelson's Funeral Home in Berryville before moving to Springdale. Like all of his predecessors, Sisco was an active member of the community. When Springdale Memorial hospital was built a few years after his arrival here, he served on the hospital's board of directors. He also was a Chamber of Commerce Board member, a member of the Rotary Club and served on the Civil Service Commission.

During the years of 1947 to 1957, Sisco was a part owner of the funeral home. In 1957, he became sole owner, and the name was changed to the Sisco Funeral Home.

A. D. Callison, the Rogers man, who had helped found the funeral home here and who had been a partner in it for 42 years with four different men, died July 2, 1958 at age 64.

Callison was born June 1, 1889 in Barton County, MO. In 1912, he founded the funeral home in Rogers, now called Callison-Lough, and in addition to what now is called Sisco Funeral Chapel, he helped establish several other funeral homes in the area.

For many years, the funeral home had operated Springdale's only ambulance service. Until Springdale Hospital was built in 1951, patients being taken or returned from a hospital, usually used Fayetteville's City Hospital or Veterans Administration Hospital in Fayetteville. Often ambulance trips took patients to Little Rock or to even farther points, such as Mayo Clinic in Minnesota.

Such trips, plus death calls to far points for return to Springdale, took one of the employees of the funeral home away for hours or days. In the late 1940s and early 1950s, Sisco and two other men, Earle Jines and John Baker, operated both the funeral home phase of the work and the ambulance duties. If one man was away, it increased the workload of the other two.

Too, this left all three on call 24 hours a day, seven days a week. In time, this was remedied by allowing one of the three to have every third weekend off, relieving him from having to stay near a phone and in town for two days every three weeks.

The ambulance part of the service was given up by Sisco's in 1967 at the time the funeral home moved to its new quarters on West Meadow Avenue. Another change at that time involved ownership. Charles C. Farmer became part owner of the firm by purchasing a 45 percent interest in it.

A native of Clarksville, Farmer came to the Sisco Funeral Home on January 1, 1953, as a new graduate of the Dallas Institute of Mortuary Science. The next October, Farmer was drafted into the U. S. Army. He served 22 months on active duty in Korea. Upon his discharge, he returned to Springdale and rejoined Sisco Funeral Home.

In 1974, Farmer purchased the remaining stock of what now was called Sisco Funeral Chapel, and Gilbert Sisco retired.

An undated clipping entitled, You Can Quote Me, was carried over Sisco's signature in the local paper. In it, he made this statement: "I put all that I had in my investment when I came here. If it were to do over, I would repeat that act for I cannot say enough of a fine community and the people who make it what I consider the best place I have seen in which to live and work."

On October 12, 1981, Gilbert Sisco and his second wife, Mildred, were killed in a tragic accident when a trailer truck they met on a curve on rain-slick Highway 71, a mile south of Greenland ran over them. Sisco was 68, his wife was 57. They were enroute to Hot Springs to attend the 51st Annual Meeting of the Arkansas Hospital Association.

Like all of the owners of the funeral home before him, Farmer is actively involved in the community. He is a member of the First Baptist Church, and is on the Board of Trustees for Springdale Memorial Hospital and serves on the Board of Directors of First State Bank. He and his wife, Louise, have three children. Farmer is president of Sisco Funeral Chapel, Inc., and Louise is secretary.

The funeral home today provides services and facilities undreamed of by the founders of the firm. There are four visitation rooms, embalming facilities, a cosmetology room, supply of caskets, a covered entrance for the funeral cars bringing families to a service, and a 325-capacity chapel that offers dignity, beauty, warmth and peace. All motor equipment needed to provide the traditional Christian service is available.

The volume of business has quadrupled since the move from Emma avenue over 21 years ago, Farmer said, and certainly the service to families that are served. It requires an average of 12 full-time and three part-time employees to operate the funeral home today. Wade Bellah is head funeral director and embalmer.

An innovation offered in modern times by Sisco Chapel are the services provided by the Rev. Burton A. Miley, a retired Baptist minister. For the past 18 years, he has handled in-service training for employees and advertising for the firm.

Sisco Funeral Chapel offers pre-arrangement counseling and pre- arrangement funding either through a family trust or a life insurance policy. The firm also conducts classes at Springdale High School in social studies on Death and Dying. All the students of this course are brought to the funeral home for a tour.

In discussing changes met by the funeral home today, the subject of cremation came up. Non-natives of the area are more interested in cremation than others, Farmer said, and today there are three crematoriums in northwest Arkansas. However, there still are only four percent or less who prefer it.

Increased tourism between residents of one country and another have necessitated another change. On numerous occasions, someone from the Springdale area has died in a foreign country. Depending upon which country is involved, it has sometimes been necessary for Farmer to send someone to that country to negotiate, financially, for the release of the body. In reverse, Sisco Funeral Chapel now and then finds itself shipping a body back to some other country.

Government regulations today call for a funeral home to provide an itemized expense list for a family, and in a way, this harks back to the beginning of the local funeral home in 1915. In those days, Joe Nix pencilled out his costs for building a coffin, for delivering it, and for preparing the body. Today, a computer keeps the management well informed, including a break-down of individual expenses for the various services.

That even tells the manager how much extra it costs in employee wages, utilities and other expense to provide a Visitation Room after regular business hours for the family's use in meeting friends there. As a result of the necessary change for such a room, Sisco Funeral Chapel now allows a family the choice of using one of the firm's Visitation Rooms or of having their loved one taken home for the visitation.

And that increasing custom brings one aspect of Sisco Funeral Chapel back full circle to the tradition that existed in 1915, when the body always was kept at home with the family until time for the funeral service.

Thus it has gone throughout the 73 year history of Sisco Funeral Chapel—keeping abreast of innovations and changes that were best for the community, but retaining, or reverting back at times to recapture the best of the old ways.

Springdale Clinic

Clinic's Fourth Decade Of Local Community Care

The Springdale Clinic could well be called the Springboard Clinic. This general practice clinic has probably launched more young, talented doctors into practice for themselves than any other local clinic.

Sam Watson, Jim Capps, Norman Tubb, Randall Oates and Joel Mills (deceased) were some of the doctors who practiced with Springdale Clinic over the years and have gone on to establish their own practices or clinic partnerships.

For the past two years, Springdale Clinic has been solely owned by Dr. John Ralph Power. Dr. Power purchased sole ownership from his partner, Stanley Applegate in 1986. Applegate semi-retired in order to travel on behalf of his many medical and charitable interests with his wife Annabel. He still remains active with the clinic but with a more flexible, shortened practice schedule.

Doctors John (J. W.) Dorman, J. R. Power and C. Stanley Applegate formed this 'springboard clinic' over thirty-five years ago. The practice was moved into the present location at Meadow and Blair Streets in February of 1954.

Springdale Clinic ultimately launched Dorman and his two sons, John and Jerry Dorman into forming yet another partnership and clinic once both of the sons had completed their residency.

"John was the primary shaker and mover for the Springdale Clinic, and Stanley and I were glad to work with him. Our first location was on Spring Street upstairs in the old Joe Steele Building," Power commented.

"I have a tremendous amount of respect for John. We're still good friends. He's one in a million, and he constantly reminds me to cut back my hours and take care of myself," he added.

"I came here right out of the service from the Korean Conflict (as battalion surgeon). My brother first suggested northwest Arkansas as a place to practice medicine. He was a pharmaceutical agent who visited Dorman's office frequently, told Dorman about his brother, the doctor, and me about Dorman," Power pointed out.

Applegate also served in Korea in 1948 with the Army Medical Corps specializing primarily in orthopedics. Upon his discharge in 1948, he opened his first medical practice in the old labor camp on East Caudle Avenue in Springdale.

In 1953, after the outbreak of polio, both Ed Wheat and John Dorman were hospitalized with Polio. That left only two of the four practicing doctors in Springdale to deal with the epidemic, the Friedman Sisco practice and the Applegate practice.

It was this crisis situation that led to Sisco and Applegate calling on Dr. Power to help out in the emergency. On July 1, 1953, Dr. J. R. Power moved to Springdale. He remained, and upon Dorman's recovery, he, Applegate and Dorman formed what was to become the Springdale Clinic.

One of the most important clinic employees for over thirty years has been Veda Tassy. She has served as office manager and right arm to doctors that have come and gone. Semi-retired since 1987, she still works several hours a week. The present office manager is Lisa Moulton.

"Sharon Pope is one of the best nurses I've ever worked with, and she has been with us about 17 years. Betty Nell Tatman is another one. She was with our clinic about 10 years," Power said.

Power's wife, Peggy Ann Stephen Power, does all the Medicare/Medicaid claims processing and is an excellent medical transcriptionist.

At present, the other full-time clinic doctor is William (Bill) McGowan. McGowan has been with the practice for less than a year. "He came highly recommended and fits in well with both patients and staff," Power said, "All three of the Clinic doctors are Arkansas medical school graduates," he added.

The practice no longer includes prenatal or obstetric care, however, Dr. Power has delivered more than 3,000 babies. The Springdale Clinic doctors see and treat just about every other condition from birth through old age. Clinic patients who require hospitalization are admitted to Springdale Hospital for treatment and surgery.

Applegate's service to the medical community has included appointment three times as chief of staff for Springdale Hospital, serving as president of the Washington County Medical Society, co-founding and serving as president of Springdale Savings and Loan, board membership on College of the Ozarks (now University of the Ozarks), Ozark Guidance Center, Shiloh Museum, Springdale Industrial Commission, Arkansas State Medical Board, and Arkansas State Chamber of Commerce.

"Stanley covers well the community relations end of our medical practice. I've been chief of staff at Springdale Hospital twice, and I am the medical director for the nursing homes in Springdale. I visit the homes on Tuesdays, my day off. I usually have one free Tuesday a month and one weekend a month when I'm not on call. Seeing 250 patients a week doesn't leave me much time for other interests. What free time I have left is for family," Power said.

Dr. Power's community service has included membership in the First Baptist Church for more than 35 years. He served on the building committee of Elmdale Baptist Church as well. He has been on the board of directors for First National Bank since 1973. He has been active on the board for Police Retirement in addition to having served with the Friendship Cemetery board of directors.

The ten-room clinic for the most part is self-contained having its own complete lab and x-ray rooms. Some physical therapy is also done within the office location.

Prior to the arrival of "specialty groups" the doctors, Dorman, Power and Applegate performed the greater part of all surgeries in Springdale. During the influenza epidemic, in the early years of the clinic, each of the clinic doctors would make as many as 25-30 house calls per night.

The clinic doors open at 9:00 a. m., and close when the last patient has been seen. With between eight and ten thousand patients, on file, and between two and three hundred visiting the office each week, some evenings the clinic is open well past 6:00 p. m.

Power says his family's practice of medicine can be traced through his mother's lineage (the Shuffield side of the family) to a great-great-grandmother who was born in Germany and came to this country sometime during the 1850s and practiced medicine in Mississippi. This line of doctors has continued through the Shuffields to his mother's generation. Her brother, Joseph Franklin Shuffield was a brilliant Tulane graduate (and valedictorian of his class) and became one of the best known doctors in Arkansas.

Power's mother, referred to by all who knew her as "Aunt Minnie", was a nurse who continued to work until age 70. A true character, her dealings with patients and friends could well fill a book.

According to Power, the loyalty of the clinic's patients, some of which include Don Tyson and Harvey Jones is due, in part, to the humor of doctors and staff.

"We treat more than ailments. We treat people. Laughter is one of the biggest healers, and where it won't heal, it still helps," Power said.

There are no plans to expand the clinic, at present, but Power's oldest son, Charles Wesley, has followed the family tradition in choosing a medical career and practices medicine in Colorado. Power mentioned that within a couple of years, his son might be joining the Springdale Clinic's practice making it possible to continue patient service under the ownership of still another Dr. Power.

Springdale Flower Shop

Pat Turner saw the opportunity she had been waiting for when Wayne Neff decided to sell Neff's Nurseries, Inc., of Springdale in 1983. It was a chance for Pat to own her own florist shop.

Springdale Flower Shop - 1987.

Wayne Neff, too, saw the opportunity he had been waiting for when someone as competent as Pat Turner approached him offering to buy Neff's nurseries, Inc. It meant he could go fishing.

Wayne Neff had certainly earned the chance to take it easy for a while. After marrying his second wife, Bonnie Petersen in 1968, this former mayor of Elm Springs developed the land owned by Bonnie and her late husband, Don Petersen, and began making plans for his next "business venture."

After receiving word that Peace's Florist Shop of Springdale wanted him to purchase its store, Mr. Neff, instead, decided to open his own florist shop. In October of 1969, the vacant tire store that had once occupied the property was transformed into Neff's Nurseries, Inc.

After employing Gladys Scott as head designer and Lauren Kelchner to run the nursery, Neff's Nurseries, Inc., began to take off as a successful "business venture" for Wayne Neff.

It was only one year after the opening of Neff's that the shop landed its biggest account. In 1970, Neff's Nurseries, Inc., was called upon to landscape the Northwest Arkansas Mall (then under construction) inside and out. Some say this was Neff's best work.

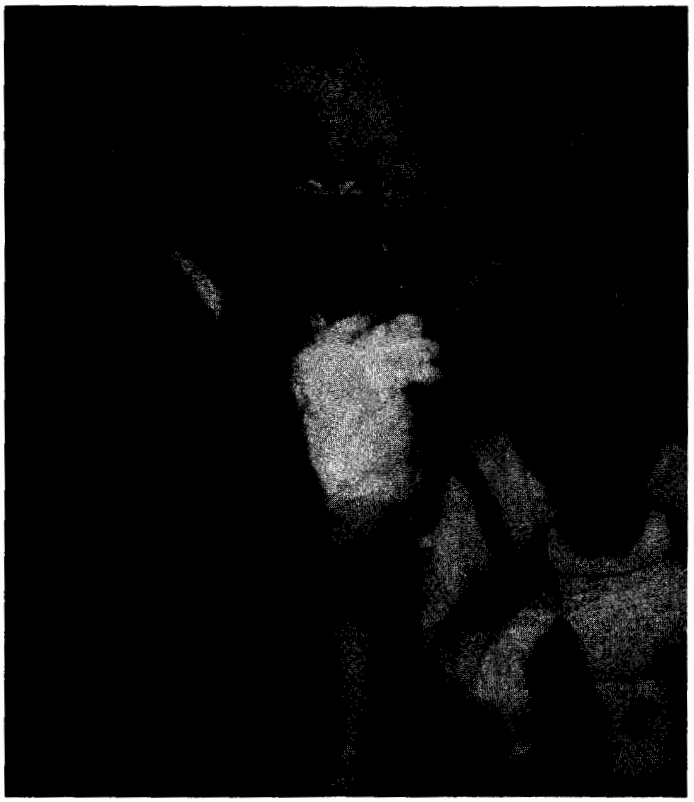
Because Mr. Neff had gone to school near Springdale and had later held several jobs in the area, he brought to his flower shop a good business sense and many regular customers. As time progressed, Neff's Nurseries, Inc., began to pick up more business including an increase in FTD (Floral Transworld Delivery) orders.

Alta Neff, Wayne's mother, sensed her son had involved himself with a successful business. Ready to get in on the action, Mrs. Neff inquired about employment possibilities at Neff's by asking her son, "Isn't there anything down at that flower shop I can do?" Alta Neff was soon employed by Neff's and remained at the shop until her death in 1980.

Six years had gone by since Neff's had landscaped the mall. By that time, business was running smoothly for Wayne Neff and Neff's Nurseries, Inc. It wasn't until 1977 when a week before Valentine's Day, a heater exploded in the back room of Neff's, burning the entire work area.

With the busiest time of the year upon them, the employees of Neff's Nurseries went to work frantically on the stock of orders received before the fire. With generous help and donations from area florists, Neff's was able to fulfill its work orders on time.

One of the flower shops responsible for helping Neff out in his time of need was Epperly's who, at that time, employed a young University of Arkansas horticulture student by the name of Pat Drevs.



The Turners - Sam holding Sarah Beth and Pat (Drevs) holding Kevin.

Ms. Drevs, born and raised in Lone Wolf, Oklahoma, and attended the Oklahoma Christian College in Oklahoma City for two years before transferring to the University of Arkansas in 1976. While earning her degree, Ms Drevs went to Denver in 1979 to attend Cliff Mann Florist School. She later returned to Colorado for a second time to take an apprenticeship at a florist shop in Denver.

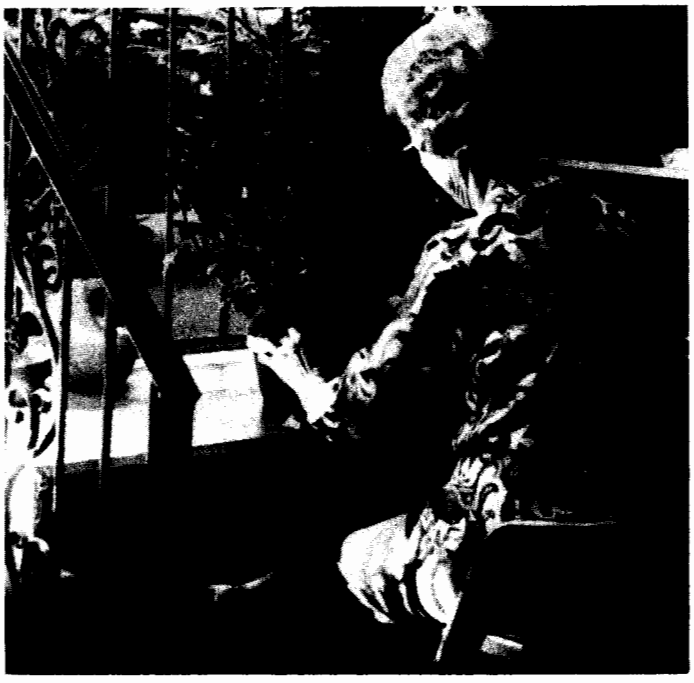
Ms. Drevs came back to this area and graduated from the University of Arkansas in 1980. She then started work at Knowles, Prairie Grove, and later moved to Epperly's after Curtis Wray, of Knowles, bought that shop.

In May of 1983, Ms Drevs became her own boss when with the help of her parents, she bought Neff's Nurseries, Inc., from Wayne Neff. Four months later, Pat Drevs became the wife of Sam Turner who graduated from Arkansas State University with a degree in geography.

Neff's Nurseries, Inc., changed its name to Springdale Flower Shop in May of 1986 to clarify confusion as to whether Mr. Neff still worked at the shop. There were those who continued to call Pat's store asking for Wayne, although the regular customers knew the store had changed hands.

In 1969, a major change had taken place in Neff's with the elimination of the nursery. However, today, the Springdale Flower Shop continues to offer a wider range of gifts and arrangements than has previously been offered.

Wayne and Bonnie Neff with Pat Turner.



Alta Neff

Springdale Flower Shop now carries roughly one-third of the FTD orders wired in. The shop's prices are competitive, but the quality of the product produced in her store is of major importance to Pat Turner.

As for future plans, Mrs. Turner would like to see her store do more commercial work, including office and home decorations. Expansion of the store is a possibility, but not a priority at this point.

Along with manager J. R. Eldridge and her regular employees, Mrs. Turner's husband, Sam, when not working with the Highway Department, works at the shop during the holidays while her year old daughter, Sarah Beth, and son, Kevin Patrick, are still a little young to know for sure what a spray is.

Johann W. von Goethe once said, "Treat people as if they were what they ought to be and you help them to become what they are capable of being." Wayne Neff must have seen the capability of Pat Turner when he sold his store in 1983. Pat Turner, now a successful business woman and florist, continues to keep in touch with Bonnie Neff.

Springdale Memorial Hospital

"Where People Who Care. . .Care For People"

Springdale Memorial Hospital opened its doors to patient care September 8, 1952, it marked the realization of a community goal set four years earlier by a group of concerned doctors, business people and citizens.

On August 24, 1948, directors of the Chamber of Commerce and Springdale Industrial and Agricultural Foundation, Inc. met to discuss plans for funding and building a hospital. The community's need for such a facility had been recognized by several area physicians, including the late Dr. C. P. Sisco, one of the early area pioneer doctors.

Harvey Jones, founder and owner of Jones Truck Lines, was named chairman of the executive committee for hospital construction. Other committee members included Shelby Ford, Louis Lichlyter, Joe Robinson, H. R. Sharp, E. R. Stafford, Joe Steele and A. P. Wilson.

Several building sites were considered before the location was chosen. On October 26, 1949, it was announced that the hospital would be built on the Quandt Street site purchased from Jim Charlesworth, and donated by Jones, Luther Johnson and Dr. Friedman Sisco.

Community response was overwhelming. Churches, organizations and private citizens offered immediate sponsorship. Proceeds poured in from sales and auctions of items ranging from goats to homemade pies.

P. W. "Doc" Boone's "Skunk Holler Band," formed in 1939, proved to be one of the most popular fund raisers. Area residents thronged to performances to see community leaders perform novelty acts. Band members included Joe Robinson, Yvonne Ballew, Dupree Deaver, Austin Cravens, Dick Sanders, Scott Price, Vera Jane Cummings and headline-making dancer Shelby Ford.

Within four years community efforts had raised more than $200,000. Governor Sid McMath supplied the information necessary to obtain matching funds from the federal Hill-Burton Hospital Development Program. These funds totaled $210,000. The original estimated cost for the hospital had been $471,129. By its completion in August of 1952, changes and costs of materials had tallied a total cost of $600,000.

Two thousand people attended an open house at the one-story, 32-bed hospital on August 31, 1952. The City Council and property owners each agreed to pay half the costs for paving Quandt Street as required by federal inspectors, and swift action allowed the hospital to open its doors for patient admission on September 8, 1952.

Letta Bracken served as Springdale Memorial's administrator, and Dr. J. W. Dorman was the first chief-of-staff. The first employee staff totaled 38.

Harvey Jones, the catalyst in uniting diverse groups in a going effort to obtain a community hospital, was selected as president of the first board of trustees of Springdale Memorial hospital.

Other members of the board, who also were active in making community health care a reality, included Louis Lichlyter, Shelby Ford, Luther George, Joe Robinson, H. R. Sharp, Joe Steele and Autrey Wilson. (Portraits of these charter board members are on display in the lobbies and hallways of the present facility.)

The ensuing three decades were marked by phenomenal growth. From 1955 to 1960, Nursing Service added units 600, 700, and 900, and additional beds and bassinets were required for the growing facility. Other major additions were another operating room, a three-unit recovery room, two more labor rooms, another delivery room, and a suspect nursery in Delivery/OB Services.

In May of 1968, a surgical wing was opened, which included four surgery rooms, two of which were designated for minor surgery and cystosurgery. An eight-unit recovery room also was opened. Nursing Service added the 200 unit, and support areas (central supply, yard and ground maintenance, boiler operators for the plant) were expanded.

By 1971, Radiology and Respiratory Therapy had been developed into complete departments and an information desk added.

In 1972, several members of the staff were elected to serve as presidents of various state health care organizations. Hugh Means, administrator, was president of the Arkansas Hospital Association, Marge Holzwarth, director of nursing, served as president of the Arkansas Nursing Association, board of trustees member Gilbert Sisco was named president of the Arkansas Medical Society.

Another major expansion in 1976 resulted in the addition of 45 beds bringing the total to 205. The present emergency room was opened, ICU was relocated, expanded to 11 beds with new monitoring equipment, and Radiology expanded to include angiograms, arteriograms, ultrasound and tomography procedures.

In 1977, the Psychiatric Unit opened for inpatient care. Primarily instituted to provide care for patients receiving treatment at the Ozark Guidance Center, the service and staff have continued to grow.

Dr. Charles Inlow, cardiologist, joined the medical staff in 1979, ushering in a new era of medical care at Memorial. Twelve telemetry units were installed in November, creating a continuing care or (stepdown) unit for patients not requiring intensive care but needing 24-hour monitoring. The cardiac diagnostic lab was opened on the second floor, and a cardiac clinic was built on Quandt Street.

During this decade, as the community's needs have changed and grown, Memorial has continued to expand and update its services. In 1980, a new GE routine and fluoroscopy radiography room and electromyography were added and extras, such as colored television in patients' rooms, were provided.

The fifth floor in 1981, housing the Independent Living Facility with eight motel-type rooms and five apartments available for daily rentals or lease, a service unique to this area. Harvey and his wife, Bernice, were instrumental in providing this facility. The Public Relations Department is also located on the fifth floor, as is the Lifeline emergency response system which was installed in 1982.

Also added in 1982 were an electronic switch telephone system a heart sound simulator to train ICU personnel, and 12 additional telemetry units; a total of 24 patients could now be monitored around the clock. A second professional building, the Northwest Arkansas Orthopaedic Center, also was completed.

In 1983, a comprehensive patient care information system was implemented to provide instant communication to departments. A computerized tomography scanner and a cardiac catheterization laboratory were installed, providing diagnostic expertise formerly available only at major medical centers.

The nursery/OB underwent renovation in August of 1984 to create a pleasant, serene atmosphere for visitors. Unit 900 was refurbished and a scrub area was added to the Nursery observation work room for parents.

Expansion of the cardiovascular care program was realized when Dr. John Weiss, a thoracic surgeon, joined the medical staff in 1986. Memorial became the only hospital in the area equipped to offer open-heart surgery and angioplasty, an alternative non-surgical technique.

The first heart surgery at Memorial was performed November 4, 1986, on Ova Ilene Hodges, a former Memorial employee and Springdale native. Mrs. Hodges underwent a successful triple bypass.

Two state-of-the-art cardiac catheterization laboratories also offer a full range of computerized diagnostic and catheterization services.

Many other services are offered by Memorial. The Education Department is located on Quandt and Young streets and provides a shared education program for all northwest Arkansas hospitals. It is a host library for a 13-member hospital consortium. Hospital education includes in-service on three shifts, community and patient education. Support groups such as the diabetic support group, cardiac support group, and respiratory support group offer additional information and assistance to patients with special needs. Classes offered to the public range from nutrition and babysitting to Cardio-Pulmonary Resuscitation (CPR) and coping with death and dying.

All paramedics for the area are trained and certified in Memorial's paramedic program. Plans are in progress for a respiratory therapy program to train and certify respiratory therapists and to provide employment within the hospital.

One of the first area hospitals to implement record management by computer, Memorial continues to use faster, more accurate computerized methods of patient care.

Care provided includes 24-hours a day, seven days a week physician coverage and a complete staff of family physicians and specialists on call. During the 1987 fiscal year, Memorial treated 38,194 patients in the emergency room on an outpatient basis or through in-hospital care.

"Springdale Memorial Hospital has the staff and surgery capabilities to handle any patient need from dental surgery to the critical needs required by thoracic or neurosurgeries," said Marilyn LaCombe, director of Public Relations.

Alan Prather, hospital administrator/chief operating officer oversees a staff of 787. Dr. James A. S. Haisten is present chief of staff.

In addition to the medical staff and other employees, Memorial has had an active volunteer program since the day the hospital opened. One hundred Auxiliary members signed up then, and the Auxiliary continues to strongly support the hospital.

"We have an Auxiliary that is second to none," said Hugh Means, Memorial's chief executive officer. "I can't tell you how much the voluntary efforts of these dedicated women (and men) have provided. Their time and money, raised through gift shop and thrift shop sales, have furnished equipment and luxuries for both patients and staff that otherwise would go unpurchased."

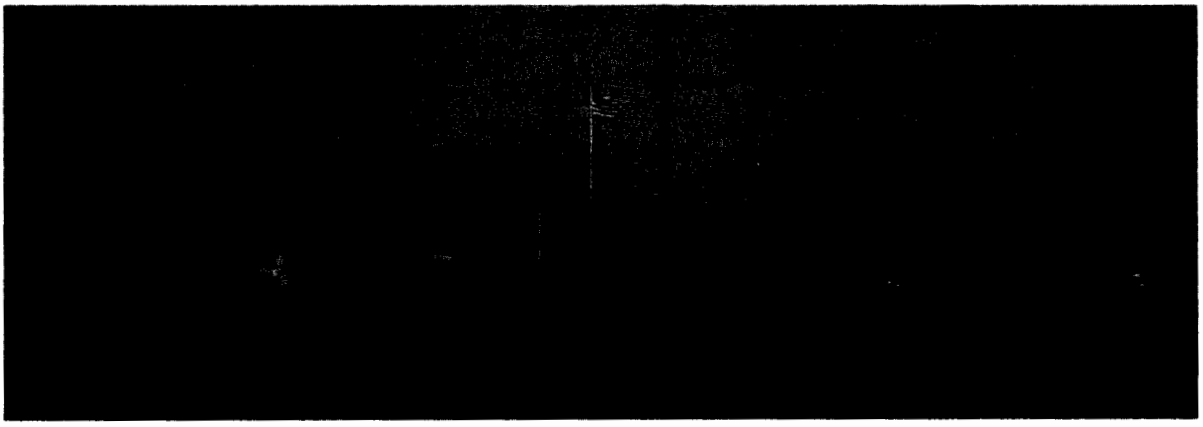
Two of Memorial's original trustees still serve on the current board: Harvey Jones, chairman, and Louis Lichlyter, vice-chairman. Other board members are Sandy Boone, Jim Cypert, Charlie Farmer, Gene George, Don Harp, Dewey Johnson, Rick Parsons, Willis Shaw, Walter Turnbow and Gerald Tweedy.

Memorial is an active member of Arkansas Hospital Association, American Hospital Association, Midwest Hospital Association and the Northwest Arkansas Hospital Association.

While its front doors now face Maple Street instead of Quandt, Memorial has not changed direction in the goals set forty years ago by those who envisioned a quality patient care institution for the community. As the hospital continues to expand its services and facilities, the staff and volunteers exemplify its motto: "Where People Who Care. . .Care for People."

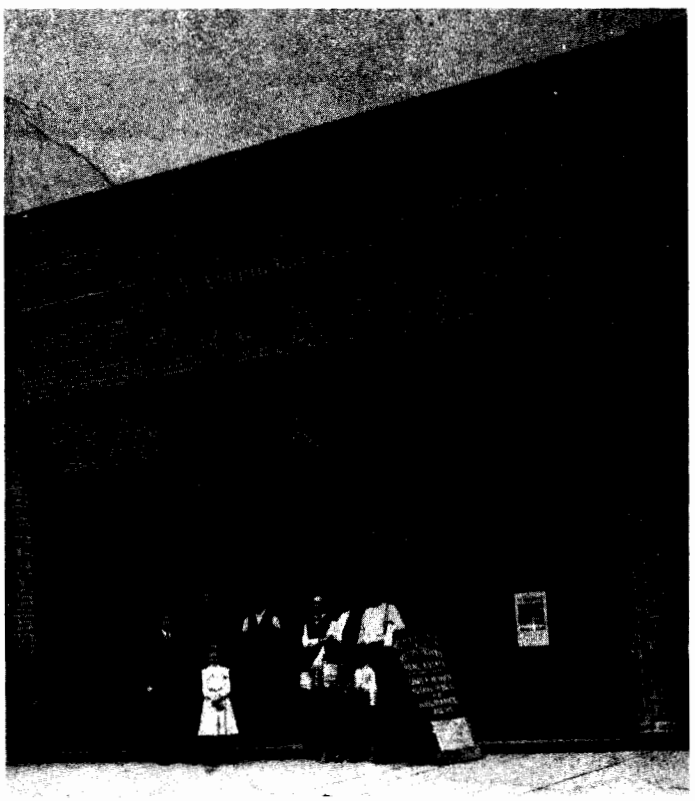


Springdale News

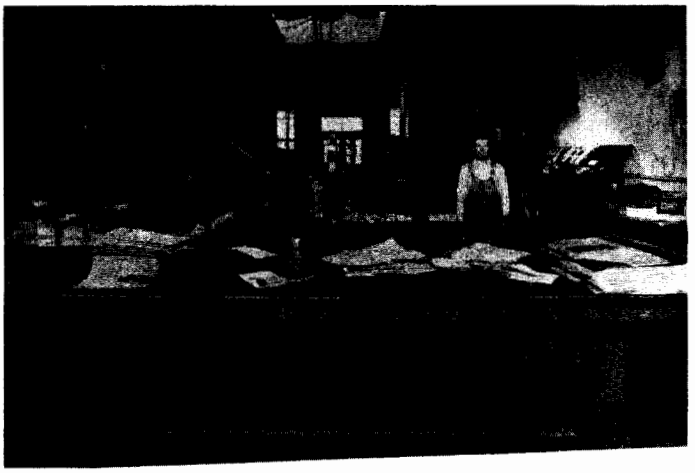
Like Threads Through Time–The Printed Word 1887-1988

Vision is not limited to one age group, so from the time John Pleasant Stafford, at 15, was "printer's devil" for the Arkansas Democrat (a Fayetteville paper) until, at age 18 (1887), when he foresaw a way to improve the quality of life for northwest Arkansas and answer the trickle of printer's ink that began to color his vision, young Stafford was committed to his dream.

1898 - Editor Stafford's modern innovation.



The first "permanent" home 1905 - 1970.



Early 1900s Composing Room.

He became one of America's youngest editor-publishers when he bought a newspaper called The Springdale Locomotive from James Van Butler and renamed it The Springdale News. He, at once, began to crusade through editorials to point out apathy and wrongdoing wherever it occurred in and around Washington County.

His first work took place in an area of 14 square feet upstairs in a frame building in downtown Springdale. The type, the cheap job press and "Army" press printed his first weeklies. This was the first of many equipment purchases through the years.

Stafford would eventually acquire a "stable" of writers (to include three of his four sons), and would build a network of correspondents to gather news from around this area of the state for publication. His first editions, however were strictly solo efforts.

From the beginning, he wrote editorials that brought attention to the people's needs in and around Springdale including: upgrading the living standard, protecting the environment, building more schools, better roads and highways.

The Springdale News' first weekly issue rolled from the press May 7, 1887 and was a six-column, four page newspaper. Its front page was filled with news from Washington, state government bulletins and crop reports. The News column size changed six times in 1890 and 1891 varying from 5 to 8 columns and in page size from 12 X 20 to 20 X 26.

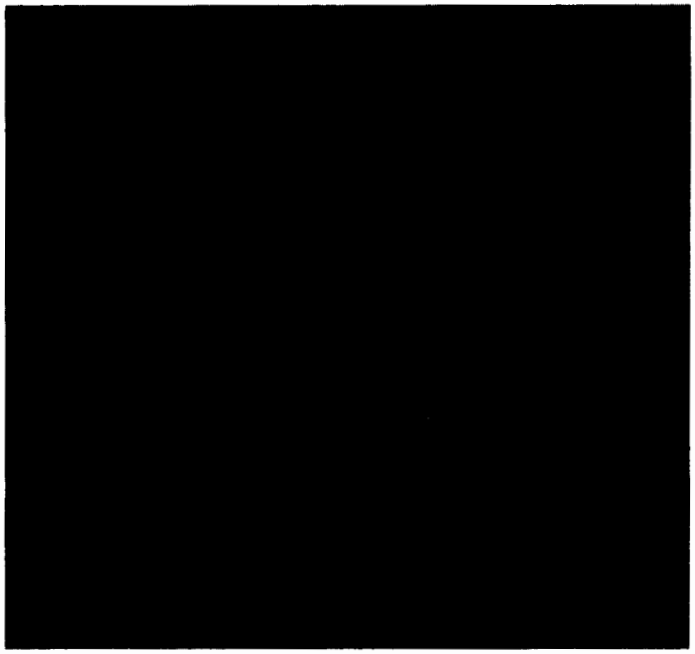
The paper's first advertisers were such notable citizens as Jo Holcomb, hotel owner and operator of Frisco House, "near the depot, on Main Street; reasonable rates." Dare and Dodson, with an ad stating "warranted work, executed with neatness and dispatch." Millard Berry, a notary public at the time, ran an ad, and B. F. Deaver advertised "Harness! Harness! Harness!"

Total subscriptions that first year came to 182, and the paper moved to an upstairs location over the Post Office.

By 1888, Stafford had added a new Washington Hand Press and increased the news from six to seven columns. With each purchase of equipment, a move was required. The office moved in 1889 and 1891 and both times were quartered upstairs over businesses.

An early editorial stating one of Stafford's purposes for publishing the News was eloquently stated in an 1893 editorial: "Those of us here know what a beautiful town and country we have, but there are many people in this broad land who do not know this, and it shall be the mission of this paper to tell them of this fact."

In 1895, a new Prouty Press meant changing location once more. This new press allowed Stafford to print 1,500 copies in two hours and 15 minutes. Three years later it was replaced by a power press.



John P. Stafford in his newsroom.

By 1900, after 13 years, the paper's circulation had increased to 1,200 and would continue to grow by 400 more in the next two years bringing circulation to 1,600. The biggest issue ever, to that date, had been the June 14, 1898 issue that sold 4,000 copies to advertise the Chautauqua (a Seneca name), an area-wide educational and recreational assembly held in Springdale, annually.

In later years Stafford and all three sons played in the Springdale band at these annual events that brought people into town from outlying areas.

In March of 1905, the News found a more permanent home. Stafford had a building erected on Emma Avenue.

Some of the pillar to post locations used on a temporary basis included: The old Clark-Deaver Hardware Store, Lichlyter's Department Store, Famous Hardware and the second floor of the First National Bank Building.

In 1904, Stafford was publishing a paper twice a week, but by November of that year went back to a weekly publication with an additional four pages.

By 1905, advertising rates had gone up to 10 cents an inch.

In 1915 the 24-hour electric service came to Springdale, Stafford reported that "a purring motor has replaced the wheezing old gas engine."

Over the years, Stafford printed "special editions" or promotional papers on book paper similar to a magazine. Many were Christmas editions, and the 1904 Christmas issue was 32 pages, no little accomplishment for that era.

From time to time subscription campaigns were initiated. One promotional, offered by the paper in 1904, for selling the most subscriptions was won by Miss Ollie Umbaugh who won a free trip to the St. Louis World's Fair.

At the turn of the century, Stafford was one of the first editors to pioneer correspondent news columns. He trained Arkansas writers throughout the state to submit local newsworthy items from surrounding communities for publication in the News. By 1907, he organized the Springdale News Correspondents Association. A photograph of those early writers of the 1890s accompanies this article.

Stafford's editorials consistently campaigned for city water, better roads, better utilities and speedier customer service, more and better educational facilities. He wanted to see men elected to office who were more interested in serving the people of northwest Arkansas than in politicking for higher office.

Unable to hide behind a corporation in those days, Stafford was very visible. What he thought and knew, what he believed in and felt morally responsible for was evident in each editorial and news feature that he wrote.

For many years, the country Correspondents were the backbone of the small newspaper because they did not have enough employees to have reporters. In the Springdale News, Jno. P. Stafford helped a group of these men and women from Springdale and surrounding communities, who had been correspondents for at least six months, to organize Springdale News Correspondents' Association. The first annual session was held August 1, 1906 and officers elected were Marion Mason (Johnson), president; Marion Murphy (Springdale), vice-president; and James A. Venable (Elm Springs), secretary. Pictured at that first meeting, front row, left to right: Mrs. J. T. Sturdivan, Miss Willie Hayes, Mrs. H. E. Tooker, Ernest Wilburn, Roy Reed, Mrs. E. S. Holland, Mrs. D. L. Gallaher. Back row, left to right: Marion Murphy, Marion Mason, Jno. P. Stafford, Jas. A. Venable and H. Myrick.

Early editorials were written by design to awaken the social and civic consciousness (and consciences) of Springdale residents who witnessed street brawls and lawlessness during the 1890s and early 1900s. Unsanitary conditions and epidemic disease were as commonplace as muddy roads and highways.

The Springdale News soon became the model for similar papers that popped up across the state because Stafford took the time and effort to provide a paper that informed its readership as well as one that used the newest and best methods in typeset and printing.

Each innovation made printing and publishing less back-breaking and time-consuming. From the first days of the foot-powered press and the laborious hours spent setting type, Stafford's vision was always on improving the quality as well as the content of his newspaper.

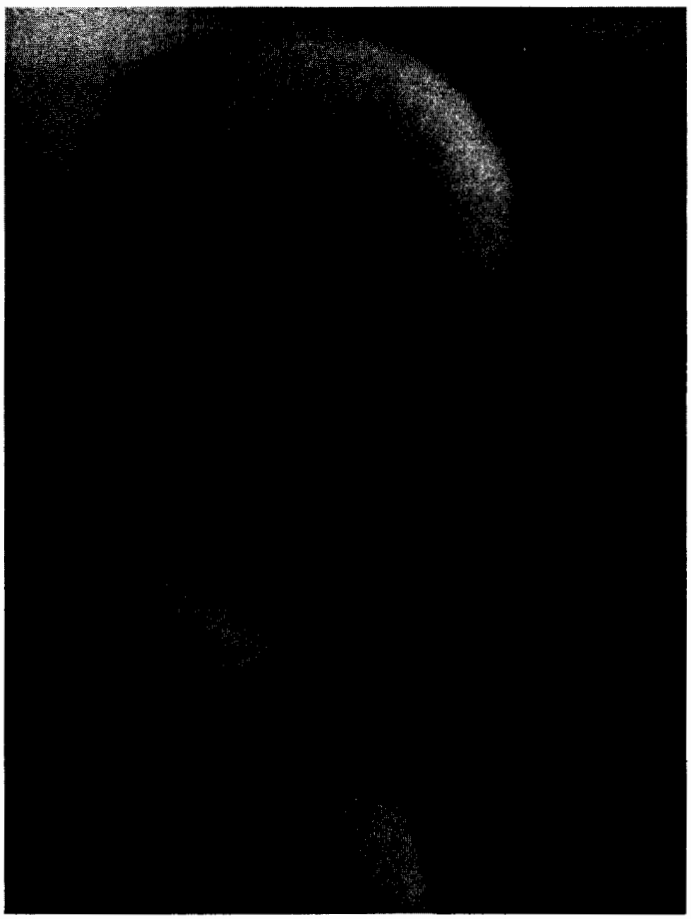
For forty-five years he was a role-model for countless young, hopeful writers and journalists. He could have been a journalism teacher, and through his columns he was. He certainly had excellent pupils in his sons, Guy C. Stafford, Edward R. "Marty" Stafford and Ellis M. Stafford.

The boys learned the alphabet at his knee as did the oldest brother John L. (known as Fay), who chose not to go into the writing and publishing business but banking. The alphabet to these boys were the letters from the type case, the letters that made up the typeset for the newspaper.

Guy C. Stafford was editor of the Springdale News, but left to become City Editor of the Los Angeles Times, and "Marty" carried on the editing tradition with the Springdale News. John L. had become an expert linotype operator often demonstrating his ability throughout the state before he went into the banking business.



John P. Stafford, 1887-1933.

When sister, Cessna Marie, came along, the boys all initiated her into the world of printer's ink, but she grew up and married leaving the printer's ink behind to her brothers.

John P. Stafford was elected to and served two terms in the Arkansas legislature. He came back to the paper stating: "I've had enough. I'd rather run my newspaper and discuss the other fellow in his job than be the one cussed."

The other time Stafford strayed from the paper was when he applied for the position of postmaster and was appointed by President Woodrow Wilson. The appointment was hand-carried to him by Congressman John N. Tillman.

His ten years as postmaster were not the easiest for Stafford, because he kept his hand in at the paper, too. The job of postmaster, though not to blame for his heart trouble (so carefully hidden from most family and friends), certainly did not help him get stronger. He finally succumbed to death at 64.

After Stafford's death in 1933, Marty became managing editor and remained with the newspaper in that capacity until his own death in 1957.

Marty was active with the Arkansas Press Association, serving as vice-president and slated for presidency of the organization when he became ill. He declined the presidency because of his illness which lasted for almost eight years.

It was during his stay at the Booneville State Sanitarium and a subsequent period of rest that Marty's wife, Glaphyra "Bucket" Stafford and Myrtle M. Stafford, John P.'s widow, carried on the business until he was able to resume his duties in 1945.

Bucket received her "trial by fire" experience as publisher and editor, almost singlehandedly running the News during the late 30s and early 40s. These times were the aftermath of the "depression" just prior to and during World War II. The shortages of labor, materials and paper seemed insurmountable. One employee remained in the composing room most of the time, and Bucket was selling ads, picking up copy, writing stories and keeping books.

In spite of her busy schedule, "Bucket" found time for civic, cultural and educational activities in Springdale. She was a charter member and active with the Business and Professional Women's Club and worked with the Girl Scouts.

One day enroute to Booneville to visit Marty in late 1941, Bucket suffered a broken back in an automobile accident near Brentwood. Hospitalized in Fayetteville for several months, she was moved to her parents' home, Mr. and Mrs. A. B. Wilkerson, Lowell, where she remained for an additional three months before returning to her desk at the News in late spring of 1942.

After Marty's recovery and return to the paper, she continued to write society news and other stories for the paper as well as keep books and wait on customers at the front desk.

By 1948, a full time bookkeeper was hired, and Ellis Stafford joined the firm taking over many of her writing duties allowing her to become more active with the Arkansas Press Women's Association, PEO, the Bloodmobile program and the county and state tuberculosis associations.

Myrtle M. Stafford was a member of the front office staff for many years, as well. She wrote social news, proof read and answered the phone. During the months when Bucket was bedfast, she had many added duties.

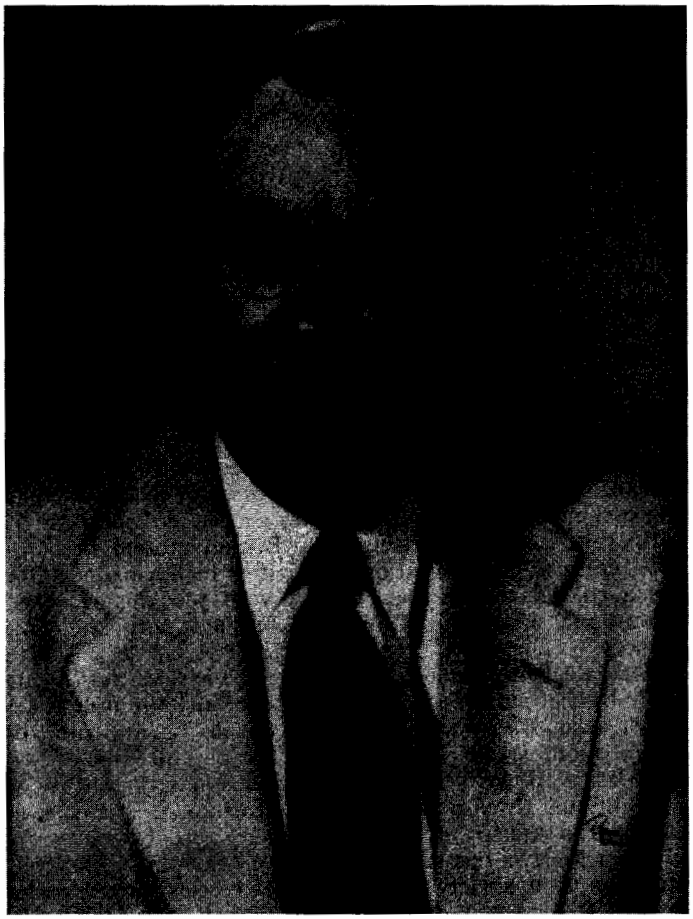
After retirement from active employment at the News, Myrtle continued to be correspondent for the many clubs and organizations in which she was active. When she was no longer able to type the items and bring them into the office, she reported by phone. She remained an important part of the business for many years.

It was in 1946, after the war, when R. R. (Bob) Sanders joined the news staff as advertising manager. He and Marty formed a partnership to establish an office supply department to be operated in connection with the paper.

Two years later, Maudine Farish was hired as bookkeeper. Maudine became a stockholder in the paper when Ellis Stafford moved to California and sold his stock in the corporation.

In 1949, the Springdale News went to a daily (five days a week). The first daily was dated June 6, 1949, and its circulation was 3,300. Delivery boys were hired to deliver the paper to all subscribers within the city limits of Springdale.

It was in February of 1950 that the owners Marty and Bucket Stafford formed a corporation known as The Springdale NEWS, Inc., an Arkansas Corporation. Majority stockholders were Marty and Bucket. Minority interests were held by Bob Sanders and Ellis Stafford.



Edward R. Stafford, 1933-1957.

During more than 30 years as head of the News, Marty Stafford spared no effort to promote the good of his native community. Probably one of his more notable accomplishments was the personal campaign that led to establishing the Springdale Memorial Hospital. His deep and abiding interest in the hospital's completion resulted in his being named to the board of directors, where he served until his death.

Marty was past-president and long time member of the Springdale Chamber of Commerce, one of the original members and past-president of the Springdale Country Club, a long time member of Rotary Club having served as president, secretary and on the board of directors. During the late 1940s, Marty was instrumental in bringing in many of Springdale's major industrial plants.

Like his father before him, Marty Stafford was dedicated to his work as editor-publisher, forever working toward and supporting a better home town and community.

His death came suddenly and unexpectedly. He died of a heart attack at Springdale Memorial Hospital, March 20, 1957.

After Marty's death in 1957, Bucket became the majority stockholder and publisher of The Springdale News and reorganized the corporation with Bob Sanders as editor, Maudine Farish, Secretary and herself as publisher.

Upon Bucket's retirement in 1958, Bobby (Bob Sanders' wife) came into the corporation as vice-president. Bob, was made managing editor and Maudine Farish, associate editor.

In 1958, T. C. Sanders, Bob's younger brother, who had been in Lithographic work since his return from WWII, joined the News organization and took over the commercial printing division. It was May 6, 1960, when Maudine Farish and T. C. Sanders were married.

Jim Morriss, the present managing editor of the News (1988) grew up at the News office, much as the Stafford boys and the Sanders brothers had. He started with sweeping out and as "printer's devil", just as they had. When Jim graduated from U of A with a degree in journalism, he was made managing editor of The Springdale News.

Mrs. E. R. Stafford, 1937-1958.

On July 4, 1962 another Sanders came into the corporation. Charles E. Sanders, printer and lithographer, was named general manager over the whole Springdale News operation and was named to the board of directors of the corporation.

The staff at this time included: R. R. (Bob) Sanders as editor-publisher; Mrs. T. C. (Maudine) Sanders, associate editor, society news; Mrs. R. R. (Bobby) Sanders, associate editor, bookkeeper; Charles E. Sanders, general manager; T. C. Sanders, lithographer, printer; Mrs. Janet Weiser, advertising director; and Jim Morriss managing editor.

Just as the Stafford brothers were weaned from milk to printer's ink, so were the Sanders brothers. Bob Sanders was a "printer's devil" while a high school student in Taft, Texas and had his first regular job on the Taft Tribune, a weekly publication.

Robert R. Sanders, 1946-1963.

He began a weekly paper of his own in 1931, and in 1935, went to Beeville, Texas as sports editor for their weekly paper. In 1937, he became editor of the Kenedy, Texas weekly paper and married Bobby Homeyer. Bob remained in Kenedy until his military service during World War II. It was while stationed at Fort Sam Houston that he met Louis Lichlyter, and Buel Rose of Springdale.

After the war, a classified ad for an ad man at the Springdale News led him to Springdale where he subsequently became editor and publisher.

Both younger brothers followed Bob into the newspaper business. T. C. not only melted lead for typesetting at the same Taft, Texas weekly paper but mowed the editor's yard as well. Before the start of World War II, T. C. had begun working in offset printing.

An aerial photographer during the war, T. C. was among the photographers who filmed the aftermath, the horror of what had been destroyed and that which remained after the atom bomb was dropped on Japan.

Charles Sanders, the youngest of the brothers followed in the footsteps of both brothers as "printer's devil." During the war, he went into the Navy as a printer third class and came out printer first class.

As a member of the Pacific Fleet print shop, Charles did everything from sending coded messages to processing the V-mail service men in the Pacific theater of war received. During the war, V-mail was photographed on 16mm rolls. Each roll held about 1,800 letters. These letters were dispatched to Honolulu where Charles processed them and printed them out on identical sheets of paper in the print shop. This knowledge of photolithography has been one of many assets he brought to the News staff.

In 1963 Bob Sanders sold his interest in the paper to T. C., Maudine and Charles Sanders and retired. The company was then reorganized and named The Springdale Publishing Company, Inc. with T. C. becoming publisher and president of the company, Charles, vice-president and editor and Maudine Sanders, associate editor and secretary-treasurer.

Another major change was made in the production of the paper, when in late 1963 the News joined other newspapers throughout the country in turning to lithographic (offset) printing. Four units of a Goss Community press were installed in the building which is now the First National Bank Community Room.

Operations continued in the two buildings until July 10, 1970, when the last edition of the Springdale News was published at the West Emma Avenue location.

Three years later on July 10, 1973, just eight days after the Springdale News was sold to the Donrey Media Group, Bob Sanders suffered a fatal heart attack. T. C. Sanders died from a heart condition on October 10, 1983.

Donrey Media Group is headquartered in Fort Smith. It is a communications giant in newspaper publishing, TV, radio and outdoor advertising reaching across the Pacific from the Hawaiian Islands to states throughout the west and midwest. Donrey owns radio station KBRS in Springdale, as well.

Charles Sanders remained with the News staff as general manager until he retired in 1982. Dan Smith succeeded Charles Sanders as general manager of the news and remained until December of 1986 when he was promoted to general manager of Donrey's Pine Bluff Commercial.

Gene Kincy, Lowell, was promoted from the Donrey owned Herald-Shopper, Oskaloosa, Iowa and named general manager of the News succeeding Smith.

In 100 years, there have been many changes at the News, none more obvious than its staff size since that first Springdale issue was written, typeset, printed and circulated by a staff of one. The staff now numbers 52.

The News, for years, had maintained its own office supply business and operated their own commercial print shop. The News printed thousands of the Rodeo of the Ozark Programs over the years as well as books, booklets and other outside commercial orders. M & F Office Supplies bought out the News office supply business in 1969 and Phil, Jr. and Beverly Phillips purchased the print shop and its equipment and supplies in 1973.

One thing has not changed. The Springdale News still works to bring the best written and printed copy to Springdale and its subscribers by the most modern and work effective methods devised. Editorials still speak of the benefits that await all who come to northwest Arkansas and choose to remain.

According to Maudine Sanders, history doesn't so much repeat itself as it remains basically the same for those who fight so hard to effect change for the better while they hold on tightly to that which has proven good. A good newspaper holds up a mirror for all of us to see ourselves, good, bad and indifferent. We can't blame the news; we make it.

Steele Enterprises

Canning Industry Developed By Steele

Price C. Steele, born 1880, moved to Bedford County, Tennessee with his wife Elizabeth B. Cooper Steele prior to 1824. There Price was a farmer and an associate justice of the Bedford County Court. Price died in Tennessee in 1881. Their son Marion DeKalb Steele was born in Bedford County, Tennessee in 1824.

April 1966, Joe and Gretchen Steele, Popeye, Charlotte, Meagan and Phillip Steele.

December 1966, Joe Steele.

Joseph Marion Steele.

Marion attended medical school at age nineteen in Tennessee and upon receiving his medical degree moved to Lawrence County, Arkansas where he practiced his profession for several years. He first married Francis S. Poor of Lawrence County, Arkansas in 1849. Dr. Steele and Francis had two children; William B. Steele and Elizabeth, who later married William D. Wasson from Springtown, Arkansas.

In 1856 Dr. Steele and his family left Lawrence County en route to Pineville, Missouri, where they planned to join a wagon train to the West. Stopping in Elm Springs, Arkansas, they found a typhoid epidemic in the region and, since there were no doctors in the region, he delayed his trip to Pineville and to the West to help the sick.

Dr. Steele's wife, Francis, became ill and died in 1860. Dr. Steele decided to stay in Elm Springs where he helped organize the Methodist Episcopal Church there and served as the church's first minister.

Dr. Steele took as his second wife Mary Elisabeth Johnson Deaver who had been his first wife's nurse during her illness. Marion and Mary Deaver Steele had the following children: Thomas D. Steele who married Nellie Hobbs; James Cooper Steele, who married Sarah Anna Hudson, Joseph A. Steele, who married Jennie Venable, Mary, Sarah Francis, Hattie S., and David A. Steele.

Dr. Marion Steele continued his medical practice in Elm Springs until 1874 at which time he built a general store and served as postmaster for the community.

James Cooper Steele, son of Marion DeKalb and Mary Deaver Steele, was born August 28, 1864. James married Sarah Anna Hudson of Cassville, Missouri in 1893. Sarah was born near Pierce City, Missouri May 3, 1867. James and Sarah Anna had the following children on their farm in the Steele Community some five miles south of Tontitown, Arkansas: Mary LaRue, who married Alf Baird; Beulah, October 12, 1896, who married Orlen Greathouse; Hattie Marie, February 14, 1902, and Joseph Marion, April 1, 1905.

James Cooper Steele operated a general store, a funeral parlor, and was depot agent for the Arkansas, Oklahoma and Western Railroad that passed through the Steele Community. James Cooper died August 3, 1916. His wife, Sarah Anna Steele, died in Springdale, Arkansas August 3, 1945.

Joseph Marion Steele was born April 1, 1905. He was age eleven when his father James Cooper Steele died. Joe found it necessary at an early age to take over management of his father's farm and business enterprises. Wanting to attend the University of Arkansas, he set up a crude canning factory on his father's farm with a $500 loan from a Springdale bank. Tomatoes were most abundant in the region, and he canned and sold enough tomatoes to afford tuition to the University of Arkansas, Fayetteville; for three years. By 1924, he left college to spend full time in his canning business. As his business grew he expanded into numerous other vegetable products, and in the mid 1930s acquired the Springdale Canning Company. Rapidly growing throughout the World War II years, as a result of large government contracts, Steele Canning Company grew to become a sixteen plant operation with plant facilities producing over one hundred different products throughout Texas, Arkansas, Oklahoma and Missouri.

Joe M. Steele first married Nannie Webster in 1927. Joe and Nannie had the following children: Nancy Jo, born January 1, 1932; Marjorie Lee, born September 23, 1935. Nancy married Arthur Rubeck of Fort Smith, Arkansas, June 12, 1955. The Rubecks reside in Irving, Texas where their children, Janet Lynn (Shingleton) was born October 9, 1960 and Thomas was born September 24, 1962. Marjorie Lee Steele married Jim Brooks on August 28, 1954. Their children are as follows: Joe Gunter Brooks born May 28, 1955; Stephen Layne and Karen Lee (Cannella) Brooks born August 18, 1956; and Jimmy Douglas born July 9, 1959.

Joseph Marion and Nannie were divorced, and Joe then married Gretchen Gilliland (Broyles) on March 18, 1938. Gretchen's first husband Wayne Clayton Broyles had died September 21, 1937. Their son, Phillip Wayne, born July 20, 1934, was age three at the time of his mother's marriage to Joe M. Steele.

Joe Steele also became interested in the banking business in the 1940s at which time he acquired stock in the First State Bank of Springdale. In addition to his canning company and banking enterprises, he was a partner with his cousin, Luther Johnson, of Springdale, in the poultry and feed business known as Johnson and Steele.

Johnson and Steele, one of the region's first poultry firms, operated until the death of Luther Johnson in 1956, at which time most of the company's assets were sold to another pioneer poultry man, John Tyson.

Joe Steele's canning operation grew to be one of the nation's largest privately owned canning companies. One factor contributing to the growth of this company was the introduction of Popeye Spinach in 1965. Phillip Steele, who had joined his father's business, after college, in 1957, negotiated a contract with King Features Syndicate, owners of the Popeye cartoon character. This resulted in the company's rapid growth and Springdale becoming the spinach capitol of the world.

In 1972, Steele Canning Company was sold to Pioneer Food Industries, a publicly owned rice producing firm of Dewitt, Arkansas. The Steeles maintained Forrest Park Canning Co. of Johnson, Arkansas until 1982 at which time that facility was acquired by the Allen Canning Company.

Joe Steele's interest in the financial community continued to grow throughout the years until he became the major stock holder and Chairman of the Board of First State Bank. Along with his son, Phillip Steele, a major interest was acquired in Springdale AQ Enterprises in 1973. Through AQ, Ole South Foods of Little Rock was acquired. Shortly before his death in June of 1976, Joe helped his son form Good Old Days Foods, Inc., of Springdale and Little Rock, Arkansas.

Other than his own interest in his banking and food industry enterprises, Joe Steele was an active leader in the early development of Springdale and northwest Arkansas and in city and state government. He served on the Springdale City Council for over twenty years and was chairman of Springdale's Industrial Commission for the last ten years of his life. Through this work, he was responsible for many of the successful industries that have located in Springdale.

Serving on Springdale's Water and Sewer Commission for over thirty years, Joe Steele's vision for northwest Arkansas' future resulted in the development of Beaver Lake and the Beaver Water District. The Beaver Water Treatment Plant, named in Joe Steele's honor, first served the city of Springdale and greatly contributed to the industrial growth of this city.

Joe Steele served his city in numerous capacities. As a member of the Springdale Memorial Hospital Board of Directors for some twenty years, he helped develop that facility. As a member of the board of directors of First United Methodist Church, he served as chairman of the finance committee for over twenty years. He was honored with the Beaver Award for his many years of work and contributions to the Boy Scouts of America. Actively involved with the Springdale Chamber of Commerce, Joe Steele served as chairman of the Chamber's Industrial Development Committee over the last ten years of his life.

He was also actively involved with state government and served as a director on the Arkansas Industrial Development Commission; as director on the Arkansas State Fair Board, as a member of the Arkansas Racing Commission and, for over twenty years, was director on the Arkansas State Police Commission.

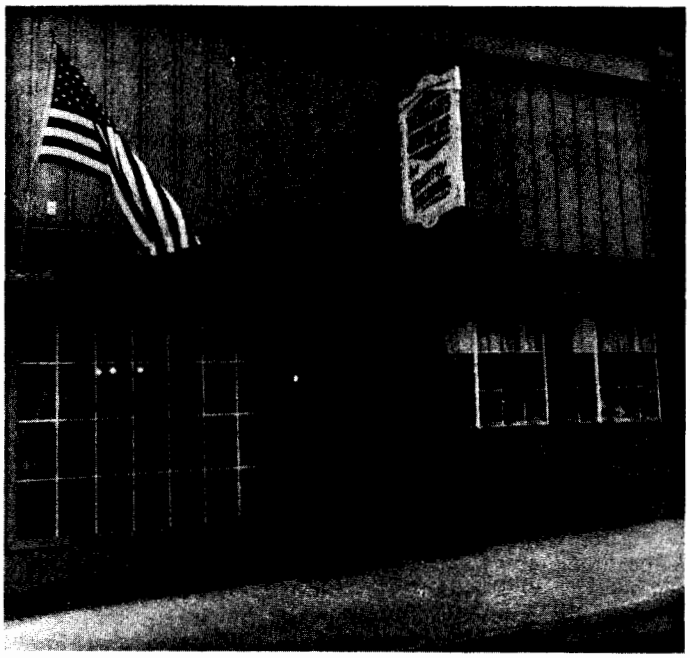
He served his industry as a member of the board of directors of the national Food Processors Association and the Ozark food Processors Association as a director and two-term president. He was active in the Arkansas Bankers and National bankers Associations where he served on many committees over the years.

Joe Steele not only provided many jobs for northwest Arkansas citizens through his industrial and banking enterprises but also through his numerous and unselfish contributions to his city and state. He remained actively involved with the enterprises he loved until his death on June 6, 1976.

Tatman's Jewelry Store
"Quality First"

Michael A. and Betty Nell Tatman, as owners of Tatman's Jewelry Store, 101 West Emma, Springdale, inspire the same kind of confidence and trust to their customer-clientele that doctors, dentists, pastors and bankers do.

This family business was founded over 40 years ago by Betty Nell's parents, W. Robert and Gracie Nell Hastings. At the time of her father's retirement in 1968, he had been a jeweler and watchmaker for more than 50 years.



Tatman's Jewelry on Emma Avenue, Springdale, Arkansas.

Bob Hastings began watchmaking and jewelry repair in Joplin, Missouri. In 1946, he moved his family to Siloam springs and opened his own jewelry store, Hastings Jewelry.

The Hastings worked together, husband and wife, instilling traditional values in their children that meant more than good business. Their children learned to apply these values to life as well.

Betty Nell learned, literally, at her father's knee the importance of quality and service not only to the jewelry customer but in whatever vocation she and her siblings chose to dedicate themselves.

Mike Tatman was born and grew up in Siloam Springs. He and Betty Nell knew one another in high school. After graduation, he enlisted in the Air Force, and Betty went to nurse's training at Hillcrest Medical Center in Tulsa, Oklahoma.

Mike served four years in the Air Force "Special Weapons" while stationed at San Antonio, Biloxi, Albuquerque and Fairbanks, Alaska. He returned to Siloam Springs about the time Betty Nell graduated from nurse's training, and in August of 1958, they were married.

Betty Nell worked as a nurse at Siloam Springs Hospital. Mike had attended the University of Arkansas for a year, but went to work as a lathe operator for Webb Wheel after their marriage.

He and Betty both helped out at Hastings Jewelry whenever a special sale was held. It was at this time (about 1960) when Mr. Hastings began to scout new locations for his expanding jewelry store business. After looking over census records and studying newspapers and business trends, he felt that the continued growth of Springdale was a good indicator that a business like his would succeed there. Since it was centrally located to most of the population in northwest Arkansas, it fit in with Hastings' plans.

The Hastings moved business and household from Siloam Springs to Springdale in 1960. Their first store location was on the south side of West Emma Avenue. Within a couple of years they would move across the street, and, over the years, they would move back and forth across Emma Avenue.

Mike and Betty Nell still helped out in Hastings' store when they could.

It was about this time that Mike's job slowed down to three days work each week, and when Hastings suggested that Mike take up Horology (the study of time and timepieces, making of parts and repair) and come into the family business, Mike decided to follow through on the suggestion.

Mike enrolled in Southwest State Teachers College in Weatherford, Oklahoma. It was during Mike's schooling that Mr. Hastings suffered a heart attack. Mike completed his course of study in half the time that was normally required (with the cooperation of the college) going to school night and day and working part time in order to complete his degree.

During this time Mrs. Hastings ran the Hastings Jewelry Store almost singlehandedly. When fully recovered, Mr. Hastings returned to the store, and Mike came into the family business on completion of college.

They worked together until Hasting's retirement in 1968. At this time Mike took over the management of the jewelry store, and in 1969 Mike and Betty Nell bought the Hastings Jewelry Store.

After the Tatmans purchased the business, Betty Nell only worked in the store part time. She was working full time as Dr. Ralph Power's office nurse. She remained with Gracie Nell, Betty Nell and William Robert Hastings.

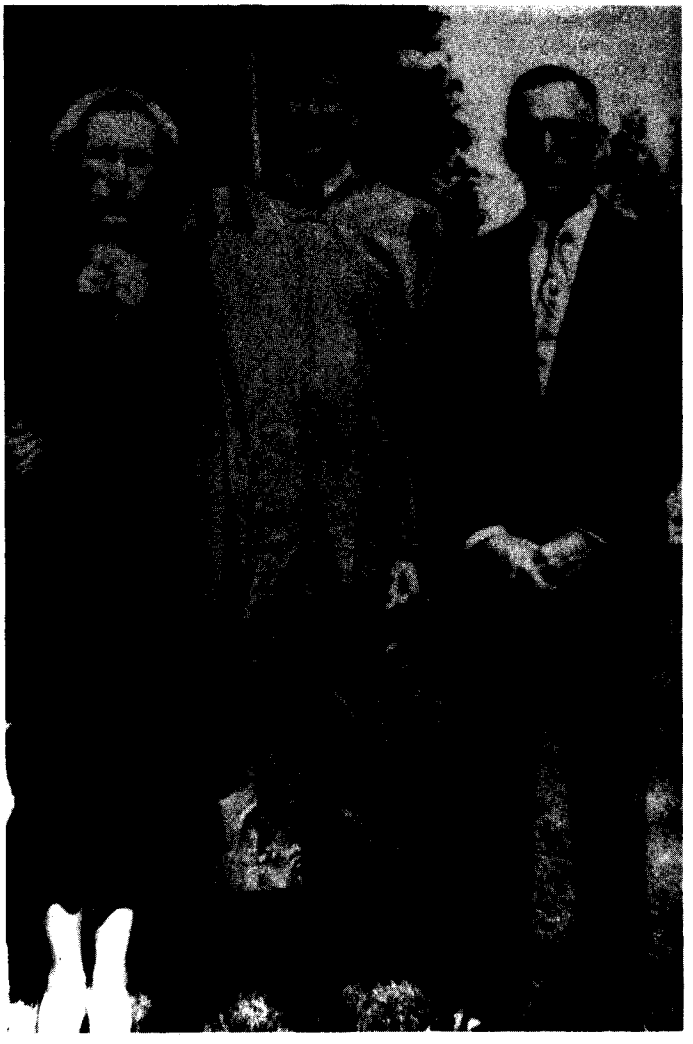
Michael and Betty Hastings Tatman, Fall 1952.



Johnnie, Michael and Paul Tatman (1953).

Power for over 10 years.

When the business became Tatman's Jewelry, Mike wanted to institute a catchy phrase or slogan that would represent his philosophy as a jeweler and still express the continuation of the quality service Hastings had always given its customers.

It was Mike's father, Paul Allen Tatman, who finally coined the the simple phrase: "Quality First." Paul Tatman and his wife, Johnnie, were still living in Siloam Springs at the time, and Paul had retired after suffering a stroke. His speech was difficult and labored. Even speaking thoses two words, "Quality first", had required great effort. However they were the right words, and his contribution was greatly appreciated. "Quality First" continues to say it all in a business dependent on repeat customers.

Tatman's Jewelry relocated to the south side of Emma Avenue, leasing a building recently purchased (at that time) by Dr. E. L. McNally. On May 12, 1984, the adjacent store, Otasco's caught fire and spread to Tatman's Jewelry.

Whether homeowner, business owner, parent, child, young or old, fire as a destroyer of human lives and property is dreaded on a universal basis. The Tatmans had to stand by and watch their dreams go up in smoke.

While they made no effort to risk their lives to save merchandise, they quickly gathered forces to save the antique Seth Thomas Clock that Betty Nell's parents had purchased during the second world war. It had stood in every family jewelry store location, and the irreplaceable workmanship had been a source of pride and delight to Betty Nell's father and mother.

Its mercury pendulum had been handmade and is unequaled by today's standards. Mike struggled with the bolts (bolted to the wall) and managed to free the clock while everything else was left to firemen or the smoke.

An old steel vault the Hastings had bought from a bank in Humboldt, Kansas made it through the fire with little damage. Eighty years old or better, a new coat of paint was all it needed. It still serves the store today (1988).

The fire required a temporary move across the street on West Emma, to the building now occupied by the J. L. Prudden Real Estate Office. Tatman's Jewelry remained there for two years until they purchased a building on the south side of West Emma Avenue from Francis Underhill. Formerly the home of Camp's Clothing store, this building remains their present and projected permanent location (1988).

The building's interior was stripped, refinished and redecorated to Betty Nell's design. Creating the homelike, informal decor was relatively easy for her. She simply used collectibles and handmade items similar to those she and Mike had collected over the years.

She used quilts, table covers, hand dipped candles, hand painted wood and artwork, baskets, hand loomed place mats, etc. These craft items became a part of their store inventory and a shopping attraction as early as 1970.

"Early Americana has been a hobby of Mike's and mine for years. We enjoyed it so much that we decided to share it with others. This was before the 'country' theme was so popular. We enjoy craft items and have done surprisingly well with them," Betty Nell said.

"So much of our time is spent here in the store, we feel right at home. We have a refrigerator, microwave and breakroom in the back. We eat breakfast and lunch here, and we relax. Business is not discussed over meals or breaks," Mike added.

The store, offices and breakroom include 3,000 square feet. Today's jewelry stores tend to cut back on space and specialty items. The fine china, crystal and other gift items once so popular have moved into department stores at malls and in specialty shops. Fine jewelry remains the focus.

The Tatmans receive more custom made jewelry requests than ever before, and Mike continues to cast and produce while Betty remains involved in designing the jewelry. Both continue to study and attend workshops relating to the design and making of jewelry.

"You see heirloom jewelry brought in more and more for remounting and redesigning. There was a time great-aunt Minnie's ring was kept in a vault, rarely seeing daylight. Or mother's brooch might have been worn on occasion, but now the jewels or gold are being redesigned and remounted in dramatic new ways. I see a greater appreciation for custom made jewelry that can be worn comfortably on a daily basis," Tatman said.

Mike still does some watch and jewelry repair and continues to make and replace parts, but he has more repair business than hours in the day, so he sends out a lot of his work to an Horologist he has dealt with for more than 20 years.

In the tradition of family business, their only daughter, Stephanie, has grown up in the store. Before she could walk, she could be found in a playpen at the store during busy times when both parents and grandmother were working. Grandmother still works, at 85, three days a week.

Primarily in charge of job entries and mailouts, Gracie Nell still waits on customers if and when the need arises while Stephanie, a senior and a marketing major at the University of Arkansas, has ideas about creative marketing and enjoys working with figures and arranging displays.

Only available to work in the store part time, Stephanie still teaches dance students at studios in both Rogers and Springdale and has taught since her senior year at Springdale High School.

Mike and Betty have continued to serve not only customers but church and community as well. Betty Nell maintains memberships in Beta Sigma Phi, Order of the Eastern Star, and the Sisterhood of PEO. For over 20 years, she has served as chaperone to the Rodeo Queens. Together, she and Mike are actively involved with the Schneider Class at First United Methodist Church, Springdale; and have worked over the years with the youth of the church.

Mike has been a board member of Rodeo of the Ozarks (he presently serves as treasurer), the Springdale Chamber of Commerce and Rotary Club. Mike is a 32nd Degree Mason and past Master of Lodge # 316, Springdale.

Mike claims that there would be no Tatman's Jewelry business without Betty's help. In addition to helping with customers and designing jewelry, she keeps books and writes the checks.

Betty returns the ball to Mike's court, claiming there would be no family business had he not chosen to purchase it from her father and developed the skill, knowledge and love for the business he has acquired over the years.

Joint cooperation and hard work has been required from both Betty and Mike to make Tatman's the successful Springdale business it has become.

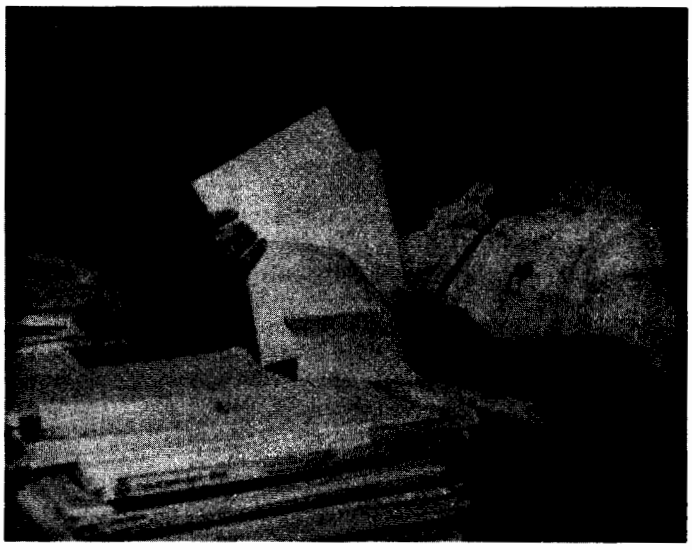
The Tatmans' love for Springdale is evident in conversation commending the fire and police departments, and in describing other downtown Springdale businesses.

Tatman's has become a jewel of a business. Together, Mike and Betty Nell they have designed, cut, polished and signed it "Quality First."

John W. Vinzant, M. D.

Local Physician Fulfills Dream

The long, low brick building at 22 East Spring Street in Fayetteville has housed Dr. John W. Vinzant's "Family Practice" since 1960. This one location is where Vinzant has built his practice and where he sees or treats the 3,000 patients that are under his care.



Dr. John W. Vinzant, 1988.

Vinzant was born in Radcliffe, Arkansas; Logan County. Since his father was a county agent, his family moved every two or three years; so Vinzant grew up in towns all over Arkansas from Sheridan to Hamburg to Augusta.

Before becoming a doctor, Vinzant was an Air Force pilot for nine years. During World War II, he served as a pilot in the Pacific Theater, mainly on Saipan, in the Marianna Islands. Later, during the Korean Conflict, he was stationed in England and taught Great Britain's pilots air-to-air refueling.

Decorated during both WWII and Korea, he received several Battle Stars and an Air Medal. After his release, he attended the University of Arkansas Medical School on the GI bill.

"From the time I was two years old I knew I'd be a doctor. I can't tell you how I knew. None of my family were doctors. I just knew. Even at two, I carried a little black box camera around pretending it was a doctor's black bag. I told everyone, 'I'm Dr. Vinzant.'"

In 1957, at age 32, Vinzant graduated from University of Arkansas (U of A) Medical School. He then served his residency at the University Hospital, Little Rock, and at the VA Hospital in Little Rock.

His first Family Practice associate was a young doctor from Harrison, Arkansas; Rodney Baker. Baker left to go into Institutional Medicine in 1972. Other associates have included doctors, David Martin and Gene Joyce.

"Fayetteville has been a good place to practice medicine. I own this building now. My x-ray machine was twelve thousand dollars, when I bought it. Young doctors, today, starting out like I did would have to pay at least fifty thousand dollars for a comparable machine. It's much harder today to establish a successful general practice," Vinzant said, "even more prohibitive to establish a specialty practice."

Vinzant's newest associate is Dr. Larry D. Tuttle who has been with him since 1980. "He's an Oklahoman. He graduated medical school there, too. His father was a general practitioner. I guess family practice is in his blood," Vinzant said.

According to Vinzant, Tuttle will take over more and more of the practice as Vinzant slows down. Tuttle's wife, Debbie, helps out, clerically, when needed.

The 'slowing down' isn't evident from a computer printout of their patient count. Vinzant averaged 493 patients and Tuttle saw 483 in the month of March 1988.

22 East Spring Street, Fayetteville, Arkansas.

Each doctor has his own nurse. Vinzant's nurse is Tommie Thomas; Tuttle's is Betty Knight. Vinzant's sister, Ruth Chestnut has been the only family member to work for him. She's been his receptionist since 1966. Betty Mathias is his office manager.

Vinzant's daughter, Sara, has three children of her own. His son, John, is in management with Texas Instruments, Dallas. His youngest son, Tommy is following dad's footsteps but not in medicine—in the Air Force.

Vinzant provides medical care from pediatric to geriatric patients. The last few years, however, have seen an increase in geriatric patients (along with the increase in life expectancy). This increase means that Vinzant not only serves on staff at Washington Regional Hospital, Fayetteville, and Springdale Memorial Hospital but on the board of governors at City Hospital, Fayetteville. In addition, he is board chairman for Antaeus Institute and Medical Laboratory, Fayetteville.

Much of the Family Practice is devoted to surgery, and office and staff are equipped to handle minor surgery (surgery that can be done with a local anesthetic being administered). Vinzant estimated that about 50% of his present patient care includes surgery, some of which is for simple skin lesions (some skin malignancies) and biopsies.

As an associate professor of Family and Community Medicine, through the U of A and in cooperation with Arkansas Health Education Center (AHEC), Fayetteville, Vinzant teaches medical school seniors and resident doctors for six to eight weeks at a time. He allows the young would-be resident doctors to assist him in patient care. They help administer physicals to the pre-school entrants (4, 5 and 6 year-olds). He enjoys keeping his hand in this area of medicine and feels it gives him more insight—especially when a young student shares his own views on the practice of medicine.

Medical conventions are an ongoing part of a doctor's educational process. June 20, 1988, Vinzant and his wife, Nona, attended the University of South Carolina's Medical Convention in Charleston, South Carolina. Because of Charleston's history and charm, they took a little extra time in order to visit with friends and become sight-seeing tourists.

Nona Vinzant is a recovery room nurse at City Hospital, Fayetteville, and according to Vinzant, often attends conventions on her own arriving before he does.

One of Vinzant's more memorable conventions included a cruise to England. The memory he values is of two visits to hospitals considered to be the royal line of Great Britain's hospitals.

The Marsden Hospital, London; is a hospital that specializes in malignancy treatment and research. The other, Brompton Hospital, London; specializes in cardio-vascular disease and treatment. Dr. Vinzant was privileged to sit in on new treatments and procedures both hospitals were developing.

"I'm opposed to most socialized medicine practiced in Canada and Great Britain, but their emergency treatment of patients is unsurpassed. The best place to have a heart attack or a gall bladder attack is right on the streets of England. You are taken care of within minutes," Vinzant said.

"However," he continued, "office patient care and scheduled surgery there is a disaster. The system used has been in effect since 1908 (patients are assigned area doctors and aren't allowed to transfer unless they choose to pay for their own medical care). I can imagine what an American patient would say to a doctor in this country if told he would be able to have a hernia repaired in three years or gall bladder surgery in a year."

Vinzant's travels have increased his admiration for medical practice and specialized medicine in northwest Arkansas. It is his feeling that this part of Arkansas is ahead of most of the world including other areas of the United States.

"If I had it to do over," he said, "I'd still become a doctor, but I'd probably have specialized in thoracic surgery or cardio-vascular disease and surgery. We have just about every kind of equipment and medical facility right here in this area to equal treatment anywhere."

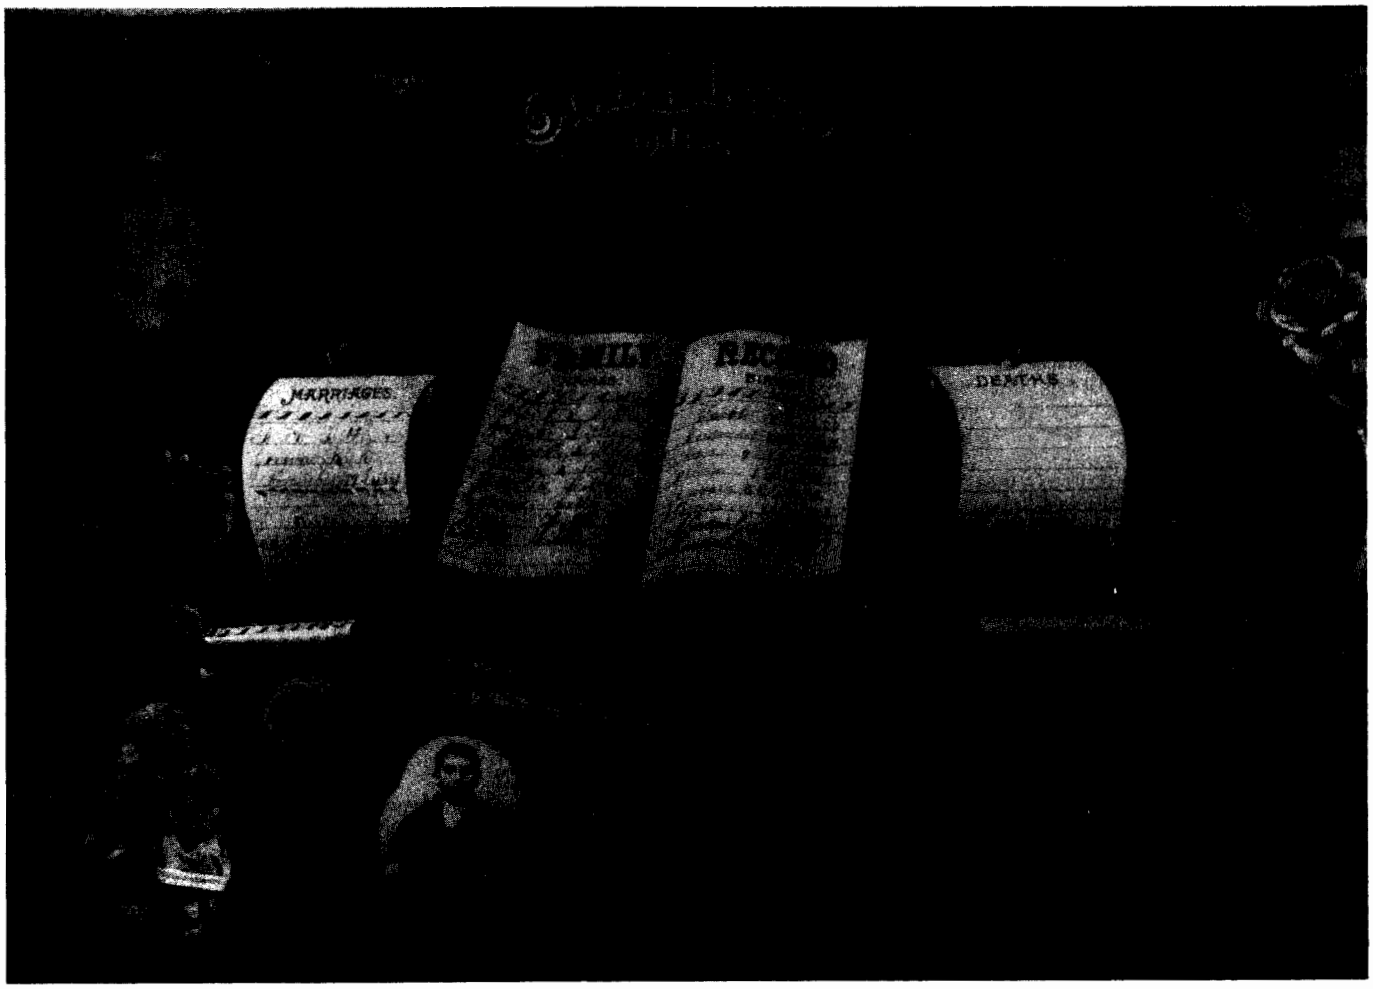
"About the only need I see is for another endocrinologist and another gastroenterologist to come to the area,' Vinzant added.

Vinzant claims that he will be taking longer vacations as his work load lightens (he now averages 70 hours a week), but he shows no signs of slowing down. In fact, the coming year's schedule is "family practice, as usual."

Cornerstone Families

Introduction

"Cornerstone" families are those who contributed financially toward the publication of this book. Many of these families were of fundamental importance in the establishment of communities in the area. Their roots run deep through the nineteenth, twentieth, and now into the twenty-first centuries. Still others who have come more recently to the area have exhibited an appreciation of the county's heritage and have generously supported its continued growth by their contributions.



Gretchen Steele Adams

Gretchen Steele Adams is the daughter of Joseph Dalton Gilliland (1880-1972) and Irena Ann Roberts (1884-1967). Gretchen was born in Goshen, Arkansas, July 9, 1911, and her sister Nettie Inez, August 26, 1905.

Joseph Gilliland was the son of Strauther Lawrence Gilliland (1840-1922) and Mary Elizabeth Phillips (1851-1928).

Strauther Lawrence Gilliland was the son of Allen Gilliland of Texas. Mary Elizabeth Phillips, the daughter of John Bessie Phillips of Goshen, Arkansas, along with numerous other Goshen citizens walked to Texas during the Civil War to escape the ravages of war in the region. Taken in by the Gilliland family, Mary married Strauther in Texas and returned to Goshen, Arkansas, to settle on her fathers land.

Irena Anna Roberts was the daughter of Nathaniel Green Roberts (1854-1935) and Laura Etta Hester. Meeting Joe Gilliland at a church picnic, they were married July 24, 1904.

Gretchen Gilliland attended Peabody High School in Fayetteville, Arkansas, and Fayetteville Business College. She married Wayne Clayton Broyles in 1932. Wayne, born March 7, 1911, died in California September 21, 1937. Their only child, Phillip Wayne, was born July 20, 1934.

Gretchen then married Joseph Marion Steele March 18, 1938. Shortly after the marriage her husband adopted her young son, Phillip. Joseph "Joe" Steele born April 1, 1905, died June 6, 1976. Gretchen then married William Allen Adams, born February 11, 1909, on March 24, 1984.

Gretchen was one of the founders of the Beta Sigma Phi sorority in Springdale. She has served on the board of the First United Methodist Church of Springdale. As a china painter she has been active in the regions china painters club as a teacher for many years. Upon the death of her second husband, Joe Steele, she served as chairman of the board of directors of the First State Bank of Arkansas until the bank was sold to Worthen Banking Corporation in 1982. She currently continues to serve as an honorary board member with the First State Bank.

C. Stanley Applegate, M. D.

For more than 100 years, the family name Applegate has been a familiar one to residents in northwest Arkansas. It was first associated in the area with Applegate Drug which was founded in Rogers in 1881, but more recently with Dr. C. Stanley Applegate, Jr., of Springdale and the Springdale Clinic.

Following the Applegate family line, however, takes one thousands of miles away from northwest Arkansas, and hundreds of years from the late 19th century. In fact, one can reach back 12 generations from the Applegates of Springdale in 1987, to a John Applegate who lived in Butterwick on the Isle of Axholme in England in 1500. John had a son, John, who fathered six children, the youngest of whom was Thomas, who had a son also named Thomas. It was this Thomas Applegate, born about 1600 and great-grandson of John Applegate of Butterwick, who sailed to the English Colonies around 1635.

Thomas made a home for himself in the New World, gaining a license from the Massachusetts Bay Colony to operate a ferry between Weymouth and Braintree. He married and produced a son, Bartholomew, who then settled with his family in Middlesex, New Jersey. The Applegates dug their roots into the New England soil and stayed put for a couple of centuries - through Bartholomew's son, Daniel, and his son, Bartholomew, and his descendant, Jacob, and his son, William, and his son, Jacob Applegate.

Timothy, however, married Eliza Clark, a woman from Johnson County, Indiana, and began to move west. Timothy and Eliza took up farming, settling near Lawrenceville, Illinois. The farm, unfortunately, wasn't large enough to support a family of eight children, so two sons, J. E. (also called Joseph) and Fred packed their bags in 1881, and headed even further west, lighting first near Joplin in southwest Missouri. Finding no work, they boarded a train on the Frisco Railroad and disembarked at Brightwater, Arkansas; from there they caught the mail hack into Rogers (then known as Escalaypia). And in Rogers, they found a business opportunity which became the anchor for the Applegate family in northwest Arkansas. In late 1881 the two men, both trained as pharmacists, bought the Pennington and McNese Drug Store, a one-story frame building fronted by the only board sidewalk in town. The business, renamed Applegate Drug, was one of the first businesses in Rogers.

A romantic sidelight to this story underscores the difficulties in long distance communication during those years. Before leaving Illinois, J. E. Applegate had been courting a young lady named Anna Buchanan. When brother Fred decided against life on the Arkansas frontier and opted to return to Illinois, J. E. asked him to carry a message to Anna, a proposal of marriage. Fred put the letter in his coat pocket and promptly forgot about it for several months. Not until he donned his good coat again to attend a wedding did he remember the letter, and meeting Anna at the wedding, presented it to her.

When J. E. did not hear from Anna for so long a time, he began courting another girl in Rogers. Likewise, Anna, hearing only silence from J. E. in Arkansas, began seeing another young man. That is, until she received his proposal. Then she acted quickly, writing him immediately. When J. E. got Anna's letter, he also responded with haste, catching the train to Lawrenceville and marrying Anna on December 3, 1884, more than three years after having left.

Anna and J. E. had eight children born during the late 1880s and early 1890s, all of whom were trained as pharmacists, except one daughter who died at 13. Of the remaining seven offspring, four had children, five of whom survived childhood.

And of these five, one was Charles Stanley Applegate, Jr., born June 23, 1920, at Ft. Smith, and raised in Rogers. He attended public schools there and graduated in 1938 after quarterbacking the State Championship football team in 1936, and playing on a team that went to the State Basketball Tournament in 1937. The summer after his graduation, during the last years of the Depression, Applegate worked on a farm in Clarksville for his cousin, J. G. Puterbaugh. He was paid $2.50 a day, one dollar of which he set aside for his college education. Those saved dollars, each one matched by his father, amounted to enough to send him to the University of Arkansas at Fayetteville in the fall.

Applegate Family

He graduated from the University in 1942 with a bachelor of science degree, after having worked during summers at the Welch Grape Juice plant in Springdale as a chemist. During the school year he jerked sodas at the university student union, a job which entitled him to a free lunch. Transportation between home and school every day cost him a quarter.

Applegate entered Medical School in Little Rock where he spent the remaining years of World War II in the Army Specialized Training Program, graduating in May, 1945. The next month he married Jeanne Lanahan of Hot Springs, daughter of Col. Charles R. and Martha Walker Lanahan. Their children were born Jo Anne in 1946, and Charles S. Applegate III in 1948.

J. E. Applegate home, Rogers, Arkansas.

During these years immediately after the war, Applegate seemed constantly on the move. After a year's internship in Little Rock, he was assigned as a First Lieutenant in the Army Medical Corps at the Army Navy Hospital in Hot Springs working in orthopedics. Following that was a year in Korea at the 71st Station Hospital, also in orthopedics.

In 1948, he was discharged from the service. Dr. Applegate returned to northwest Arkansas and opened a general practice office in the old labor camp on East Caudle Avenue in Springdale.

Annabel and C. Stanley Applegate

The year 1953 was a major one in the life of the Applegate family. In March both Jeanne and an infant son died in childbirth. Then a few months later, during the summer, a poliomyelitis epidemic broke out in Springdale. At the time there were four doctors practicing in the area, including Dr. Applegate. Of those four, Dr. John W. Dorman and Dr. Ed Wheat both came down with polio and ended up in the hospital. That left Dr. Applegate, who believed he had had polio as a child, and Dr. Friedman Sisco to handle the crisis. Dr. Applegate called on Dr. John Ralph Power of Nashville, Arkansas, who had been recently discharged from the Army, to help out in the emergency.

After the epidemic passed and Dr. Dorman recovered, he, Dr. Power, and Dr. Applegate joined in forming the Springdale Clinic. They moved the practice into a new building on Meadow Avenue in February, 1954. A year after his wife, Jeanne, died, Dr. Applegate married his first cousin, Annabel, the daughter of Timothy Page and Maggie Floyd Applegate. Annabel raised Jo Anne and Charles, Applegate's children, as her own. Jo Anne later married Chester Vogt and had two children, Michael Charles and Emily Ann. Charles married Jan Boyd; their son Jason Andrew was born in 1975. In 1984, at age nine, Jason received a "Recognition Plaque" from the Boy Scouts of America for "quick thinking that enabled him to save a life." He had performed the Heimlich maneuver on a friend who was choking on a piece of butterscotch candy.

Dr. Applegate continued in general practice at the Springdale Clinic until he semi-retired in 1986. During those 30-odd years, however, he found more to do in the community than confine himself to practicing medicine. He also served as president of the Washington County Medical Society, the Arkansas Medical Society and the Springdale Chamber of Commerce; he was co-founder and president of the Springdale Savings and Loan; he served on the Boards of the Ozark Guidance Center, the Springdale Housing Authority, the Shiloh Museum, the Arkansas State Medical Board, the Springdale Industrial Commission and the Arkansas State Chamber of Commerce; he was president of the Springdale Medical Staff on three occasions, and an elder of the Presbyterian church.

Howard Barnes

Three Barnes brothers came from Ireland and settled first in Kentucky, then moved to Terre Haute, Indiana, and finally to St. Louis, Missouri. While we are not sure of the names of two of these brothers, one became an attorney and the other a doctor whom we believe was one of the founders of the Barnes Hospital in St. Louis. The third brother, my great-grandfather, came to Washington County and put in a mercantile store in Fayetteville, Arkansas.

Robert Barnes and Bertha Hanna Barnes wedding picture, February 10, 1918.

My grandfather, one of three sons born to Marion Wesley Barnes and (we do not have the name of my great-grandmother). The other two sons were Wiley and Beaty.

A family named Dinwitty from Kentucky came to Sudan, Kansas. Traveling in a covered wagon, this family homesteaded land in Oklahoma during the Oklahoma land rush in 1889. When the U. S. moved the Oklahoma territory boundary, it included their farm. Since no white man could own land in Oklahoma, they moved to Maysville, Arkansas and opened a drug store. This family had two daughters, Birdie and Bernice. Bernice attended school at Pea Ridge Academy in Pea Ridge, Arkansas and taught school in Jaybird, Arkansas. Among her students was a ganglin', and probably the tallest and ugliest, named George Barnes whom she married in 1894 (?).

To this union were born eight children, Gladys Rebecca, Robert Wesley, my father, Lola who died in 1920, Bathsheba who died at the age of 2-1/2, twins, Shiela Pearl and Shelton Earl, Hoble and Lorraine Crittington.

My father, Robert, married Bertha Hanna on February 10, 1918 and the enclosed picture was made on their wedding day. The high spirited team, Prince and Warren, was another of my father's pride and joy.

Uncle Beaty settled in Kansas City and he and Aunt "Cassey" had six (only 5 listed) sons, Marion, Russell, Percy, Duke, and Ralph, and two daughters. Zena is the only daughter I remember.

Uncle Wiley married a full blood Cherokee Indian lady, Aunt Agnes. To them were born three sons, Dewey, Beaty and Oscar.

Howard Barnes, Barbara Hilburn Barnes, Robert, Steven and Karen.

My grandfather, George Wesley Barnes, attended auctioneers school in Kansas City, Missouri, and became a well know auctioneer in northwest Arkansas. He had a habit of buying all that did not sell at these public auction sales. Consequently, he accumulated a large assortment of household items and many head of cattle which he would send to his farm in Delaware County, Oklahoma. His three nephews, Dewey, Beaty and Oscar sometimes drove a herd of cattle to this Oklahoma farm. They would have to stop to feed and water the cattle. One of their regular stops was at a spring near the Oklahoma line where these three brothers met three lovely sisters. In the spring a young man's fancy turns to love and romance and in a short time there was a wedding. . .no, three weddings. I do not know if the three couples married at the same time, but this is the only time I have ever heard of three brothers marrying three sisters. The three couples settled in the edge of Oklahoma and each raised a family.

This I do not remember but both my brothers shared this with me. Wiley's son, Oscar, homesteaded a farm in Oklahoma and there was "bad blood" between him and another man. He shot this man off his horse and was tried in Judge Parker's Court in Fort Smith, Arkansas. The incident must have taken place in Arkansas for him to have been tried in Arkansas. He was acquitted of this murder.

I remember many things about the few years I spent in Oklahoma during 1927/1930. We lived in a house down by the creek where a large spring furnished an abundance of cool water. A spring house was built where milk, butter and vegetables could be kept cool. A new barn was built, and later a new house was built on top of a hill which meant water had to be carried up a steep hill since this was before the days of modern plumbing.

In the spring, the spring rains would cause the creek to rise and my father would have to cross the creek on a foot bridge to care for the cattle.

I was about five or six years old when we moved to Oklahoma. Aunt Agnes, the tiny little Cherokee Indian lady, now a widow, would come and help my mother during hay season and when a new baby was born into the family. I well remember the death of Aunt Agnes and the Indian ceremony at the cemetery. This was probably the first funeral I ever attended.

During the depression my father moved his family back to Fayetteville, Arkansas. Grandfather owned and operated Barnes General Store near the old Washington County fair grounds. He also owned a lot of rental property.

The family has scattered . . . there have been no family reunions, except when there has been a death. I know only one bachelor uncle and a few cousins. My father's family of five children, one died in infancy, three are living in Arkansas, and one in New Mexico. The Howard Barnes Livestock business might be familiar to those living in Washington County. Maurice lives in Berryville, Juanita Barnes Steele lives in Springdale and Catherine Barnes Lierly lives in Albuquerque, New Mexico.

Wesley M. Barnes died 1898; his wife, Rebecca Barnes 1/18/1837 to 12/28/1882 (45 years 11 months and 10 days) died when Wesley was a baby (maybe in childbirth). Their children: 1. Beaty - Kansas City, Missouri; 2. George - Fayetteville, Arkansas; 3. Wiley - Southwest City, Missouri.

George Wesley Barnes (our grandfather) 8/25/1872 to 3/28/45; his wife, Oma Bernice Dinwiddie Barnes 5/20/1870 to 10/24/1945; her sister, Bertie Dinwiddie Russell. She was a school teacher. Their children: 1. Gladys Rebecca Barnes Sang 1/16/1895 to 11/21/1952; 2. Robert Wesley Barnes 7/8/1897 to 9/25/1975; 3. Bathsheba Barnes 4/11/1899 to 12/21/1903; 4. Lola Barnes died of pneumonia at the age of 18, 1903 to 1920; 5. Shiela Pearl Barnes Watson 5/23/1906 still living so far as I know; 7. Hoble Birdie Barnes 8/28/1908 still living; 8. Lorraine (sp?) Crittington Barnes 7/28/1912 to 2/4/1985.

Other notes: Harold Sterling Sang - Pvt. 1 cl 147 Field Art., 41 Division, 12/26/1925 to 7/17/1944. Harold Dick Sang died 4/19/1942 (1490*) and Gladys Barnes Sang died 11/21/1952 (1491*). * Could these numbers be the grave sites in the National Cemetery? Robert Crittington Dinwiddie and Mollie Dinwiddie came from Kentucky.

Ewing Benbrook

Ewing Benbrook: 1819-1883 started to Washington County, Arkansas circa 1830 from Simpson County, Kentucky with his parents, Nathan and Sara Maguire Benbrook, (who were married 1816 in Summer County, Tennessee by Rev. John Benbrook): a sister, two brothers, and an orphan cousin, Mary Benbrook, who lived with them. The caravan stopped awhile in Illinois, and in St. Charles County, Missouri, where their son, John Quincy, was born July 17, 1833. They were in Arkansas before 1836.

After visiting with Sarah's parents, Owen and Mary Maguire, of Maguire's Store, they returned to the big spring where they had chosen to build their new home. They homesteaded 40 acres of land just above the spring (Johnson's fish hatchery now).

Our old ancestors said Nathan was free-hearted and "lost his considerable wealth going security for friends". He was also in poor health, but his son Ewing, a serious lad of 16, taking a lesson from his Maguire's Store uncles, Hosey and Green Maguire, put his shoulder to the wheel and helped his father build a nice log house. The house was still standing in the 1940s when I visited in it, but is now gone.

Ewing then drifted back and forth between his Johnson home and Maguire Town, working for area farmers for 50 cents per day, finally homesteading 80 acres in the Harris community. With a plow and half interest in a horse he began farming for himself. He built a log cabin and married thrifty, industrious, Mahala Fincher of Strain on February 12, 1846. She was born September 12, 1824 in Tennessee — died March 12, 1875. She was the daughter of Hiram and Harriet Haney Fincher who was buried in Strain Cemetery. On November 8th of the same year, their first of eleven children was born, Hosey Maguire Benbrook. Soon after, when Ewing was 27 and Mahala 23, they started their protege family of the same number, for Ewing and Mahala would never turn down any member of their families who needed help. Nathan and Sarah had trouble (no descendants now know what kind of trouble) and Ewing brought his mother and all the children to live with him and Mahala.

Incidentally the protege orphan cousin, Mary Benbrook,

Ewing Benbrook, great-great grandfather of Juel Benbrook Hamblen Giles, came to Washington County ca.1833.

Eliza Brown Tollett became the second wife of the noted Presbyterian preacher, Rev. Luther Bell. Melvin Clark of Wichita, Kansas, a Benbrook genealogist, is a descendant of Mary. Rev. Bell had come to Washington County with the Finchers, having been married first to their daughter, Elizabeth (a sister to Ewing's wife, Mahala).

Elizabeth and her infant child had died enroute from Green County, Tennessee to Arkansas. A little town sprung up there and they named it Elizabeth in her memory. A few years passed and a "Mrs. Benbrook", from the Johnson-Spring Valley area, wrote for Ewing to come and get her children, Mary and William (Will) Benbrook, that she was dying of consumption. From a marker in the Spring-Valley Cemetery it is believed her name was Martha Frost Benbrook, the second wife of Nathan. Since he was not mentioned in the transaction of the children it is believed he was already dead though no marker could be found. Mary died in her teens. Will was killed in the Civil War. Ewing and Mahala's children were:

1. Hosey Maguire Benbrook — married Catherine Irvin of Maguire Town.

2. Nancy Jane — married Henry Madison Wood, died in her 90's in Fayetteville.

3. Jarrett T. — was a prominent doctor in Rockwell, Texas all of his adult life.

4. Harriett Ellen — married Turant (Tue) Boone, went to the gold rush in Alaska in 1900s — built the beautiful mansion-and four big barns — all pointed and numbered in big letters on Highway 62 at Elkins. Genealogist, Lila Ellen Boone Michael, of Colorado Springs is a descendant.

5. Charles Lomon — operated the Benbrook Drug store on the east side of the square in Fayetteville, Arkansas. He was well to do financially until he started a "casino" upstairs and against the advice of family and friends, got into trouble with law, went broke, and died at his adopted son Gordon's home in Colorado.

6. John (Jack) Henry — operated a plush casino in Portland, Oregon. He learned to gamble on ships while going to visit Benbrook kin in New Orleans.

7. Lavada Catherine — married Dr. B. F. William's son, Johnny, who became a well-to-do merchant and fruit farmer of Teague, Texas.

8. Eliza Clementine — married George Rutherford and moved to Anna, Texas.

9. Smith Ell — helped brother Jack with the casino.

10. Robert Ewing — successful cotton broker in Rockwell, Texas. His son Kenneth is a Benbrook genealogist and often visits here. His grandson, Dr. James Benbrook, is a high energy physics professor at the University in Houston, Texas.

11. Pike — married first to Edna Morgan age 15 of Maguire Town, had one son, Gordon. After Edna's death, or their separation, I'm not sure which, his brother Charley adopted Gordon. Pike married second to Mahetable Williams, daughter of Dr. B. F. Williams of Maguire Town. He went to the gold rush in Alaska with the Boone's and drowned in an accident on the Yukon River.

Just before the war, Ewing, my paternal great grandfather, sold his well improved 80 acre farm and bought about 300 acres across the river south of Maguire Town, from William Shumate, my maternal great grandfather, (who then bought land in Durham). Williams's son Bennett and Ewing's son Hosey were members of Sylvia Masonic Lodge in Maguire Town. Ewing was also a member of Sylvia Lodge. He and Mahalia were faithful workers in the Presbyterian Church of Maguire Town and helped neighbors. Ewing had a fair education and read the weekly newspapers to his neighbors. Sitting outside in his cane-bottomed chair in the chimney corner. He read to some and to some who just wanted to join in the discussion.

At home Ewing was kind but firm; no slamming doors or wearing caps in the house. Whoever shared the hospitality of his home, could expect to observe the same rules of good manners and gracious living that he required of his own family. Ewing and Mahalia are buried in Stokenbury Cemetery at Elkins, just inside the gate.

Eugene Blake

The Blake family came from England and were distantly related to some big bond holders. One Sir William Blake (Inez Blake Farrar's great-grandfather) settled in Maine. Grandfather Simeson Blake immigrated to Ohio and married Hannah Cunningham, who was a niece or grandniece of the Governor of Rhode Island.

Several of grandfather Simeson Blake's brothers and a nephew were Baptist preachers, and some were teachers. Two of grandfather Austin Blake's (father of Inez Blake Farrar) brothers were doctors. Grandfather Austin Blake's sister was named Uraine and was very pretty. She married a steamboat captain named Crain and had several lovely daughters. Austin Blake also had a nephew named Orville Blake who was a Rhodes Scholar and studied at Oxford. He was very fine looking and became vice-president of Midland Steel Corporation.

Austin Blake home, 815 West Johnson Street, Springdale, Arkansas. Mr. Blake built the house, peach orchard in back when he bought the land.

Austin's wife's family were McGees from Cork, Ireland. They were shopkeepers over there. They settled first in Virginia and later in Missouri and were teachers, storekeepers and farmers. Her mother's people were named Pickens and were related to the Pickens known as the "Swamp Fox" in the Revolutionary War. They lived in Virginia and were from Scotland and England. They moved by wagon train from Virginia to Louisville, Kentucky, where Grandma McGee was born. Later they moved to Ohio where they owned slaves, lived on a farm, had nice things and were well educated.

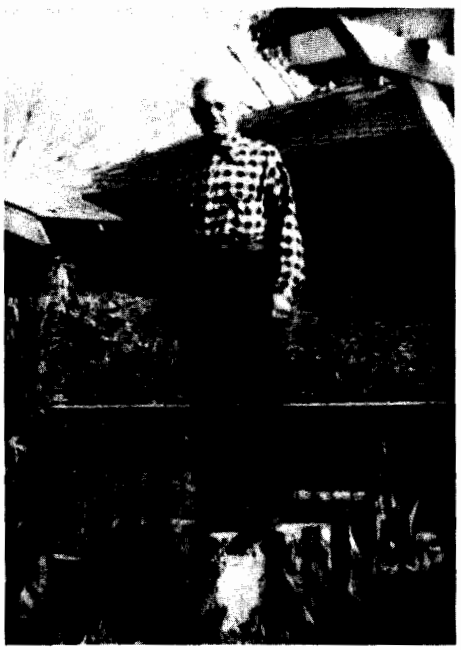
Inez (Blake) Farrar holding her baby, Eugene C. Farrar.

Austin Blake (born 1838, died 1916) was a captain in the Civil War. Austin married twice. His first wife died, but had a son named Clyde Blake. He then married her sister Anna McGee (born 1854, died 1932). They had Elwood, John, Eugene, Maude and Inez. They came from Coffeyville, Kansas. Then the family came to Arkansas where Austin Blake owned the flour mill at War Eagle. They bought a farm close to War Eagle Mills.

Clyde Blake, Austin's first son, went west to Bellingham, Washington, and opened a hardware store. He later became involved in that city's government. He married and his daughter, Helen Blake, who was graduated in music in Chicago, had a very lovely voice. She married a man named Williams, but had no children. Clyde Blake also had a son, George Blake, who was associated with the First National Bank in Bellingham all of his life.

John Edwin Blake was the Assistant Supervisor Engineer of the American Hawaii Steamship Company in San Francisco, California. In World War I, he worked with the U. S. Shipping Board, built the first ice house on Guam in 1911 and was in the Merchant Marines. John Blake married Carrie Freidman and had two sons, Bill Blake and Robert Blake. Bill Blake married Dorothy Wallace and had a boy Rodney Blake and a girl named Carrie Blake. Bill Blake was in the Navy as a captain during World War II. He also served as supervisor for fifteen years on the San Francisco Board of Supervision.

Robert Blake married Barbara Pierson and had four children: Robert Blake, Jr., Peter, Patrick and Leslie Blake. Robert Blake, Sr. was in the Merchant Marines during World War II. Carrie Blake, John's wife, died in October, 1964.



Eugene Blake at age 72, retired.

Elwood Blake (born 1873, died 1949) married Lillian Sharp (born 1854, died in 1932). They had no children. They lived on the farm at War Eagle. Elwood was a cement man and helped build the bridge at War Eagle. He was a Mason.

Eugene Austin Blake (born 1879, died 1955) went west to Bellingham, Washington and to Seattle. He married Eliza Ann Tatro from New Brunswick, Canada, where she grew up with her grandfather. Her family is related to royalty in Scotland, the House of Douglas. They were the keepers of Edinburgh Castle, among other things. Eugene was a builder. He put up the first tall building in Vancouver, British Columbia, and built many of the finest old homes there. His health was never good after World War I. He settled in Seattle, Washington and helped on many big contracts and buildings there, such as the School for the Blind, Queen Anne High School, and B. F. Day Grade School. Eugene Blake was a civilian employee at Fort Warden during World War II. While he was there he converted the old fort from a coal burning plant to oil.

Eugene and Elizabeth Blake had two daughters, Maxine Uraine and Inez Euginia Blake. Inez was married October, 1942 to Johnnie Swidiski, who was a dentist. They had two sons, Gene Jay and Jamie Blake Swidiski. Johnnie Swidiski died, leaving Inez to raise the boys. Inez was a school teacher and retired from teaching after twenty years. She now lives in Bakersfield, California, where she has a very active dry cleaning business.

Maxine Blake never married. She was well-educated and was president of Alpha Delta Pi for several years, then became the president of the World Alpha Delta Pi Sorority. She is retired now and is writing a book about the sorority, which will be published soon. She lives in Seattle, Washington.

Maude Blake (born 1881, died 1975) was never married and lived with her mother until her mother passed away. Then she visited with her brothers, then came back to Springdale and lived in a duplex. When her brother-in-law died, she moved in with her sister, Inez. She did beautiful handwork, was a very good cook, and loved to play bridge.

Inez Blake was born in 1885 and died in 1974. Her father and mother, Austin and Anna Blake, moved from War Eagle to Springdale to send the girls to school. That was in the horse and buggy days. They had the trees cut and lumber sawed off the farm at War Eagle to build the house in Springdale on Johnson Street. Inez graduated from Springdale High School in 1903. She taught school three years, then married E. Claire Farrar in 1906. They had one son, Eugene C. Farrar, born February 6, 1909.

Inez was really a hard-working woman. She was strong, enjoyed life and being with people and was a good businesswoman. She talked often of going to the Presbyterian Church with her father. After Eugene, her son, finished school and served four years in World War II, she began to slow down and Eugene took over the business part. Eugene Farrar and Alma Graham were married in 1952. I will never forget the parties that year. Inez and sister Maude really enjoyed having luncheon parties and playing bridge. The ladies would all come dressed with hats and gloves on. They would wear those hats all afternoon playing bridge. Hats didn't last many more years.

Inez raised beautiful roses. She was always talking to her hands. She would say "These are good hands—they do what I tell them to do". Her husband, Claire Farrar, passed away in 1950. Their home was a nice big brick on one acre of land. They always had a big garden. Inez's son, Eugene, passed away December 26, 1969, so his wife, Alma Farrar helped Inez and Maude the last five years of their lives. Inez passed away December 25, 1974, so that took the joy out of Christmas for me. Inez and Maude really enjoyed decorating the house up for Christmas and had so much good stuff to eat, everything from plum pudding to turkey. I'm still here and have great memories of them.

Virgil Bradshaw

Virgil McKnight Bradshaw, son of Frederick H. and Sallie Curd Bradshaw, was born December 23, 1844 at Harrodsburg, Mercer County, Kentucky, where at the age of sixteen years he joined the Union Army. In 1865 he married Sallie Elizabeth Brown of Virginia and this marriage produced seven children whose names were Captola; Florena; Mayme; Benora; Fred and John (who died at age twenty). In 1878, Virgil and Sallie moved their family by wagon to Saline County, Missouri, where he made a living as a farmer and a carpenter. Sallie died April 17, 1917 at age sixty nine years. Virgil spent his remaining years living among his children, several years with his son Fred and family in Washington County, Arkansas. Virgil died July 9, 1932, both he and Sallie are buried in South Cemetery, Malta Bend, Missouri. Fred Brown Bradshaw was born February 13, 1873 at Harrodsburg, Mercer County, Kentucky the son of Virgil and Sallie Brown Bradshaw, having migrated with his family, was living in Malta Bend, Missouri when he met Mamie Ellen White who with her family had traveled by covered wagon from near Cozad, Nebraska where they had lived on homesteaded prairie land and in a sod house.

Charles Adelbert White and Laura Ann Stage were born in Pennsylvania, orphaned and reared by relatives of Pennsylvania Dutch descent named Luffbaum and Elias and Eliza White who also witnessed their wedding January 1, 1872 at Shavehead, Cass County, Missouri. To this union were born three children, George Chester, May 13, 1873; Charles LaRoy, December 19, 1889; and Mamie Ellen, August 18, 1875 in Lansing, Michigan and at age eighteen, with her family made the month journey by covered wagon from Nebraska to Missouri. She kept a daily diary in detail of some experiences and also hardships suffered on the trail, such as, terrible wind hail storms, their stovepipe blew away, everything got wet, and the horses ran away in the middle of the night. Fred Brown Bradshaw and Mamie Ellen White were married January 18, 1898 at Malta Bend, Missouri. To this marriage, in Missouri, were born four children, named Lynn Royal, August 9, 1899; Beulah Captola, July 14, 1902; Irene Vivian, July 2, 1905; and Gordon Stage, May 8, 1907. Fred was a barber and owned and operated a three chair shop. The family thrived, the children were happy, with many friends, and all were active members of the Christian Church where Mamie was organist. About 1914, upon advice of his physician, Fred began to look about for a place and climate more suitable for his health when learned of a farm for sale at Hazel Valley, Washington County, Arkansas. He was instructed to travel by train to Thompson, Madison County, Arkansas and upon arrival was told to follow a telephone line which would lead him to the Holden place, owners of the 160 acre mountain bench land farm. When Fred wrote home to Mamie, he said the nights sleep were the best he ever had and never tasted well water so good nor so cold. Needless to say, he arranged for the farm, including livestock, grain and machinery, then returned to Missouri to make ready for the move. The furniture was loaded in the boxcar, and when it reached Thompson, was transferred to wagons with the family walking several long miles to their new venture, where they found grain already harvested and wheat dumped in the living room floor of the four room log structure with attached smokehouse. The children were wild with excitement at finding so many animals and everything so different than they had ever dreamed of, but their mother was a lot less enthusiastic at what she found! All kinds of foods imaginable were grown for use by family and animals. Chicken and pork were the main supply of meat, with hams and bacon cured and smoked in the smokehouse. The cellar held home canned fruits and vegetables, also milk and cream for churned butter. Milk for drinking was sometimes cooled in buckets extended by rope down inside the well. Apples and peaches were dried on a cloth spread on the roof of a shed in the sun. The first child born to this family in Washington County was a daughter, on Groundhog day, February 2, 1916 and named Laura Elizabeth for both grandmothers and was nicknamed "Happy" by her father, the name stuck and followed her throughout life. The second and last child born was a son on February 28, 1919 and named Virgil Delbert for both grandfathers, (leaving off the A in Adelbert). The children attended school at Union Point, a one room to eighth grade and at Hazel Valley which was a two story building and eight grades also, (the second floor was called the "high room"), both schools have been nonexistent for many years. The district with the most affordable school days determined which school the children would attend that particular year (sometimes only four or five months).

Teachers salaries in those days were only about $30.00 to $40.00 per month, and this included janitor work and feeding the pot bellied wood stove that stood in the center of the room. School hours were from 8:30 to 4:00 p. m. Sunday school and church was held in both schools, with Union Point holding in the afternoon. At Hazel Valley, Middle Fork of White River was crossed on a swinging bridge and on extremely rainy days when the river was up, family members donned slickers and retrieved the children on horses. Mail was only collected about once a week, as it required a trip of three miles or so on horseback. When Charles and Laura Ann White visited the family and found a small farm for sale in the valley, they too moved and lived in Washington County for several years before returning to Missouri because of poor health. Charles White died December 29, 1921. Laura Ann returned to the valley, lived among relatives until her death at Fayetteville, December 28, 1928. Both are buried in Jefferson City, Missouri. The three older Bradshaw children moved from the farm into Fayetteville to further educate themselves for more prosperous lives. Gordon remained on the farm to help. Lynn Bradshaw married Abbie Thomas, August 9, 1923 and born to them were Vivian Marie, May 16, 1924 and Ellen Frances, November 4, 1932. Lynn worked at Brower Vaneer Plant in Fayetteville for nineteen years, when it closed they settled in Tulsa, Oklahoma where he worked for Yeager Wholesale until retirement.

Irene married Wayne Neff September 6, 1942, Ida married Ray England, Jr. September 8, 1942, both in Springdale, Arkansas. Ruby Nell married Jack J. Williams in Fayetteville, July 21, 1951. Irene Neff died October 15, 1967, and is buried in Elm Springs Cemetery near Springdale. Pearl Watts was a policeman in Springdale several years before returning to Fayetteville where he served as Police Chief for seventeen years before retirement. Pearl died December 10, 1983 and is buried in Fairview Cemetery. After business college, Irene Bradshaw was living and working in Tulsa, Oklahoma when she met Dr. Manuel Guadalajara, native Venezuelan petroleum engineering student getting a Ph. D from the University of Tulsa. They were married June 15, 1933 and made their home in Caracas, Venezuela, for seven years before Manuel died in a fishing launch accident on November 5, 1940. Irene returned to Fayetteville where she has remained since. In October of 1928, Fred and Mamie, no longer physically able to keep up rigorous farm duties, sold the place and moved to Greenland, Arkansas, January 13, 1929 where Fred was once more a barber until 1940. After high school, Laura attended Fayetteville Business School and Virgil was drafted into the armed services for World War II. Meanwhile, Gordon Bradshaw had married Lena Stout, October 6, 1929 and was living at Hazel Valley where four sons were born, Charles LaRoy, June 31, 1930; Manuel L. F., November 9, 1933; Frederick Leon, May 28, 1938; Gordon S., Jr. October 29, 1940.

Soon after this family moved to Greenland, a daughter Mary Beth was born on October 11, 1942. Charles Bradshaw married Mary Lou Guess, September 15, 1950. Born to them were Phillip Wade September 24, 1951 and Charlotte Ann February 2, 1953 (died April 30, 1955 and is buried in Baptist Ford Cemetery) and Eliza Kay, born March 17, 1957. Phillip married Charlene Campbell, May 26, 1973, to them were born Lucas Wade, December 26, 1975 and Tressa Abigail, December 21, 1979. Bradshaw married Donna Bond, March 4, 1955, born to them were Charles Bruce, June 1, 1957 and Pamela Beth, May 18, 1963. Mary Beth Bradshaw married Gerald Bishop August 5, 1961 and died in a car crash, along with her mother, Lena Bradshaw on December 17, 1961. Gordon S. Bradshaw, Sr. died April 29, 1985. All three are buried in Baptist Ford Cemetery at Greenland. At the time of his death, Gordon S., Sr. was married to Blanche S. Skelton Bradshaw to whom he was married on July 28, 1962. Following World War II, Virgil D. Bradshaw married Bonnie Lou Daniel August 26, 1950 and to this marriage was born Virgil Delbert, Jr. August 27, 1951 who married Deby Thomas March 15, 1974 and to them were born Bobby Thomas November 18, 1975 and Jason Paul December 27, 1978. Both he and Mamie are buried in Baptist Ford Cemetery at Greenland, Washington County, Arkansas.

James Nelson Bridgman

On the Bridgman side of Alfred Risley's family, Alfred's great-grandfather, James Bridgman (born June 29, 1820 in Kentucky; died May 8, 1876 in Van Buren, Arkansas) was married (1848) to Mary Jane Casey (born August 30, 1820 in Ohio; died 1908 in Arkansas, buried in Bethesda Cemetery). Mary Jane (Casey) Bridgman's second husband was Buddy McCall. They moved to Northwest Arkansas.

John Thomas Risley

James Bridgman had a big farm on the river in Fort Smith, Arkansas at the time of the Civil War. One time, a bushwhacker came through and robbed everyone in the area of their money and valuable things. Alfred's great-grandfather had gold in a big, steel box buried on the riverbank on his farm. The bushwhacker tried to get James to tell where the gold was buried. James got his toenails and fingernails burned, but he didn't tell where the gold was. The river eventually changed and took in just about all his farm and washed away the gold, and he never did find the gold in the steel box.

Charles Bennett Brogdon

Charles Bennett Brogdon, born December 2, 1921 was adopted by Charles Clifton and Willie (Caldwell) Brogdon when he was about ten months old. Although the records are not entirely clear, some accounts state that he was born in Rogers. Charlie and Willie married November 27, 1913 had no children and evidently had been waiting for some time to find an adoptable baby. How they located Bennett is unknown. Family legend has suggested several possibilities. Willie, having been notified that a baby was available, took the train to Fort Smith where juvenile officer, Edith Woodward placed Bennett (original name Charles Reed) in her care. It has been suggested that he was the youngest of five children of a recently widowed mother who found it necessary to work after the loss of her husband in a railroad accident. Whether this is fact or fanciful tale cannot be determined as no record has been found. It has also been suggested that Bennett might actually be one of the orphan train children placed with families in northwest Arkansas during that period.

Bennett grew up in and around Springdale. In his early years, the family lived on a farm west of Springdale where his father was in the fruit business; later they moved to town. Although Bennett was an only child, the Brogdons were a large family of aunts, uncles and cousins whose social life centered around the activities of the Baptist Church.

After graduation from Springdale High School in 1939, he attended the College of the Ozarks in Clarksville, Arkansas for one semester before enlisting in the Army Air Corps on July 2, 1940 at the age of 18. He had been interested in aviation and flying since childhood and retained that interest all his life.

Bennett received his Army basic training at Randolph Field, Texas, and after a short assignment to the radio section of the 43rd School Squadron, he was given link-trainer instruction. He became an instrument flight instructor for cadets and in September 1942 entered Aviation Cadet training. He received his commission in June 1943. In February 1944, he was assigned a C-47 for duty with Troop Carrier Command in England. Upon arriving in England, his first message from home told of his father's death on March 14, 1944.

Lt. Charles Bennett Brogdon - 1943

Bennett participated in the June 6, 1944 invasion of Normandy (France). He dropped paratroops, members of the 508th Regimental Headquarters of the 82nd Airborne Division at St. Mere Eglise. Later missions involved both single and double glider tows with ammunition, gasoline, supplies and sometimes troops. Return trips involved bringing wounded as well as prisoners back to England. It was necessary to fly such missions at 800 to 900 feet, which meant a high risk from ground fire. For this reason, most crew members chose to wear flak suits rather than parachutes. He was promoted to First Lieutenant and received the Presidential Unit Citation for the Normandy invasion and the Air Medal with Oak Leaf Cluster for the Holland and Normandy invasions.

In October 1944, he developed acute appendicitis, complicated by peritonitis, at the time usually fatal. After a six-month hospitalization, his recovery was finally accomplished by massive doses of the then experimental drug, penicillin. He returned to the United States for discharge in September 1945, after over five years in the Army Air Corps.

Bennett immediately enrolled at the University of Arkansas at Fayetteville under the G. I. Bill. There he met and married Martha Belle Johnson, daughter of Luther and Freda (Bird) Johnson. Their only child, Sandra Lee, was born while he was a student. He graduated in 1948 after two and a half years with a degree in Banking and Finance.

Employed by Steele Canning Company for several years, he became a partner in Razorback Farms. During this time, he served as a member of the Board of Directors of the First State Bank of Springdale. In 1973, Bennett was one of the founding directors of the Washington Federal Savings and Loan, serving first as Executive Vice President and later as President. In 1982, the savings and loan merged with Independence Federal Bank, where he remained until his retirement in 1984.

During these years, Martha Belle devoted herself to being a wife and mother, but found time for other activites. She was much involved in the PTA and Girl Scouts. During an illness, she became interested in genealogy. She became a member of the Springdale Library Board and was President during the construction of the library building in 1965. Other interests were antique collection and local history which led her to join the Washington County Historical Society. She served on its Board and later became member of the Board of the Shiloh Museum. She served on that Board for ten years, serving three terms as President, holding most of the offices and chairing most committees during her tenure. Always active in her church work, she researched and wrote the 100-year history of the Salem Lutheran Church in 1976.

She has been a member of Beta Sigma Phi, serving as Chapter President and the sorority city council president from time to time. In 1987, Martha Belle was the first woman elected to serve on the Springdale City Council and in that same year was elected to the Springdale Chamber of Commerce Board of Directors.

The Brogdon's daughter, Sandra Lee, graduated from the University of Arkansas with a degree in Banking and Finance. She has a daughter, Holly Marie. Sandra is married to Daniel E. Smith from North Carolina and they reside in Conroe, Texas.

Bennett remains active in retirement serving as Justice of the Peace on the Quorum Court of Washington County, the Springdale Airport commission, AARP and other clubs. His leisure activities include golf and flying.

Gunter Claudy Brooks

Gunter Claudy Brooks was born in Springdale, Arkansas, May 16, 1883, the son of George Washington and Martha Fairer Brooks. His grandparents came from Bowling Green, Kentucky, and homesteaded the property on Shady Grove Road in Springdale. The Butterfield stagecoach stopped to water their horses at Vernon Springs on their property. Gunter's grandfather, Samuel Brooks, was killed during the Civil War of 1863. Bushwhackers came by their home near Sons Chapel and after taking what they wanted, they made Samuel and his family watch while they burned their home. Samuel's wife, Matilda Vernon, had her collar bone broken from the butt of a rifle, she was desperately holding on to the children's winter clothes, which the bushwhackers took. Samuel sensing that they intended to kill him also, broke in a run in an effort to escape to a nearby cave, he was shot in the legs with buckshot and then one bushwhacker shot him between the eyes with a cap and ball pistol while the family watched. This same bushwhacker later became a "man of the clothe" (preacher). George Washington Brooks (Gunter's father), had three half brothers who were away fighting for the Union during this episode. They learned of Samuel's death upon their return. One Sunday, after the evening service, these three sons took the preacher (previous bushwhacker) out in the woods behind the church and hanged him, "settling the score." (These stories are true, the names have been withheld to protect the innocent.)

Gunter was one of four children reared here and attending the Shady Grove School. At about age 2, Gunter was found floating face down in Vernon Springs by an inebriated passerby who proceeded to pummel, jostle, and sling him by the heels until he began to breath. Gunter and his brother, Vernon, had a livery stable in Springdale close to the corner of Meadow and Holcomb. During the 1920s he was in the produce business with Carl Hewitt and Taylor Jones, shipping fruit by railcar and during the winter Gunter would go to Mississippi and Arkansas Delta peddling apples out of the railcar.

The Frisco railroad runs thru the homestead and every spring a hobo regularly came thru and slept in the Brooks barn. He and Gunter were well acquainted and he knew he was welcome to sleep there.

It was during this time that a high stepping Texas gal, Ethel Lucille Preston stole Gunter's heart, they were married in 1929 living in the home place caring for Gunter's parents. Lucille taught 29 years in the Springdale school system at Shady Grove School before and after consolidation into the Springdale system. During the depression, a young elementary student came to Lucille and told her that two brothers carried rocks in their lunch buckets. Lucille swearing the youngster to secrecy watched these children and noticed that they went off by themselves during lunch. Lucille slipped behind the cloakroom and opened their lunchboxes. There in lieu of food, were the rocks in the buckets, the family having so much pride didn't want others to know about their hard times. Thereafter, Lucille carried generous portions of ham and biscuits in her lunchbox pretending to have too much to eat, and sharing with these children. In later years, these young men came to see Lucille and express their gratitude. (These stories are true but the names have been withheld to protect the innocent.)

Gunter Claudy Brooks

Lucille and Gunter told of another man who walked barefoot in the snow to get the blue john milk from them for his family, who lived on cornbread and milk. Gunter proceeded to go to the neighbors and ask them to give what they could spare to help these families.

Gunter and Lucille had three children: Martha Francis Brooks, born 12/10/30. Jimmy Gunter Brooks, born 6/12/35 and Mary Virginia Brooks, born 7/22/39.

In May of 1943, a stallion threw Gunter and broke his pelvis.

Unable to farm, they rented the homeplace and moved to Amarillo, Texas, close to Lucille's brother, where they opened a restaurant. It was in Amarillo that son Jim (the new kid in school), was challenged by the bullys who daily lay in wait after school tormenting, fighting and tearing his shirts. One afternoon little "tagalong" sister, Mary, set out to meet her brother and found him tied to a tree by his tormentors. In July of 1945, the Brooks sold the Amarillo Restaurant and opened one in east Tulsa until December of 1945, when Gunter was able to return to the farm.

Martha Frances Brooks, eldest child of Gunter Claudy Brooks and Lucille Preston Brooks, was born in the family home in the Shady Grove Community on December 10, 1930.

She attended Shady Grove School which her grandfather, George W. Brooks, had helped build and her father, Gunter, had also attended. She graduated from University High School in 1948 and attended the U of A, receiving a BA degree in Spanish in June 1952.

Martha taught school at Shady Grove in the fall of 1952. In December of 1952 she received a commission in the USNR and served in the WAVES until 1 August 1956.

While serving at Ft. George G. Meade, Maryland, she married Dayton Westley Lierley, Jr., a career army officer from St. Louis, Missouri. They have two children: Dayton Gunter Lierley, born November 30, 1956 at Ft. Meade, Maryland, and Jennifer Ann Lierley, born at Ft. Knox, Kentucky, on July 10, 1959. Both children attended the Fayetteville Junior and Senior high schools. Dayton Gunter graduated from the U of A with a BS in accounting in 1979. Jennifer Ann attended the U of A for two years before transferring to Western Kentucky University where she received a BA in recreation in 1981.

Dayton Gunter is a CPA with the Arthur Young Accounting Firm in Dallas, Texas. He married Gaye Lynn Thrasher from Dallas and has one child, Megan Brooks Lierley, born February 18, 1988, in Dallas, Texas.

Jennifer Ann married Kevin Paul Harrison from Edina, Missouri, and has one child, Daniel Joseph Harrison, born April 21, 1986, in Columbia, Missouri.

Mary Virginia Brooks, daughter of Gunter Claudy Brooks and Lucille Preston Brooks, was born on July 22, 1939, in the family home in the Shady Grove Community.

Mary attended grade school at Shady Grove, high school at University High School in Fayetteville, and went one year to the U of A.

She worked in Dallas for two years before returning to Springdale where she worked as a bookkeeper, owned a general apparel store and was in real estate. In 1982, she moved to Killeen, Texas. She married Robert Michael Gibbs from Terre Haute, Indiana, career army soldier, and at present they're on orders for a tour of duty in Germany.

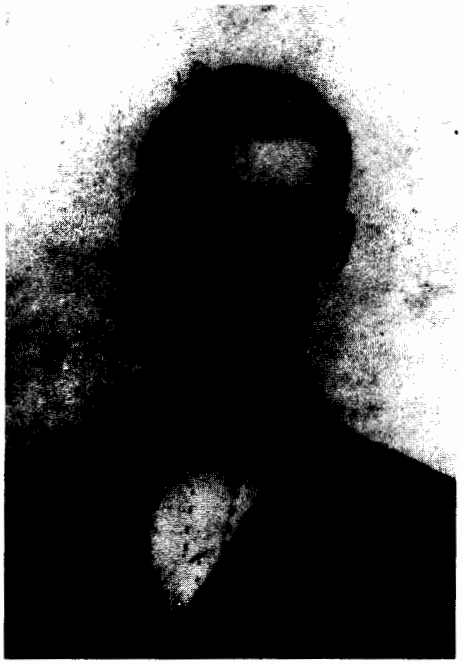
William Hampton Byars

On an autumn day (25 October 1903) in the small community of Forrest, Tennessee, six miles south of McMinnville, my grandparents were married. William Hampton and Minnie Lou (Barnes) Byars were both descendants of early middle Tennessee settlers. Granddad was born 21 October 1880 in the Jessie community northeast of McMinnville and Grandmother was born 17 February 1887 in the Fairview-Smyrna community south of McMinnville. They spent their second Christmas in Tennessee with their first child who was a small golden haired son. Charles Golden was born 8 October 1904. He was named for his Grandfather Barnes and the Golden was the married surname of his father's sister Charlotte.



William Hampton Byars

Soon after the new year my grandparents followed Granddad's brother Nathan Asbury to Indian Territory (Mangum, Oklahoma). Their uncle, Samuel Hand Byars and his family had migrated to Greer County, Texas, later known as Greer County, Oklahoma, in the late 1880s. Shortly after arriving in Oklahoma my grandparents buried their first born who died 30 March 1905. Eighteen years later on 20 April 1923, they laid an infant and their sixth child beside him at Riverside cemetery. Their second child, who was my father, Tildon Pierce was born 7 May 1906 in the White Flat community. Dad was a young man of 18 when he, his parents, two brothers and two sisters moved to Arkansas leaving behind two baby graves and the Oklahoma flat lands known for the hot dry winds, dust storms, and cotton fields. Once again, in the fall of 1924, traveling to a new land my grandparents carried a small son in their arms.

Granddad changed careers when he moved to Springdale; from a farmer who cultivated the land he became a miller who processed the harvests. There was a Bowman's Mill known as the Little Red Grist Mill in Springdale. The little building had originally been a small apple evaporator. On the south side of Center Street and fronting old Mill Street, the site is now a part of the Shiloh Museum grounds. James C. Bowman sold half interest in the property and mill equipment to J. H. Kelly in 1922. Mr. Kelly sold this share to my grandfather on 10 February 1925. On 9 March 1925, Bowman sold his remaining share to Tom E. Lovelace. This Lovelace family was close personal friends of my grandparents in Mangum and was kin to Judge Slaughter of Washington County. Granddad sold his half interest in the mill to Tom on 3 December 1925 and bought most of the mill equipment and established a mill on Meadow Street. This mill burned on 16 March 1928, destroying corn worth $8,000.00. Starting anew, the Byars Grist Mill was once again relocated on Mill Street.

My father dated the Springdale girls for a couple of years. He and Harvard Harp double dated, but I have forgotten the young ladies names. A few days after his 20th birthday in May of 1926, Dad took his father's model T Ford and headed for the Oklahoma flat lands. He had left a shy 18 year old girl with dark brown eyes and coal black hair, that he decided he wanted for his wife. Having a flat going to Mangum, he pulled the Ford over to the side of the road and due to the mud, the model T rolled over. The canvas top had to be replaced before he made his return trip to Arkansas. Dad and Annie Norene Wilhite were married on the 13th of May. Mother said a tearful goodbye on the 18th to a dearly loved father, John Samuel; her brother David Barnett "D. B."; and sisters Mabel Marguerite, Ruby May and Catherine Belle. After staying in a Barstow boarding house on the night of the 18th, my parents arrived in Springdale approximately two p. m. the next day.

Mother was born 14 December 1905 in the Russel community near Mangum. Her mother, Sadie May, the daughter of David and Margaret Emma (Bramlett) Hughes died 5 November 1911. Sadie's small children were raised to adulthood by her young husband, with the help of his 67 year old widowed mother and her daughters. Mary Laticia (Rowland) Wilhite, a first cousin and wife of David Barnett Rowland Wilhite, told her grandchildren many stories of the sacking of Centralia, Missouri during the Civil War. My Rowland and Wilhite families were pre-1818 Boone County, Missouri settlers. My maternal great grandparents were born near Rocheport, Missouri but lived in Centralia before they moved to San Marcos, Texas in 1873. Mary Laticia's parents, Thomas Colland and Clarrisa Ann (Schooling) Rowland, accompanied them. Mary Laticia died at the home of her daughter, Mabel Clair Shinn, in Mangum at the age of 92 in 1936. She hated Abraham Lincoln for as long as she lived.

Martha Belle (Johnson) Brogdon, also a native Springdalian, and I are the sixth great granddaughters of Michael and Mary (Blankenbaker) Wilhoit of the Electorate of Menz, Germany. Martha and I discovered our kinship when we became friends in the early 1970s. Her Wilhite-Bird family migrated to Springdale 45 years before Dad brought his new bride to Springdale.

Michael Wilhoit brought his family to America after 1717 and by 1720, perhaps as indentured servants of Lt. Governor Alexander Spottswood of Virginia. Spottswood sponsored German families who labored in his iron works at Germana for 8 years to pay for their passage to America. Germana was in Essex County on the Rapidan River. Culpepper County, formed in 1749, became a part of what had been Essex County. Michael Wilhoit's will was probated in Culpepper County, Virginia cicra 1746. The Wilhite name will be found with various spellings, such as Wilhoit and Wilheidt. The Blankenbaker surname was originally Blankenbeckler.

My grandmother Sadie was the eldest of six daughters and one son. Her father David was born in Quincy, Adams County, Illinois to David and Mary Hughes Sr. Mother's Hughes grandparents, David and Margaret, were married in the Jefferson City, Missouri area. They moved to Dripping Springs, Texas about 1879. David became a merchant and purchased a boarding house. Perhaps Sadie was a saleslady in her father's store before she was married, as this was her occupation in the 1900 census. Margaret E. Hughes and her parents, Thomas C. and Sarah E. (French) Bramlett, had migrated to Jefferson City from Eldorado, Illinois. David and Margaret Hughes moved from Texas to West, Quay County, New Mexico circa 1904. Three of their daughters, Annie, Nora Ellen and Jessie Belle married oil exploration men. Edward and Annie McAdams, Walter Nathaniel and Nora Ellen Thompson moved to California in the summer of 1911. Aunt Annie received the letter informing her of her sister Sadie's death after she had been buried and said she never again liked postmen. Jessie and her husband William Davidson moved to Taft about 1913. By 1915, mother's Hughes grandparents, their son James Franklin and their daughters Nellie Dove and Vada Emma had moved to the western state. Nellie married Elmer Herbert Taylor and was a resident of Coalinga, California. Vada married Robert Edward Prusso, Basil Wolford Herman of Wasco, California and Erving Feinberg. Grandma and Pa Hughes moved to Long Beach in the early 1920s after selling their Stockton, California ranch. They are buried in the Forrest Lawn Cemetery at Glendale, California.

Mother's sisters, Marguerite and Ruby married William Thomas Day and William Earl Taylor. In 1928 they moved to southern California. My grandfather, "Papa Sam" Wilhite, and his youngest child Catherine moved to Long Beach in 1929. Katie was Queen of the Beaches at Long Beach in 1937. Papa Sam returned to Mangum, Oklahoma a few years before his death in 1950 and lived near his son, D. B. The trip was made objectively; he rests in Russell Cemetery beside the young wife who had died 39 years before.

I, Bobbie Levirl, was that special first grandchild of my Byars grandparents. I was born 19 June 1927 in my grandparent's home on the north side of Emma Avenue, one house west of the intersection of Emma and Highway 471, originally Highway 71. It was dusty on that corner in the summer of '27, as they were preparing the roadbed for the new U. S. highway. Dad soon went to work with Joe Murphy, starting as a hod carrier. He became a concrete finisher and brick layer. They both worked for Elmer Linebarger for a number of years. Dad finished the concrete for the new filling station on the northeast corner of Emma and Highway 71. He was severely burned when gas exploded due to the lantern he used for a light. You had to babysit concrete then, sometimes until the wee hours of the morn. His initials are still in the sidewalks he finished for the senior classes at Springdale High School. He suffered a severe heat stroke while pouring the basement of the 1936 Post Office, now the Springdale schools administration offices. Meanwhile, Mother was busy taking care of three children. My brothers, Billy Dean born 20 February 1929 and Samuel Tildon "Sam" born 31 August 1930, had been added to the roster of grandchildren. Dad and Carl "Bus" Lichlyter formed Byars and Lichlyter Construction Company in the late 1930s. Some of the last houses Dad built before moving his family to California in September of 1940 were some of the new north Mill Street homes on the east side of the street.

My dad continued his type of work in California and Mother enjoyed being near her family once again. We lived in Santa Monica and I spent my sophomore and junior year at Santa Monica High, well known at the time for the most beautiful campus in southern California. Dad went to Kodiak, Alaska during the war, one of the many who built the longer runways for the Naval Air Station. In May of 1944 I once more joined my first grade class mates and graduated from Springdale High School in 1945. Mother and my brothers made the return trip also; Mother was near Dad's family and he stayed near Mother's family. The year I was married my parents were divorced.

Mother worked as a grocery clerk in Springdale and then went to Norman, Oklahoma with my brother Sam in 1950. They both later moved to Wichita, Kansas. Mother retired from Boeing Aircraft Company and returned to Springdale in 1969. She was a professional seamstress and continued to work at various jobs. Now 83, she is as fragile and tiny as I remember her beloved grandmother who raised her.

Dad married Pearle May (McDonald) Birdno in 1949. Pearle and her two children, George and Barbara Cupit, were musically talented. Barbara is the sister I would have chosen given a choice. Pearle became a part of the Wilhite clan and Mother remained a member of the Byars family. Dad died 5 January 1976 in Santa Monica and is buried at Inglewood Cemetery in Inglewood, California. Pearle died 13 December 1985 at Hanford, California and was cremated. In the fall of 1986, her ashes were scattered under a pine tree near the back deck of her son's home at Lakehead, California.

When I was a little girl, I can remember sitting on the floor with Dad and a Popular Science magazine with its pages spread open between us. Dad would tell me that man would someday walk on the moon; he believed and so did I. I can remember my grandmother told him to quit filling my head with nonsense. Our phone line was busy the day we took that giant first step. Shortly thereafter, Grandmother showed me the neat card she had received from Dad. I'm sure it was this early introduction to where you could go if you read a book that has led to my engrossed interest in history.

I was a board member of the Washington County Historical Society for six years, a Shiloh Museum Board member seven and a half years, serving as treasurer, secretary and president. I served a term on the Richardson Center board and was a member of the 1976 historical bicentennial committee, co-authored the brochure published for the '76 event. I was a member of the steering committee for the 1978 Springdale Centennial; researched, authored and edited the 1978 centennial book for the Springdale Chamber of Commerce. I did the bulk of the research and documentation for the Johnson Mill, as well as the Shiloh Church and Shiloh Historic District for their listing on the National Register. As chairman for the design and construction of Shiloh Memorial Park, I let the contracts. Funding of over $50,000 was solicited and the task could not have been accomplished without the tremendous support of Mayor Roy Ritter, Lee Zachary, the Chamber of Commerce, our Springdale News and the city. Various businesses and individuals contributed in kind labor, outstanding performance and dedication was given by the Boy Scouts and Girl Scouts. Funding by the Rodeo of Ozarks Benevolent Association, private and corporate businesses and the many varied civic groups and the citizens of Springdale gave this historical park state recognition. The park was recognized as the only such park in the state constructed with private funding. I feel an overwhelming gratitude for all who have given me the opportunity to participate and contribute to the fascinating field of history.

In January of 1946 Richard Lyle Lynch returned to his hometown after serving 4 years and 20 days in the US Navy during World War II. (See James and Deborah Lynch Family Story for additional data.) Richard and I were married on the 1st of April 1946 at the Methodist Parsonage in Springdale. The minister recorded our marriage date as the 3rd of April. It was and wasn't April Fool's day the day we were married! Now grandparents and reaching for what some say are the golden years, possibly, but it is simply the season of reflection. It is the thoughts of the past that are golden and your children and grandchildren are the pot of gold at the end of the radiant rainbow. Each child and grandchild is a treasure that we've put in our hearts and kept there. Richard and I are responsible for eleven of the treasures that we will retain but will add to my Byars and Wilhite and his Lynch and Hunt family trees.

Our daughter, Ricky Levirl, was a Christmas present in 1946 and the loveliest Christmas gift we have ever received. She married Melvin Dewayne Wolfe of Springdale and then married James Robert Creamer of Spring Hill, Kansas, an agri graduate of Kansas State University. Jim is the son of Robert Bernard and Hazel Agnes (Sampson) Creamer. He was born 13 November 1939 in Decatur, Illinois. Living in Bucyrus and Stilwell, Kansas for the past 22 years, Jim and Rick had four of our eight grandchildren; Linda Levirl born 8 March 1966, Joseph Michael born 26 April 1967, William James born 28 April 1970, and Mary Elizabeth born 30 October 1973. Jim owned a grain elevator for years; recently Jim and Ricky have established a new business. The Red Cedar Garden Nursery will specialize in perennials, iris and day lilies. Mary is a varsity cheer leader and babysits to fund her savings account for her college education. Joseph plans to attend college for his masters mechanic certificate and take landscaping and architecture courses. He was recently made shop foreman for the Toyoto dealership where he works. Bill, who graduated in June of '88, was notified that he would not be required to take freshman English. He is a student at Louisiana State University and plans to major in law. He received, as a part of his Lynch grandparents graduation gift, a gift certificate for the 1988-89 Washington County History Book. The love of history continues and appears to be a legacy of my Barnes heritage.

Our granddaughter Linda graduated from Blue Valley High School in Stilwell, Kansas, 22 May 1984. She was a Kansas Honor Student, a National Merit Commended Scholar, and as a pianist she was one of forty finalists for a Boston University trustee music scholarship. She was a Girls State representative, vice-president of National Honor Society, a member of the school categories team. As a member of the Blue Valley Chamber vocal group, she was selected as the outstanding vocal student. She was the accompanist for virtually every musical production of her four high school years and was outstanding in her performance as the Mother Abbess in "The Sound of Music" in her senior year. She was a talented writer, as well as an accomplished pianist, singer and actress. Voted by her classmates as the most likely to succeed, Linda was the female academic achiever of her class to participate in the annual "Best of the Class" KC-TV5 program sponsored by the Kansas City TV station and General Motors. She was chosen the recipient of the DeWitt Wallace Distinguished Scholarship with four years of funding. She also received an endowed scholarship from Macalester. She planned to attend this St. Paul, Minnesota college in the fall of '84. On the 4th of June and 12 days after she graduated, our Linda was killed in a one vehicle automobile accident. Two weeks after her death, notice came that she would not be required to take freshman and sophomore English. Her major was to have been music and English. Funding of over $5,000 was contributed for an annual scholarship in her name.

Blue Valley High School established "The Linda Creamer Award" and a $1,500 scholarship is given to the senior who has at least a grade point average of 3.2, exhibits strong leadership skills, serves the school and participates in activities. A memorial of intertwined lalique crystal doves, contributed by her classmates, was mounted on a walnut base with her name and year book quote engraved. A permanent plaque for each years recipient was contributed by the High School Principal Fund. Both were placed in the lobby of the school's new Performing Arts Center auditorium. Linda was our special first grandchild, but she was also special to many others. Tributes in the Kansas City area newspapers, consisting of the entire page with stories she had written, are still being published three years after her death. It was not just for her academic skills and what her teachers perceived as her potential that she was given such a memorial. She possessed a wisdom, a depth of character and a maturity beyond her years. She gave to each person she met an ambiance of confidence by giving a part of herself. She accomplished and contributed more in her short span of years than most of us do in our lifetime. Linda is buried at Mt. Calvary Cemetery in Olathe, Kansas. A quote by O'Shaughnessy on her tombstone is the same as her yearbook quote: "We are the music makers, and we are the dreamers of dreams, yet we are the movers and shakers of the world forever it seems."

Our son Roddy Lyle was born 3 January 1949. He was a student at Arkansas Tech for one year, then joined the Navy. Rod married Marva June Coleman of Mountainburg, Arkansas. In 1973 he and Marva returned to Springdale, bringing our fourth grandchild Stacey June, who was born 22 February 1973 in Portsmouth, Virginia. Our special little grandson Dallas Lyle was born at Fayetteville on 2 September 1975. He has been a student at the Fayetteville Richardson center since the age of two. Stacey is a member of the Ramey Junior High band and plays the clarinet. Rod graduated from Springdale Vo-Tech in 1981 as an industrial equipment mechanic and is the maintenance night supervisor for Love Box Company of Fayetteville. Rod and Marva are residents of the rural Fayetteville area. Marva was born 24 June 1948 in Muskegon, Michigan and is the daughter of William Allen and Phyllis June (Barr) Coleman. Phyllis's grandparents were born in Holland and are Dutch.

Our son Monte Pierre was born 14 April 1952 in Wichita, Kansas. Monte was a student at the University of Arkansas for one semester. He married Deborah Ellen Leisure of Springdale. Our granddaughter Monica Paige was born 11 February 1976 in Springdale and is a cheerleader for her school. Our number four grandson was born 27 July 1984 in Overland Park, Kansas. He was given the name of Richard Rian Samuel Leisure Lynch. Monte states he and Deb aren't having any more children and he wanted to be sure he used all the names he liked. This little lad responds to the name of Rian. Monte took night classes to become an insurance agent for Farmers Insurance Company. He purchased the old First National Bank building in Springdale and established his agency. He was transferred to Kansas City in 1981 as a district manager for the company. Later he attended Johnson County, Kansas Community College to change his career choice to the computer industry. Now manager of products division for Unimark of Overland Park, Kansas, Monte and his family are residents of Lenexa, Kansas. Deborah was born 5 January 1955 in Ft. Wayne, Indiana and is a daughter of John Franklin and Reva June (Ames) Leisure.

My brother Bill served two years in the Marines and eleven years with the Navy. He married Patricia Marie Potter who was a resident of Beneica, California, but was born in Council Bluffs, Iowa. Pat and Bill had two daughters. Sandra Lee was born 9 July 1951. She married Albert F. Porreco and has two children: Kimberly Jo and James Christin. Dianna Marie was born 6 December 1953 and married Michael Creekmore. Dianna and Mike are divorced; there were no children by the marriage. Both of Bill's daughters live in the San Francisco. California area.

Allen Davis McClain and his wife Belva Loraine (Byars) McClain

Bill was married to Betty Lou (Coleman) Cummings for ten years. Betty's two sons, Anthony Ray "Tony" and Jesse David, use the Byars surname but they were not legally adopted. Nancy Claire (Singles) Bradshaw of Nebraska was Bill's third wife. Bill's employment has been in various states for the trucking industry. He has driven the big trucks and has held management positions. He is now employed in that capacity.

My brother Sam served in the US Air Force and was honor graduate of his class in 1949 as a tabulating machine operator. He has been in the computer industry for 38 years. He was system analyst manager for Boeing Company of Wichita 1951—1970; salesman for Boeing Computer Services Company 1971-1973; sales manager 1973-1974. (In 1968 fifty-eight U. S. Postal officials came to Boeing and Sam shared his expertise with them before they implemented their postal source data system.) Sam was vice president of marketing for MRI Systems Corp. of Austin, Texas, and senior vice president and director in 1978-1981. He conceived MRI's marketing effort of System 2000 before the company was acquired by Intel Corp. He was Director of Technical Project Development-Office of President at Boston University in 1982-1985. In 1986, Sam returned to Wichita and was with Sunrise Information Systems for about a year. He presently is vice president for Business Computer Centers in Wichita.

Sam married Lawana Ruth (Grant) Royal of Winfield, Kansas and adopted Lawana's small son Kurt Michael. Kurt, the son of William A. Royal, was born 17 November 1958 and is single. Sam and Lawana's daughter Dione Kay was born 4 October 1966. She graduated with honors and is a senior majoring in history at the University of Kansas in Lawrence. Lawana is an employee of Flight Safety International of Wichita, a company that trains pilots for the Lear jets.

Dad's sister Bonnie Lee was born 16 August 1911. She graduated from Springdale High School and shortly thereafter married Martin Feaster Carter, a resident of Lowell, Arkansas. Feaster is the son of William Benjamin and Laura (Wozencraft) Carter. Their three sons are William Byars, James Howard, and Kenneth Lee.

William Byars "Bill" Carter was born in 1936. He was a graduate of the University of Arkansas and married Shirley Mae Owen of Yellville, Arkansas. Their two daughters are Melissa Lee and Sarah Lou. Melissa is known as Missy.

James Howard Carter was born in 1939. His first wife was Janice Ann Graham, the daughter of Pete and Thelma (Wisley) Graham of Rogers. Jim and Janice's daughter Shari Ann married Michael P. Womack and James Ford. Jim married Charlotte Ann Burton and they had three children: Laura Ann, James Martin and Steven Howard. Jim married the third time in December of 1987 to Carol Stephens and is the vice president of Teamsters Union Local 823. Charlotte is now the wife of Joe Layman. Laura married David Pollard and has a daughter, Ryan Christine and a son Adam David.

Kenneth Lee Carter was born in 1942 and has never married. He is a supervisor for Emerson Electric Company of Rogers, and resides with his parents at Lowell. Jim and Bill are also residents of Lowell.

I associate pink lemonade with my Aunt Bonnie. I was eleven when she was dating Feaster and was often at my grandparents when he came to call. Lemonade with a sprig of fresh mint was served in those days instead of todays beer or Coke. The ultimate joy, a couple of years later, was swinging my new baby cousin Bill in my grandparents front porch swing. The trips to the Carter farm in Lowell, which occurred perhaps once a year, are fondly remembered. Sliding down the hay chute from the barn loft was a delight town kids didn't know about. The baseball games in the back forty with Feasters clan, the Kendricks, Shumates and the Byars all trying to hit that homer. The 4th of July with overnight White River trips with some of the same families, was the annual vacation that is taken today. Simple pleasures were enjoyed during the depression years.

William Leo Byars was born 2 February 1914 and died of cancer 29 November 1971. A Jones Truck Lines trucker, he married Myrtha Morris who was born at Drakes Creek. Myrtha is the daughter of William Simpson and Nina Agnes (Johnson) Morris and is a second great granddaughter of Martin and Sarah (Combs) Johnson. Martin Johnson came to Washington County, Arkansas (area now Madison County) before 1830. His wife Sarah had died in the fall of 1827 in or near the community of Rock River, Warren County, Tennessee. Leo and Myrtha had three children: Donald Ray, Sue Carol and Gary Lynn.

During the depression and after he was married, my Uncle Leo did some of the local produce hauling. The silver dollars he gave to my brothers and me were meant to be given to proud parents who needed oil for lamps, sugar, salt and soap so you could be kept clean to attend school. I only remember the bright big coins and the memory is still vivid of just holding them in my hands. Years later I was told the story of their usage and how they were appreciated.

Donald Ray, who was born in 1937, received his Bachelor of Science degree from Troy State University in Troy, Alabama. He is a master army aviator and was the first full time Inspector General for the 420th Engineer Headquarters at Bryan, Texas. Now a Lt. Colonel, Don resides at Enterprise, Alabama. Don married Monica Suzanne Brady of Carrington, North Dakota. Their five children are William Mark, Mary Alisa, James Gavin, Kimberly Jo and Heather Ann Byars. William Mark married Donna Juanita Stanton of California. Mark has been in the service and is now attending college at San Marcos, Texas.

Mary Alisa married Max David Rodgers; their son is Rocky Wayne. Alisa is now the wife of Timothy Joseph Walsh of Iowa. James Gavin married Rhonda J. Spaniak of Maine. Their two sons are Jason Allen and Joshua Thomas Byars. Gavin married Katheryn Garcia of El Paso, Texas the second time. Their son James Mikael was born in September of 1988. Kimberly Jo, born in Germany, is married to Joe Albert Cantu of Bryan, Texas. Don and Suzanne's fifth child, Heather Ann, is eleven years old. Don's children, other than Heather, reside in Texas.

Sue Carol Byars, born in 1938, married James Andrew Venable. Their children are Vicky Sue and Andy Lee. Vicky married Rickey Lee Smith, a pre 1830 Washington County Vaughan descendant. They have a daughter Adrianne Nicole and a son Cody Jarad. Vicky is an employee of the Springdale News in the advertising department. Rick is manager of a Kentucky Fried Chicken restaurant. Andy Lee married Rebecca Adams and has a daughter Brandie. Sue was a bookeeper for many years for Boyer Sign Company. She married Donald Neal Isham of Springdale in 1981. Don, born in Clovis, New Mexico, has a State Farm Insurance agency in Springdale.

Gary Lynn Byars Sr., born in 1950, was killed near Shirley, Indiana in a November 1973 truck accident. Gary married Myrtha Lynn Poole and had two sons, William Edward and Gary Lynn Byars Jr. Richard Cox became Myrtha Lynn's second husband. Sherry Jean Newman, daughter of W. C. Newman of Springdale, married Gary Lynn Sr. in April of 1972. There were no children by this marriage. Gary Sr.'s son William Edward is known as Eddie. On 20 September 1988, Eddie and his wife Kim, gave their small son the name of Chantz Edward. My Aunt Myrtha, Sue and her family and Gary's sons reside in Springdale. Leo and his son Gary are buried at Friendship Cemetery.

Belva Loraine Byars was born 19 October 1919 and was only five when her parents came to Springdale. She married Allen Davis McClain. Allen, the son of Joseph Payton and Effie Mae (Rogers) McClain was an electrician and retired as a finish carpenter. His artistic talent reveals itself in the unique wooden objects he carves. Allen was a member of the Arkansas National Guard which was called into Federal service in January of 1941, preceding the attack on Pearl Harbor. As a member of the 142nd Field Artillery Regiment which became the 936th Field Artillery Battalion, he served his country for over five years during World War II. My three McClain cousins are Robert Allen, born January 1943, Roger Hamilton and Barbara Sue who was born in September of 1953.

Robert Allen of Lake Jackson, Texas, married Anna Jean Martin. Their two children are Belva Louise, wife of Sergio Gonzolas, and Samuel Robert who married Jynnifer Ann Harris. Sam and Jynnifer have two daughters, Jenny Lynn and Jessica Marie McClain. Robert married Betty Elaine Allen of Amarillo, Texas the second time. They named their daughter Jeana Lea.

Roger Hamilton was born in August 1946; he and my daughter Ricky are the same age. They were classmates in school and were in the same graduating class. Roger married Jacqueline Breese in 1966. In 1976 Peggy LaRue Beisel of Bethlehem, Pennsylvania became Roger's third wife. Roger is an employee of Bell Telephone and Peggy is employed at Tyson Foods Inc. main offices. Both are active members of the Democratic political party. Peggy serves as vice chair of the Washington County Central Democratic Committee.

Barbara Sue McClain married David Phillips and has two daughters, Peggy Sue and Kelli Dawn. Barbara Sue is now the wife of David Lisle of Springdale.

My aunt Belva often made toy furniture for me. In the 30s parents didn't have dollars to buy toys like children receive today. I can still see the large wooden match boxes which became overstuffed divans and chairs. Layers of cotton were glued to the boxes and then covered in scraps of cretonne. Beds were made, and also small chests with drawers that actually slid out. The little people were cut from the Sears and Roebuck catalog and glued to cardboard, and their wardrobe was ample. I'd spend days cutting shirts, trousers and dresses from the same big book and fought my brothers if they dared to touch. I taught my children, as I was taught, how to make the small little farms beneath a tree. Wooden sticks or nails for fence posts, winding roads with little cars made of sewing spools, and little wood houses and barns were built. Materials were unimportant, the mind overcame the flaws. Each spring I watch from the kitchen window for the daffodils to bloom. The canyon becomes a secluded and mystic site. The daffodils, planted long ago at the base of a huge tree growing near the break of the hill, recall my children's youth when they created their special place to fantasize.

Grandma was the daughter of Charles and Rachel Jane (Gillentine) Barnes. She was the granddaughter of Micajah Terry and Nancy (Hennessee) Gillentine and Eliza Barnes. The great granddaughter of Thomas and Hannah (Martin) Barnes, John and Polly (Martin) Gillentine, and Patrick S. and Rachel (Wilcher) Hennessee. Grandma was the second great granddaughter of William and Charity (Phillips) Barnes. William Barnes was born circa 1780 and died in a powder mill explosion in 1919. His daughter Mary Barnes was born 5 April 1805. Mary was the widow of Samuel M. Worthington and she came with her son Dr. James Worthington and his family to Bentonville, Arkansas. Mary died in 1866 and rests beside the son and a grandson in the Bentonville Cemetery. I presume I could claim my Barnes family came to northwest Arkansas in 1865. Mary Worthington was my grandmother Byars's first great grand aunt.

Grandmother's Gillentine ancestry gives me kinship to the John Chisum/Chisholm for whom the Texas Chisum Trail received its name.

The Church of Christ faith was a part of Grandma's heritage. Her great grandfather John Gillentine, who was born in 1797 and died in 1870, was a Spencer, Tennessee merchant. He was chosen to lead a board of twenty-six men who established Burritt College at Spencer in 1849. The curriculum of this college epitomized the attitudes of the Church of Christ faith.

My granddad Byars was the son of Franklin Pierce and Charlotte Blaine (Cantrell) Byars. He was the grandson of Nathan and Nancy (Hand) Byars and William Riley and Maude Constance (Magness) Cantrell. Granddad was a great grandson of Perry Green and Mary (Cantrell) Magness. The great grandson of Harrel and Jennie (Gill) Byars, James Samuel and Mary (Campbell) Hand and John Cantrell and Mary (Atkins) Cantrell. All of these ancestors of Grandma's and Pop's were early settlers of Warren and Dekalb Counties in Tennessee. James Samuel Hand was a Revolutionary War soldier.

The Revolutionary War National Cowpens Battlefield Park in Spartanburg County, South Carolina is the burial site of Granddad's second great grandfather Nathan Byars who was born in 1749 and died in 1846. A Revolutionary War soldier, this Nathan owned the land where the Battle of Cowpens was fought. The Byars name means keeper of the cowpens. Nathan's first wife Drucilla Harrelson is my lineage. The given name of Harrel in the Byars family comes from the Harrel in the Harrelson surname.

The last child of Pop and Grandma was Leb Eugene who was born 11 May 1924 in Oklahoma. Leb died in 1960 and was unmarried. He was only three years older than I, therefore we shared a special bond. I still have a scar on my knee, inflicted as we played a childhood game. I remember he was spanked for the prank he played. I'm sure at times he was jealous of his young niece and two nephews who received much of his parents attention. As we grew older, I recall that girls were not allowed in boys clubhouse hideaways, but then you finally grew up, and of all things, it's ok to double date. My husband and I bought our first television in 1952 when we lived in Wichita. Leb came to visit one evening and surveyed the scene, as all eyes were affixed to the tube, and said "This invention will be the end of our social life and all intellectual conversation that we enjoy." Today, in so many of our homes, I'm sad to say his prophecy of just thirty-six years ago has come true.

I have fond memories of two of the three Byars Mills located on Mill Street. My daddy helping his father at the end of his day, finishing concrete the hard way, on his hands and knees. My little brother Sam being playfully tossed in the air while my brother Bill and I played in the big bins of corn. I watched farm produce bartered for ground corn, saw corn cobs sold for a heating source. I was fascinated by a horse drawn black surrey with the fringe on top, driven by a lady to buy her weekly mill supplies. I discovered years later that she was Mary Elizabeth Lucas, a granddaughter of Shiloh's first known settler, John Fitzgerald. Saturdays were special, a man sold hot tamales wrapped in real corn husks from a wheel barrow at the head of Mill Street and always from the west side of the street. A unique lady, Forestina Campbell, was always on the opposite side with huge truck loads of wood for sale. When Dad bought a load of wood, my brothers and I knew White River Red, as Forestina was called, would give each of us a bag of candy. I remember the town bustling with children amusing themselves by looking in shop windows for things they could only wish for. Their parents social needs were satisfied while they resupplied their larders.

I recall Grandmother cooking bountiful Sunday family dinners over a huge black wood burning range, and if I got in her way, she would say, "My land, child, if I step on you, you'll just be a greasy spot." I remember my grandfather sitting in a rocker in front of the living room stove on a Saturday night, a gentle smile on his face, his eyes watching the clowning of his beloved family, his ears tuned to the Grand Ole Opry, and always at his feet a big pan of ashes to spit the tobacco juice in.

Granddad died of a stroke on the 4th of August in 1941. In 1942 his son Leo bought the mill from the heirs. Leo continued supplying the milling needs of Springdale and the rural area to the east as far as Alabam in Madison County. Flour was still made and sold to the local stores as in the past. Mill run bran, shorts (middling of wheat, part of the husk produced in the process of making flour), yellow meal and chops were sold and delivered to small country stores. Theodore "Ted" Saum purchased the mill in the early 1950s. Shortly thereafter, a mode of life and the mill ceased to exist.

Grandma died on the 17th day of January in 1967. She was buried beside Granddad and Leb at Bluff Cemetery. They rest amid these Ozark hills that have the same imposing beauty as the Cumberland Valley hills from whence they came.

Andrew Hawkins Campbell

It was a long way and many years from east Tennessee to northwest Arkansas for Uncle Andy and Aunt Mary Campbell as they were called by friends and relatives. Information of family history was secured from old documents, letters, newspapers clippings and previous research by De Forest Spencer of Minneapolis, Minnesota and Patricia Campbell Muffler, Palo Alto, California. Knowledge of family heritage and travel by Edna Oliphant of Fayetteville, Arkansas and memories related by Mary Etta Campbell of the Civil War and her childhood in Chattanooga, Tennessee.

Andrew H. Campbell and wife, Mary Hamill Campbell with children. Eldest child is Everett Campbell, on right is Clinton Campbell and the youngest child is Truman Campbell - ca. late 1890s.

Andrew Hawkins Campbell was direct descendant of Archibald Campbell, one of the three original Campbell brothers who came to this country and settled in Lunenburg County, Virginia around 1748 to 1752.

William died in 1780 and James died in 1789 and Archibald who was a soldier in the Revolutionary War. He and wife, Elizabeth lived in Knox County, Tennessee, where he died in 1802.

Farming was the tradition and prevalent names were: William, James, Archibald, Mary, Jane and Elizabeth in the Campbell generations.

Second generation, James Campbell married Jane Means, Campbell County, Virginia and died in 1826.

Third generation, Archibald Campbell born in 1786 and died in 1834, he was married on August 9, 1806 to Jane Peck, born in 1788 and died 1869 in Greene County, Tennessee.

Fourth generation — James Campbell born 1808, married October 15, 1828 to Sarah Dodd, Greeneville, Green County, Tennessee. There were twelve children. Fourth born was Andrew Hawkins Campbell, born January 4, 1834 - died October 17, 1919. In later years, a move was made westward, the James Campbell family were early settlers in northern Georgia and became active in the Civil War. Five boys in the family, Andrew and his four brothers fought in the War between the States. Living near Lafayette, Walker County, Georgia, James and son, Andrew, jointly owned and operated a three-hundred acre farm.

Andrew married Mary Stout, born December 31, 1837. They had six children: 1. Candice, born March 22, 1861. 2. George Franklin, born February 15, 1873 - died 1956. 3. Robert Ervin, born November 24, 1865 - died 1957. 4. Daniel Whitfield, born February 18, 1867 - died 1957. 5. Landon Addison, born October 14, 1870 and Minnie Lee, born November 1873 and died in 1978.

Andrew suffered the misfortune in the death of his wife, Mary and their firstborn, Candice, in Walker County, Georgia.

In about 1877, Andrew chose for his second wife Mary Etta Hamill who was born April 20, 1857 - died February 6, 1943, the daughter of David and Mary (Hixon) Hamill, of Chattanooga, Tennessee.

The Hamills: David C. Hamill, born December 2, 1825 - died November 1872 and married November 6, 1845 to Mary Ann Hixon. In 1846, David built a one-room house for his bride on the 640 acre farm. The years passed, the family enlarged and more rooms were added until there were nine to accommodate the family of eight children. During the Civil War, Union Generals, Ulysses S. Grant, Joseph Hooker and their soldiers drank water from their well, rested in the yard, on the porches and camped in their fields. The house withstood the war though it was rocked with shells during the "Battle Above the Clouds" from Lookout Mountain November 24, 1863. The Hamill family and other residents were moved upon the mountain to avoid the battle, however, battle plans were changed and they were in the midst of fire. Luckily, they survived.

The house David built was replaced after 108 years with a new one by son, Ernest. The property was sold in 1960 to the City of Chattanooga to build a school for the negroes, located at 5204 Hooker Road - being named after General Joseph Hooker.

In about 1878, Andrew, Mary, his children, his first cousin, Samuel Jacob (Jake) and wife, Rebecca Hamill Oliphant, sister to Mary and Andrew's sister, Nancy Adeline Campbell and husband Isaiah Harp joined a wagon train going west. There were seventeen or eighteen wagons loaded with families, their possessions and some bringing oxen, crossing the Mississippi River by ferry. The train traveled through Johnson County, Arkansas and the Campbells and Oliphants stopped at Coal Hill, Arkansas. The wagon train continued into Oklahoma.

Andy and Jake tried their luck of farming in Arkansas. Due to the lowlands, weather conditions and malaria fever, the two families made a move north to Washington County, settling east of Fayetteville near Goshen. Jake and Rebecca Oliphant purchased a farm southwest of Goshen in about 1883 from Dr. J. R. Kelley.

Andrew and Mary Campbell bought a farm, December 23, 1885 from E. H. and Elizabeth Blackburn, about one mile north of Goshen on Blue Springs Road. The farm is presently owned by Gene Bowen of Goshen, the house Andy built about 1896, is occupied by the Russell and Connie Gayer family.

Farming underway, corn, hay and grain crops were grown. Corn and wheat was ground into meal and flour at the mill in Goshen. From the 1890 Washington County, personal property tax book, A. H. Campbell had four horses, four mules, six cattle, thirty hogs and one wagon. George F. Campbell had eleven hogs and one horse in school district number 108.

The family was supportive of the community and church. A report in the 1883—86 quarterly conference record book of Goshen Methodist Episcopal Church, South, by D. C. Ross P. C. October 16, 1886. A. H. Campbell, Mary, Robert and Minnie were received as members into the church by letter and baptism. Robert was appointed as steward and George as Sunday School Superintendent.

In the 1890s or turn of the century, Andrew carried the mail from Fayetteville to the Goshen Post Office by horseback. Fording the Richland Creek and White River was a daring experience during floods and high water. He later acquired a buggy, crossing on the Oxford Ferry the trip was made easier, though obstacles remained. His saddlebags were tucked away in his trunk of personal possessions for many years as mementos of another era. Andrew was instrumental in establishing a new county public road beginning at a point 1/2 mile west of Goshen on Fayetteville-Huntsville Road, running north 1-1/2 mile intersecting new Habberton Bridge Road near the Wilburn Oxford residence. A letter, November 3, 1905, from Washington County, Judge W. E. Williams in response to a petition requesting the road. Consenting, the court granted the prayers of petitioners, a new road thirty feet wide to be established and passing over the lands of John Mayfield, between the lands of Faner Neill, A. H. Campbell, J. A. Neill, A. J. Parker, Thomas Mayes, Wilburn Oxford and would be known as the John Neill Road.

The "John Neill Road" is presently known as Blue Springs Road, No. 70, extending from Highway 45 at Goshen and proceeding northward. A partial list of present adjoining property owners are: E. E. (Gene) Bowen, Gerald Paschall, James Mounce and Jack Purdue.

The new "Habberton Bridge Road" is currently a portion of county road No. 545, extending from Beav O Rama Park of former Mountain Home Community, the surrounding area and intersecting county road No. 70, then interchanging into county road No. 375 proceeding eastward, toward Mayfield Community.

The "Wilburn Oxford Farm" has been sub-divided and some of the present owners are: Calvin Langham, Dewana Langham, Tom Corrigan, Randy Wallis and the Goshen Rodeo Arena.

The family members of Andrew and the late Mary Stout Campbell were departing from the Goshen farm to establish a life of their own, leaving their father Andrew and stepmother Mary Etta Hamill Campbell and young half-brothers.

Truman Carson Campbell

Truman Carson Campbell was born January 3, 1892, Goshen, Arkansas and was the youngest member of Andrew and Mary Etta Hamill Campbell family. He was married April 15, 1914 to Martha Marie Hilton, born September 25, 1895 in Hiltons, Scott County, Virginia, daughter of John Thomas and Mary Jane Francisco Hilton of Mountain Home Community. (See related John Thomas Hilton story)

Truman and Martha made their home with his parents, caring for the farm and father, Andrew whose health was failing. They were parents of four children, Vearyl Eugene Campbell, born May 16, 1915 and Truman Preston Campbell, born March 27, 1918.

Soon after becoming a member of the Campbell family, Martha became a member of the Goshen Methodist Church.

Andrew Hawkins Campbell died October 17, 1919 and was buried in Goshen Cemetery.

In 1920, an exchange of farms was made between Truman and father-in-law, John T. Hilton of Mountain Home Community. Truman and Martha, their small sons, Vearyl and Preston and mother, Mary Etta made the move northwest about four miles bringing their team of big brown mules, "Jude and Mike". It was felt these mules were part of the farm and paid for themselves many times, living until the early 1950s.

Mary Jane Hilton died in 1918 and was buried in Friendship Cemetery.

Truman and Martha Hilton Campbell, 1936, in yard at the Campbell home northwest of Goshen, Arkansas, formerly known as the Mountain Home Community.

John T. Hilton moved to the Goshen farm where he lived until it was purchased by Wilburn Oxford, November 15, 1922.

Residing in Mountain Home Community, two children were born to Truman and Martha to complete their family. Marie Elizabeth Campbell born May 4, 1923 and Jesse Marvin Campbell (Veteran World War II) born December 7, 1925.

The youngsters received their 8th grade education in Mountain Home School, District 117.

The family was supportive of the community, working with the school and striving for better roads. Truman was a school director for a number of years and was available when building repairs were needed. Martha loved to sing. In early years, she played the organ for singing sessions, church service and other gatherings at the school building.

They bought their first car in 1927, a new Chevrolet Touring car. There were a couple of problems, Truman had to work the road in order to get the car home and then learn to drive. There were a lot of "Get-ups and Whoas" before the driving skill was accomplished. There were times the car was left across White River on Habberton Road at the home of Martha's brother, Lucian Hilton.

Spring rains and miles of muddy, rocky roads were great obstacles in taking ripe strawberries to market in Springdale, a system was established. The ten acres of berries were picked, crated, set across the river by boat and loaded on to a truck on Habberton Road. They would arrive at market in good condition.

Truman and Martha were devoted farmers and farming was a family affair. A Concord grape vineyard was set in 1922 and was in production thirty-five years. Grape market was varied, from local buyers to Peggy Earl's Winery, Nelson's Winery and Welch's of Springdale. Diversified farming was practiced with truck, grain and other crops. Corn and hay was grown in bottom lands until they were taken in the 1960s by Beaver Lake. There were livestock of Hereford cattle, hogs, goats to eat the brush and a trial with sheep. Two teams of mules and three brood mares supplied the horsepower before acquiring a tractor in mid 1940s.

Grandmother Mary assisted with household chores and care of the young children. Martha tended her flowers, vegetable garden and flocks of White Wyandotte laying hens which provided food and extra money.

The years passed and young family members were making plans for their future.

Vearyl Campbell was married May 26, 1934 to Gynith Clark, born November 28, 1913, daughter of Elmer and Pearl Neill Clark of Goshen. For a period of time they lived in the "little house" on the Campbell farm. A daughter Doris Jean Campbell was born July 7, 1936, Goshen, Arkansas. As the author of these stories, I hope to have shared a bit of family history from the early settlers in Virginia, 1748, down to my grandparents, parents and present generation. I am Marie Campbell Harp, daughter of Truman and Martha and the widow of Harlen Harp. In working with the project, I have become better acquainted with my heritage and happy to have these events recorded.

Jesse and I are the surviving members of the family. We were born on the river bottom farm that was originally purchased by our grandfather, John T. Hilton in 1912. We saw the farm grow as more acreage was added, resulting into increased productivity.

I loved my family, shared in their happiness and sorrows and cared for them in their illnesses. Having lived a lifetime on the farm, I chose to remain, following the deaths of Harlen and my father, Truman.

I trust this information to be cherished by my sons, Ronnie and Gaylen, their families and other Campbell descendants, in the future. (See related Andrew Hawkins Campbell and George Franklin Campbell stories).

William Cannon

William Columbus Cannon, born February 6, 1884 in Goshen, Arkansas, one of eight children of William Alanzo Cannon and Martha Evaline Neill Cannon. William Alanzo was the son of John Cannon and a Cherokee Chief's daughter. John was a great friend of the Indians and traded supplies and furs with them up and down the White River. William Cannon lived with his parents in the Goshen area then later moved with them to Macedonia Community which is now the Mayfield Community.

50th Wedding Anniversary of William (Bill) Columbus and Lillie Cannon

William was an out-doors-man and hunted wild game and turkeys to help feed the family. At the age of 18 he split 1,000 rails for a gun that was hidden during the Civil War by his grandfather Neill who brought it from Kentucky in 1820. William's grandson, Jack Perry, now has the gun.

William's brothers were: Thomas Jefferson, 1868—1918, who went west at the age of 17 to herd sheep in Oregon and later became a professional gambler; George Washington, 1870—1926, was a merchant at Mayfield and later owned a wheat farm in Talala, Oklahoma; Andrew Jackson, 1879—1928, was a local rancher and the father of Lena Cannon who was a school teacher in Washington County; Truman Alexander, 1879—1913, had three children, Ray, Clyde and Truman. He was a local rancher and was shot at the age of 34 following an argument with a neighbor; Henry Lee 1885—1908, was a local school teacher and was a correspondent for the Springdale News; Ward Burton, 1894—1965, he went into the Navy at age 17, served as Captain in three wars, in command of various ships. He had three children; Audry, Bert and Loring. One sister, Mary Jane, 1876—1954, who never married but lived with and assisted other members of the family.

William, 1884—1962, being of the outdoors and a hunter, roamed many miles in search of game and turkey. He met and courted Lillie M. Rutherford, 1881—1970, daughter John Thomas and Margaret Rutherford, who lived at War Eagle Mills. He would ride a mule from Mayfield to War Eagle to court Lillie in the porch swing overlooking the grist mill where people came to have their grains ground. With marrying on his mind, in 1903 he rode a freight train to California to seek his fortune. He returned in 1905 to marry Lillie. They made their home on White River ten miles east of Springdale. They spent their lifetime being farmers, raising livestock, investing and trading properties. William was known throughout the area as the livestock market in the three county area. He would leave on his mule for parts in Washington, Benton and Madison counties, being gone for two or three weeks at a time rounding up cattle, mules, horses, goats, sheep, and drive them all down the "long lane" which is now Highway 68B, to load them on rail cars and head for St. Louis. Often times there he would be on the caboose with his jug of moonshine to give to buyers in St. Louis.

His door and pocket were always open to help a passerby or a friend. At the time of his death, many unpaid notes were found from over the years where he had loaned people money when they were in need. Lillie kept the home fires burning, taking care of the children and playing mid-wife in the community. It is known that she delivered 29 babies when the doctor could not be reached or didn't get there in time.

William and Lillie had three girls: Pearl was born in 1905. She married Hugh Perry in 1927. They were farmers and raised cattle east of Springdale on White River. They had one son, Billy Lee, who helped on the farm, attended the University of Arkansas and served with the U. S. Army. He married Margaret Bunch in 1958 and had one daughter, Lisa, who is attending the University of Arkansas. They still reside on the home farm east of Springdale. Hugh died in 1962 and Pearl died in 1970. The second daughter, Fern, was born in 1907. She married Doug Stone in 1927. They were farmers and raised cattle on White River. They had one son, John William, born in 1928. He married Carmelita Mayfield in 1954 and had one daughter, Tina Marie in 1957. Johnny served in the Korean conflict and works for the postal service. Tina Marie is now married to Tony Edwards and has one daughter, Tiffany. Johnny and family have spent their life in the Springdale area.

The third daughter, Vivian, was born in 1914. She married Ivan Perry in 1931. They also were farmers and raised livestock east of Springdale on White River. They were owners of livestock auction barns in Springdale, Harrison, Eureka Springs and Grove, Oklahoma. Ivan spent many years as an order buyer for feed lot owners in Iowa. They now make their home in Springdale.

They had two children. Their son Jack was born in 1932. He worked with his family on the farm with the exception of attending the University of Arkansas and serving in the U. S. Army. He married Joan Hobson from Huntsville, Arkansas. They had two children: Jacklyn, who is a real estate broker in Dallas, Texas, and Jeff, who is married to Sandy Nations. They have two children, Jennifer and Amber Seratt and are in the chicken business in the Goshen area. Jack is now married to the former Janet Weiser, who has one son Chris. They are also owners of J. V. Manufacturing Company east of Springdale.

Their daughter Joyce was born in 1937. She is married to Bill Tackett, a nationally known auctioneer. They have a thoroughbred horse ranch in Collinsville, Oklahoma and have two children, Holly Ann and Billy who are both attending college.

These descendants of William and Lillie Cannon spend many hours at family gatherings reminiscing and telling tales that have been passed down through the years.

James W. Carpenter

James W. and Ernestine (Teena) Carpenter and 8-month-old son, David arrived in Springdale, Arkansas in September 1948, coming from Kansas City, Missouri in their 1947 Kaiser. Jim was born and reared in western South Dakota. Teena was born and reared in Barry County, Missouri - just over the state line from Arkansas. The met in Springfield, Missouri when Jim was stationed in Fort Leonard Wood and Teena was a secretary at the Green County Courthouse in Springfield. They were married in Kansas City, Missouri where Teena was then employed and Jim had his overseas orders in his pocket.

Jim had served his country during World War II, going into France on D-Day onto Utah Beach, and continuing through to Germany until end of the war, including on Christmas Eve, when the Germans made their last big effort to retain their foothold in Europe. That was the Battle of the Ardennes, commonly known as "Belgium Bulge". Jim was a Lieutenant with the Signal Corp and was in charge of telephone teams who kept wire strung to the advancing armored divisions on the battle front - with the VII Corp. He was awarded the European Theater Ribbon with five Battle Stars and the Bronze Arrowhead for the D-Day Invasion. Then he was awarded the Bronze Star for meritorious service. Jim retired from the Army Reserves as Lt. Colonel in 1985.

Teena was working as Executive Assistant to Colonel Klein, Contracting Officer with U. S. Army Air Forces at North American Bomber Plant in Kansas City, Kansas.

When World War II ended, Jim returned from Europe and worked for a radio servicing shop in Kansas City, Kansas as he was a graduate of Coyne Electrical School in Chicago. Jim and Teena left Kansas City as they did not want to raise their son in the big city.

In coming to Springdale, they purchased a home and 100' x 180' lot for a business building at 726 Highway 71, north. A stone house was on the back of the lot and much labor was put forth in renewing the home and readying an abandoned service station building on the corner of that lot to start a radio service business.

Test equipment, inventory and schematic data was purchased and on December 1, 1948, opened Jim's Radio Service. The business grew during the first year and Jim had a business built on the same site. Within three years, he had hired two technicians and built a larger brick building on the corner of Highway 71 and Christian Avenue (same site). As business grew, he brought the two buildings together with a large building for office and show rooms and the name was changed to "Jim's Radio, TV & Communications, Inc." by this time, we had nineteen employees, commercial two-way radio sales and service, and Executone intercom and paging. (See Business Section). This was the largest electronic service and sale business in Arkansas. Teena always managed the office of the family business.

Son, Kendal was born in July 1952. Both sons attended the Springdale schools. David graduated high school and entered University of Arkansas, Engineering School, where he received his EE Degree and was employed by General Electric. After a couple of months in the east, GE assigned David to the Dallas, Texas area. David now lives in El Dorado, Arkansas with his wife, Vonita (Brewer) and daughter, Shannon Marie. He is employed by Arkansas Power and Light as Manager, Division of Customer Service. Vonita is employed by Arkansas Legislative Audit as auditor.

Kendal attended Wentworth Military Academy for his senior year of high school and graduated there. He also attended one year of college there and transferred to Westark College in Fort Smith. He transferred to University of Arkansas, received his MB Degree in Business Management and worked in Houston, Texas for three years before returning to take over management of family business in Springdale, in 1981. Two sections of the family business were sold in 1986. Ken retained the business of Contel-Executone of northwest Arkansas and lives in Springdale.

The family church is First United Methodist Church in Springdale. Jim and Teena always have enjoyed working on committees and as officers in Springdale for PTA, High School Band Parents, Lions Club, Museum, etc. Teena sang with the church choir for more than twenty-five years as well as with some other vocal groups. Jim served with the Army Reserves, 306 Civil Affairs Group in Fayetteville.

For recreation through the years, Jim and Teena have square danced, done ballroom dancing, camping and hiking.

At this writing, Jim is on the Board of Trustees for Shiloh Museum.

Jacob Chandler

Jacob Chandler was born in Newberry, South Carolina, April 20, 1793, son of Solomon King Chandler, born circa 1742, and Mary. That is all I could find out about her. Solomon King and Micajah Reeder joined the army of the Revolutionary War in Newberry, South Carolina. Micajah volunteered twice and was drafted once.

Micajah Reeder's parents were Simon Reeder, II and Anastasia Dunbar Reeder, daughter of Joseph Dunbar who came to America in the early 1700s or late 1600s. They had sixteen children.

When Jacob's father Solomon King Chandler and Micajah Reeder mustered out of the army in Newberry, South Carolina, the pioneer spirit had touched them. They decided to go to Kentucky.

Chandlers and Reeders are in the census of 1790 in Newberry, South Carolina. The 1800—1815 census finds them in Livingston and Caldwell Counties of Kentucky. Solomon's father, Zecharis is listed with them. They were also on the tax records as large land and slave owners.

The Chandlers and Reeders had all been dismissed from the Quaker (Friends) Church for fighting in the Revolution.

Joseph Shurtliff Bartlett

Micajah Reeder's wife was Judith Roland Reeder and in some research I read, they were on the roll book of the Bush River Baptist Church and their names were still on the roll book in Newberry, South Carolina. The Chandlers had become Methodist some time later.

Micajah and Judith had Noah, Elijah, Daniel, Micajah, Jr. and Elizabeth (born February 22, 1800). She married Jacob Chandler in her father's and mother's house due to her age. Judith Reeder was not mentioned in Arkansas as we suppose she died in Kentucky.

Many people found traveling easier by water. We know the Chandlers and the Reeders, being close to the Ohio River, built rafts, came down the Ohio to the Mississippi to Cairo, Illinois. With their possessions, they floated to Arkansas Post, Arkansas Territory. From here, they traveled overland to a place the Reeders named Reeder, Arkansas. There they remained several years during which Jacob served as a magistrate for three years and as road overseer for three. In time, a family dispute caused Jacob and Micajah to move on.

Jacob Chandler and his wife, Elizabeth Reeder Chandler, their first six children, and Micajah Reeder with his four sons, were among the earliest settlers of Washington County, Arkansas Territory. The county had not yet been named Washington. They came in 1826.

Jacob went into Choctaw Nation, Oklahoma Territory. Not liking conditions there, he came into Arkansas Territory near Evansville. He loved the hills around what was later Vineyard Township. Most of the early settlers called it "The Lord's Vineyard". Jacob didn't stop until he found what he was searching for, a mountain overlooking Vineyard.

Micajah Reeder went into what was later Illinois Township near Cincinnati, Arkansas Territory.

Jacob homesteaded two-hundred and forty acres. He kept buying forty-acre tracts until he owned almost the whole mountain, and in early times the people called it Chandler Mountain. He later owned around 500 acres.

Jacob was well off, financially, as he received his inheritance before he left Kentucky. His mother did not come with Jacob to Arkansas as she had other children. Jacob inherited gold and he bought around a dozen slaves. I have heard from ten to twelve. He worked along with his slaves clearing the land and building a huge log house as he had a big family. They also built a barn, cabins for the slaves and a log smoke house. I had heard when I was a child that Jacob never asked a slave to do anything that he would not do himself. There was plenty for all hands big enough to work, and I'm sure they did.

In 1829—30, a Post Office was established in Vineyard (the second one in Washington County), with Lewis Evans as the first postmaster. Jacob Chandler was postmaster in 1834 and 1840. It was Jacob Chandler and Jonathan Allen's $300.00 bond posted on behalf of Lewis Evans that secured the position for Evans. In 1830, Jacob was appointed judge of Vineyard Township. He was known as Squire Chandler.

Jacob and Elizabeth's children were Emily, born 1816; William, in Jacob's Bible written in tiny grief-stricken letters, "William died:"; Preston Chandler (my paternal grandfather), born February 1820; Alfred, born 1821; Benjamin Franklin, born 1822; Louanna, born January 21, 1825; Albert Gallatin, born October 5, 1826; Eunita (or Unity), born February 8, 1829, the first child born in Washington County; Lucinda, born January 15, 1831; James Monroe, born April 23, 1833 and Elizabeth Jane, born January 18, 1835.

Elizabeth died April 7, 1836 at the age of 36. Sixteen days later, Louanna died and in less than a month, the baby, Elizabeth Jane died. It is easy to imagine the grief and sorrow suffered by the family on Chandler Mountain. Jacob established a family cemetery on the west side of the mountain. It is now on Highway 59 just out of Dutch Mills, Arkansas.

Jacob's slaves were deeply devoted to him. There was one called Jubal who was always at Jacob's side. Jubal stayed with Jacob until Jacob died in November 1876. He was 83 and his death is entered in his Bible, and I believe it is on his tombstone, "He died in the full triumph of his faith".

I am sure Jubal made his coffin, and probably "laid him out" for burial. I've wondered if Jubal stayed on after Jacob's death. He may have gone to some of Jacob's family or stayed on the mountain if any of the family were there. Jacob's daughter, Lucinda Ewing and husband had looked after Jacob. Anyway, I hope Jubal was treated kindly.

Jacob's cemetery contained the graves of Micajah, his son Noah, Jacob and Elizabeth, Preston and his wife, Bathsheba Ann, the two little girls and Jacob's sister, Flora when the family moved it in December 1978 to Vineyard Cemetery.

On May 8, 1980, the Marion Chapter of the Daughters of the American Revolution marked Micajah Reeder's grave with a beautiful bronze marker.

Robert Cross Clark

Little is known of the northern Tennessee branch of the Clarks prior to 1804 when Richard Clark, father of John Madison Clark, the first of the Arkansas Clarks, farmed and reared a family near Livingston, Tennessee.

The parents of Robert Cross Clark (b. April 28, 1873, d. December 24, 1925) and the nine brothers and three sisters that comprised the children who eventually resided in Hindsville, Arkansas, were John Madison Clark (b. February 20, 1841, m. May 16, 1867, d. January 17, 1920) and Mary Jane Harrison (b. February 12, 1850, d. April 28, 1873); and Susan Harrison (b. July 4, 1854, d. January 12, 1916). Three children were born in Livingston, Tennessee. Lawrence Wellington, Sallie Ophelia and Robert Cross. The middle name Cross honored an itinerant school teacher who lived with the family while teaching school, and spent much time tutoring the Clark children during off hours. A pioneering spirit and intense interest in education have always been driving forces in the Clark families.

John Madison Clark attended such schools as were available in his youth and in 1861 he volunteered, was assigned as a private to the 8th Tennessee Infantry Regiment and spent four years in the Civil War (q. v.). Early in 1862 he was made 1st Lt. and remained as such throughout the war, although his duties and authority were at times those of a higher rank, (See bibliography). In the last several months of the war he was stationed in Macon, Georgia with what was left of his brigade. Although he had been seriously wounded in the battle of Atlanta by a musket ball to the knee, he had recovered sufficiently and asked to be returned to more active duty. However his education and administrative skill made him more valuable to his commanders in issuing written requisitions, orders and in other headquarters' functions. He was captured at Macon and finally discharged May 8, 1865, and his sabre and musket, which are still in the family were returned to him. A few more than 100 men of the 5000 who enlisted with him were accounted for at the end.

After marriage in 1867 he worked in farming and lumbering to provide for a growing family during the difficult times of Reconstruction. The birth of three children and the death of his wife when Robert Cross was born put a terrible load on him. He fell in love with his first wife's cousin, Susan Harrison (b. July 4, 1854, d. January 12, 1916), and because of the disapproval of the romance by both families they eloped in 1875 taking the three children with them. They left Livingston secretly in a flatboat via the Obey and Cumberland Rivers to Nashville; and then overland to Memphis where they were married. They took river steamers down the Mississippi and up the Arkansas River to Spadra's Landing. There they went by horseback north to Uncle Jimmy Holt's farm near the intersection of what is now Arkansas Highways 7 and 206 south of Harrison, Arkansas. Uncle Jimmy was a distant relative and must have been a co-conspirator in the elopement because he housed them until they obtained their own accommodations. They eventually acquired a homestead and several hundred acres in Hindsville, Madison County, Arkansas. It was almost two years before they wrote and became reconciled with the Tennessee relatives.

The family prospered and two girls and eight boys were born to the second marriage. A two-story colonial style "dogtrot" house was built on the farm which was about three miles due east of the center of Hindsville. The children rode horseback or walked over four miles to Farmer Schoolhouse southeast of the farm or to the Hindsville school. The extent of their schooling is not known but all of the children were considered well educated for the times and all lived successful and productive lives. The home was characterized by quiet dignity, mutual respect and love of family. Many family gatherings, reunions, and regional parties were held as the children grew and produced families of their own. Robert Cross and Troy Franklin Clark (q. v.) resided in Washington County most of their adult lives. Other members of the family sought their fortunes in California, Oklahoma, Texas and in Madison County, Arkansas. Richard Forrest Clark was a successful oil man and retired to the home place. After his death his widow Blanche Kilgo Clark sold the home place and resides in Springdale, Arkansas. Irma Fitch Giffels, (q. v.) daughter of Effie Clark Fitch, the first daughter born in Arkansas to the John Madison Clarks, retired in Springdale in 1977. She was one of the nieces who started high school in Springdale living with the Robert Cross Clarks. After graduating from the University of Arkansas, and obtaining a masters degree in home economics at the University of Tennessee, she became noted in business and philanthropy, particularly in fields of education.

The Robert Cross Clark Family: Robert Cross Clark longed for more education and after finishing all that Hindsville offered he earned a Commercial Certificate from the University of Arkansas in Fayetteville in 1894. He returned to Hindsville and taught in the Farmer School. The route he used in riding horseback from home to school passed the home of Martha Jane Starnes (b. January 26, 1876 d. November 11, 1967), one of his students. A romance developed and they were married on her birthday in 1901. Her parents, Nicholas and Elizabeth Rucker Starnes, had moved to Hindsville from Taney County, Missouri before the Civil War. Nicholas served in the Union Cavalry three years from age 15 to 18. The newlyweds resided in Hindsville where he opened a drugstore that burned in 1904. He then bought an interest in a general store run by Edward B. Cummings, a good friend and his business partner as long as he lived. The Clarks first child was Howard Rupert Clark, (b. November 1, 1901, d. August 23, 1977), born in Hindsville.

For some unrecorded reason the partners moved west to Grove, Oklahoma Territory and opened a store. A second son Robert Harold Clark was born there on November 9, 1906. The partners became discouraged in the business and scouted further west for business opportunities, riding horseback to Tulsa, Oklahoma, a wild frontier town of little more than twelve hundred people. Clark told the story many times of how he and Ed Cummings sat on their horses at the muddy and rutted main road intersection in Tulsa and surveyed a dismal scene. He remarked to Ed, "I doubt that this town will ever amount to a damn. Lets go back to Arkansas." Not many years later millions of barrels of oil were found under that very spot. Clark also told the story of the two walking up Pikes Peak, Colorado and sliding down parts of the cog railroad on large flat rocks. An old photograph shows the pair on burros in front of Balanced Rock, Colorado in about 1906. There is some reason to believe they saw also the 1906 San Francisco earthquake damage before returning home.

They came back to Springdale and on March 12, 1907 bought the Farrar Mercantile Company located at the northeast corner of Mill Street and Emma Avenue from W. T. Farrar, and Bert and Art Lewis, who later founded Lewis Brothers Hardware (q. v.) in Fayetteville. Most of the general merchandise was disposed of and the store renamed the Famous Hardware Co. (q. v.). Earl Simons, Stanton Thompson and James Hawn were early employees and Simons became a stockholder. Hawn moved to Fayetteville but Thompson and Simons stayed with the company until retirement, the latter after 55 years service.

The business flourished and eventually occupied additional warehouse space on both sides of Mill Street. Robert Cross, known as Bob, was a popular and respected member of the growing community. He served as city alderman, president of the Community Club, and a founding director of the Rotary Club in 1925. He was influential in the location of the Welch Grape Juice Company plant in Springdale and served as Chairman of the Annual Grape Festival in 1925. Ed Cummings was a convincing talker and along with Simons and Thompson a staunch member of the First Baptist Church. Clark, a great story teller completed an invincible sales team. It was said at the time, "If Ed couldn't fast-talk a sale, Earl and Stant would ask the Lord's help, and Bob would demolish any final resistance with an appropriate story. The customer had no chance."

Note horse barn in rear which was modified in 1918 to accommodate the first family automobile. Horse stall was retained for use of High School students from farm families.

Martha Jane was also a community leader, active in the First Baptist Church, the public library, the Garden Club and and was president of the Womens Civic Club. She remained active in civic and church affairs until a few years before her death at age 91.

Robert Cross Clark, age 53, died suddenly at the home after closing the store late on Christmas Eve 1925. The Springdale News said of him, "His death came at a time when Springdale was in need of his aid and cooperation, in the busy years of huge crops and bustling business. His services to the city did much to bring Springdale to its place as the metropolis of the fruit industry." The two sons were ever mindful of the contributions and sacrifices their parents made to provide better opportunities for them. There was never a time that anything less than a college education was even discussed. Also for the broadening effect of travel, an 8000 mile, three months camping-sightseeing trip by car through 14 states in the West was completed by the family in 1921. Because of lack of roads and other facilities this required at times almost superhuman effort. The trip had a wonderful effect on all of the family. Interest in education extended also to providing accommodations for nieces and nephews to attend high school and to providing daytime stable space for the horses used by farm youngsters attending high school.

Howard Rupert Clark Family: The move of the family from Grove, Oklahoma to Springdale was uneventful because there was little to move. The family first lived near the intersection of Huntsville Avenue and Berry Street and briefly on Maple Avenue before purchasing the house at 124 North Thompson Street (Highway 71B) diagonally southwest across the corner from the original high school building. Howard was an excellent student and took an active part in school affairs including playing halfback on the football team. The story is told that the coach implored the school superintendent to send some big boys out for the team. Howard, who was not large, was the only recruit, leading the coach to complain, "I asked for some big boys and all I got was a "nubbin". Howard was affectionately known as "Nub" for the rest of his life.

Youngsters of the period were employed mainly in farming chores and harvesting and preparing fruit and berries for shipment. Being the son of a hardware merchant gave Howard opportunities to clerk in the store and handle mechanical equipment. This plus the yearly overhaul of the family car with instructions by J. W. G. Becker, a master mechanic who owned a Howard was employed after graduation as a sales engineering trainee by The Powers Regulator Co., in Chicago, maker of automatic temperature control systems. After several months training he was transferred to Kansas City, Missouri. He was married July 18, 1923 at his bride's home to Caroline Virginia Price (b. November 3, 1902, d. January 8, 1984), his college sweetheart, the daughter of Floyd Newton Price and Leona Harper Price of Russellville, Arkansas. The Price family was in the clothing business there and later in Fayetteville. The young couple lived in Kansas City until early 1926 when they moved to Springdale where Howard replaced his deceased father as co-owner of the Famous Hardware Company. They made their home with Howards's mother until 1928 when they jointly built and occupied a duplex of Howard's design on the lot south of the home place. The duplex was featured in the August 1949 Household Magazine. The experience proved invaluable in later projects requiring building design skill. Howard's sacrifice of a promising engineering career to return to Springdale allowed his brother Robert H. to complete his electrical engineering degree at the University of Arkansas in 1929.

The Famous Hardware Company (q. v.) and the owners survived the very difficult times of the great depression by self sacrifice and good management. Caroline kept books for the firm for some time. As business expanded in Springdale, additional opportunities presented themselves, Howard and Dupree Deaver, (q. v.), a Springdale native who had worked elsewhere most of his career, returned and they opened the Clark-Deaver Hdwe. Co. store on the south side of the 100 E. Emma Ave. block in 1937. The store prospered until World War II interfered. Howard took leave for two years and was cited for his contribution as an engineer-draftsman in the US Glider Plant at Ft. Smith. The gliders were an important part of the D-Day invasion of France.

Clark-Deaver merged with the Pioneer Lumber Company (q. v.) in 1950 to form the Pioneer Company and built and occupied the building at 202 East Emma Avenue which later was purchased by Joe Steele (q. v.) to house the First State Bank (q. v.). The combination of uncertain health and advancing age of the principals prompted them to choose semi-retirement and liquidate the company in 1955.

Howard participated in many civic groups, serving as Alderman, Pres. of the Chamber of Commerce, Pres. of the Rotary Club and was active in local, regional and state public library affairs. In 1927—28 he designed and supervised building the first Springdale Public Library building at 118 W. Johnson Ave. He served as Pres. of the local and Ozarks Regional Library Boards, and as member of the Ark. State Library Commission for almost 13 years 1964—75. As Chairman of the Building Committee he also supervised the design and building of the Springdale Public Library at Maple Ave. and Pleasant St. He had a lifelong interest in communications and was a gifted writer and prize-winning photographer. After retirement he illustrated the writings of his wife Caroline and wrote short stories and semi-technical articles for national magazines, such as Popular Mechanics. Many of his articles were about developments he created in his woodworking shop. Part of his photographic work was also as a semi-professional for local businesses. In 1964 he designed and supervised the building of a home overlooking Lake Fayetteville at 4804 S. Turner St. which contained a separate half-apartment facility for his mother and her sister Aunt Nannie Jones from Hindsville.

Caroline, like her husband was civic minded and an accomplished writer. Her college major in languages was augmented by correspondence courses from the Univ. of Mo. School of Journalism. She wrote short stories and epigrams and was for 18 years the principle creator of ideas and captions for the nationally syndicated cartoon panel "Side Glances" by Gil Fox, more recently drawn by the cartoonist Galbraith. Her feature stories appeared in the Arkansas Gazette, Kansas City Star, St. Louis Post Dispatch and Cappers Weekly. For Household Magazine she wrote a regular column popular with teenagers. A highlight occurred in 1939 when Colliers magazine published one of her stories. This was followed by stories in Liberty Magazine, Sunday supplements and other national publications. She also found time for leadership roles in P. E. O., Pen Point Club, Booklovers Club, Twentieth Century Club and honorary membership in Beta Sigma Phi. She was a member of Chi Omega sorority in college.

Howard and Caroline were parents of Caroline Virginia (Carol) Clark, (b. October 1, 1930) who very early in life showed excellent musical talent and selected the pipe organ as her principal instrument. She received a B. A. degree from the Univ. of Arkansas in 1955 and a Masters in Music from the Univ. of Texas in 1972. While at the U. of A. she married Alexander Wallace Hamilton, a transfer student from Idaho, on August 25, 1950. He is the son of Clark and Alice Hamilton of Weiser, Idaho. Clark Hamilton was the owner of an unusual general merchandise store featured in Esquire and Readers Digest Magazines in the 1940s as the "Store With No Front." He also was a student and critic of political affairs and was narrowly defeated in the race for governor of Idaho in 1954. Alex and Carol continued their musical careers and studies, and Alex obtained a Ph. D from the University of Texas in 1969. He held several positions as high school band director and musical director in cities in Arkansas, Louisiana and Texas and eventually entered college administration. His current position is Associate Dean of the Conservatory of Music-Univ. of Mo. in Kansas City. Carol teaches in Johnson County, Kansas Community College and in the Kansas State School for the Visually Handicapped; and is organist for the 2nd Church of Christ Scientist in Kansas City.

In spite of extremely busy careers and school work Alex and Carol reared and educated through college five children - Faith, Holly, Clark, Andrew and Schuyler — the last named having graduated from college in 1985. All are talented musically and are successful and productive citizens.

Robert Harold Clark Family: Robert H. (also known as Bob), like his brother Howard was exposed to things mechanical but unlike him became more interested in things electrical because of the advent of radio broadcasting in the 1920s. He and friends built and experimented with Morse Code radios made from scrap electrical materials. He received an A. C. Gilbert Company single-vacuum-tube receiver for Christmas in 1921 and was the first in town to hear voice and music from KDKA, Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania. His father was so excited he financed him in building in 1922—23 the first multi-vacuum-tube radio receivers with loudspeakers in Springdale. People came from far and near to hear this miracle of science, and soon the radio revolution was launched. His interests also included athletics in which he lettered in football and pole vault. He was quarterback of the 4-H backfield on the 1922 and 23 teams made up of Harold, Howard Wood, Harry Hayes and Harley Gover. Marsten Sturdivant was the center and Ulys Lovell the coach.

He chose electrical engineering at the University of Arkansas in 1924 and received a BSEE degree in 1929. He was active in campus affairs and organizations, having been house manager of Sigma Chi, founding Pres. of Theta Tau engineering fraternity, and Pres. of Interfraternity Council, the Razorback Boosters Club and General Engineering Society; and member of Blue Key, Who's Who and Phi Mu Alpha (music). In 1927 Margaret Cunningham Daggett, (b. December 3, 1908, d. June 6, 1983) of Marianna, Arkansas, having graduated from Ward-Belmont prep school in Nashville, Tennessee, entered the University and became a member of Pi Beta Phi sorority. She was the daughter of Charles Eben Daggett a prominent corporation lawyer and planter and Ruby Irene Lockwood of Kiowa, Kansas, member of a pioneer south-central Kansas family. The Daggetts included many distinguished in the law, education and government from the time of their coming to Massachusetts in 1630 until the present time.

Margaret and Robert H. were married after graduation in 1929. They moved to Schenectady, New York where Robert H. was employed by the General Electric Co. (starting salary $96 per month—and these were "good times", before the great depression). Most of the depression was spent in Automatic Control Systems design and application engineering, leading to assignment in 1937 to the Cleveland, Ohio office as a sales engineering specialist. Sales contacts led to his employment in 1939 by Warner & Swasey Co., GE's best customer in Cleveland. Products of the company were production metal-cutting machines, astronomical telescopes, textile processing and material handling machinery, for which he received six patents for automatic control systems. Several weeks in 1939 were spent at Ft. Davis, Texas in the final electrical tune-ups of the controls on the 82 inch diameter McDonald Observatory telescope of the University of Texas, the worlds second largest at the time.

Thirty years were spent with Warner & Swasey during which Robert H. was successively Ch. Elec. Engr., Administrative Engineer, and Director of Organization Development. The last named job encompassed recruiting, employment, training and placement; and corporate organization planning, communications and psychological services in the company of more than 6000 employees in 16 plants.

Robert Cross (Bob) Clark. Photograph taken about 1918 when he was 45 years of age and a substantial leader in the community.

The company was a world leader in the revolutionary development of electrical controlled automatic production machinery during and after World War II; and in the promotion of the development of more reliable and safe electrical equipment for the severe service required. The latter activity required leadership in national organizations and most of this work was assigned to Robert H. He held leadership roles as Chmn. of the Electrical and Training Committees of the National Machine Tool Builders Assn. (NMTBA), Chmn. of the Machine Tool and Textile Committees of the American Institute of Electrical Engineers (AIEE), a member of the War Emergency Standards Committee of the American Standards Association, a member of the American Apprenticeship Round Table and acting Chmn. of the Education Program of the two thousand-member Cleveland Engineering Society. During these assignments the NMTBA Electrical Standards, the AIEE Recommended Practices for Textile Machinery and the NMTBA Training Standards were published. Work on CES Education was rewarded by receipt in 1962 of the Society's eleventh Gold Medal awarded in its eighty year history. These activities required presenting many technical papers and extensive travel from coast to coast; and negotiation with many people in industry and government.

After retirement in 1969 and moving to Springdale in 1973 Robert H. and Margaret traveled extensively in 48 states, Europe and much of Mexico and Canada. Most of the travel in North America, including pre-retirement, was by recreational vehicle camping, covering more than 200,000 miles. After the three children were taken on extensive educational camping trips, the parents almost completed the same goal for the grandchildren. Advancing years and the arrival of six grandchildren intervened before the goal was reached.

The Clark's active religious life began in earnest in Christ Church, Shaker Heights, Ohio when the children, Robert Sheffield, (b. April 18, 1934), Linda Jane, (b. November 17, 1937) and John Charles, (b. August 24, 1939) were of Sunday School age. Margaret, a lifelong Episcopalian, had been confirmed in St. Andrews Episcopal Church in Marianna, Arkansas, and Robert H. although reared in the Baptist Church was confirmed in 1952 with son John C. in Christ Church. The entire family has remained active in leadership positions in churches of their choice for most of their lives. After Margaret's death Robert H. was married November 9, 1984 to Ima Jean Lindstrom, (b. August 13, 1905), a friend of the family and devoted co-worker in St. Thomas Episcopal Church where she served as Chmn. of the Altar Guild and member of the ECW. She is a long service member of P. E. O. both in Missouri and in Springdale.

Robert H. known as an activist in retirement in Springdale became an honorary member of Rotary, a member of the Chamber of Commerce, United Fund Board, Wash. County Rural Development Commission, the Springdale Country Club Board, and St. Thomas Episcopal Church. For the Chamber of Commerce he was secretary of the Pride In Springdale Inc., project which made a detailed study and report on improvements needed in downtown Springdale to halt the flight of business to the suburbs and the decay of the central city. The project was untimely and fought by some influential property owners and was not approved by the City Council.

Son, Robert S. graduated with honors from Kenyon College, Gambier, Ohio in 1956 and after four years as an officer in the Navy was employed by Time Magazine in NYC. During this period he obtained a masters degree from New York Univ. He was editorial director of High Fidelity Magazine, music critic of Hudson Review Literary Magazine and listed in Who's Who in America. He is presently executive editor of Photonics Spectra high-tech magazine in Pittsfield, Massachusetts. By his first wife Margaret Ann Leitner (b. July 11, 1931, d. April 29, 1974), he had three sons-David Daggett, Nicholas Robert and Eben Patrick. He and his second wife Ruthana Donahue, now divorced, have one daughter Valentina Ann.

Daughter, Linda Jane graduated with honors from Lake Erie College in 1959, obtained a Masters Degree in Music (organ) from Univ. of Wisconsin and a SMD from Union Theological Seminary in NYC. She spent one college year studying music in France and is now Assistant Prof. of Church Music and Choral Director at Boston Univ. School of Theology and married to Rev. Edwin Pease of Christ Church, Episcopal, Medway, Massachusetts. They have no children.

Son John Charles graduated from Kenyon College in 1961, where he lettered in lacrosse and was active in extra-curricular affairs. He worked briefly for the Cleveland Trust Co. and volunteered for military service. After three years in Army counter-intelligence and seven years in machine tool sales he became District Manager-Milwaukee of Warner and Swasey Co. He is presently a Vice President of Hueller-Hille Corp. maker and distributor of machine tools, Troy, Michigan. He is married to Judith Byrd Lewis Clark (b. August 27, 1939), daughter of Alvis Watson Lewis, Jr. and Esther Byrd Gilliam Lewis of Waynesboro, Virginia. They have two children, John Charles, Jr. and Caroline Randolph.

Marla Fay Crider

Marla Fay Crider was born August 19, 1953, at Greenland, (Washington County) Arkansas, the fourth child and only daughter of parents, Mitchell and Laura Crider. She was the second granddaughter and last grandchild born to Bruce, Sr. and Ollie Gollaher Crider. Marla spent much time as a child playing and learning among family members. She spent endless hours sitting on the arm of her maternal grandfather's chair in his private quarters in her home, learning how to read and write some at the age of four. She attended all twelve years of school at Greenland and graduated in 1971 with honors among thirty-eight classmates. It is interesting to note that twenty-six out of thirty-eight of those graduating that year all started the first grade together.

In Marla's early years, having lived only fifteen yards or so from the Greenland Railroad Depot, she had a fascination for trains. Until 1962, the U. S. Mail was delivered to Greenland every morning and evening by one of many mail/passenger trains. Each evening when the train stopped to pick up and deliver the mail, Marla met the train's conductor. Over the years they became great friends. On the last run of the Frisco passenger/mail train through Greenland, Marla boarded with her cousin, Jim Crider, for her first and only train ride to Fayetteville. Upon departing the train in Fayetteville, her friend, the conductor, presented her a small Bible as a token of their friendship. She still has it.

Marla accumulated several academic and sports honors during her high school years. She participated in the Northwest Arkansas Junior Miss Pageant and was selected to represent the area in the state pageant in 1970. Marla also was honored for her outstanding defensive play in several basketball tournaments. After graduation from GHS, Marla attended the University of Arkansas in Fayetteville, majoring in Journalism and English Education. In the second semester of her senior year, Marla married Darrell E. Douglas of Seligman, Missouri and they immediately moved to Bay Springs, Mississippi where Darrell was employed as the Assistant Personnel Director for Northern Electric Company. They later moved to Laurel, Mississippi where Marla was employed by Fine Bros-Matison Department Store as their Ladies Sportswear buyer. This job required her to travel frequently to Dallas, New Orleans and New York City on buying trips. The last two years, Marla lived in Laurel, she worked for Masonite Corporation, the world's largest manufacturer of hardboard siding and paneling, as their Marketing Communications Assistant. In 1981, she divorced and returned to Fayetteville where she worked for The Fayetteville Hilton as their Director of Sales.

In the Spring of 1986, Marla bought her first home on East Dickson Street in a lovely neighborhood, just a block from the Fayetteville Historic District.

Marion Paul Crider

Marion Paul Crider was born August 25, 1945, the second child of parents Mitchell and Laura Crider. Marion's pre-school years were spent in and around the Crider home in Greenland. He and his brothers and sister were fortunate to live in close proximity to grandparents, aunts, uncles and cousins. Visiting with family was almost a daily adventure. Marion began his public school career in Greenland and when not in school, he spent much time playing and working in the Crider Grocery and at Crider Brothers Nursery which was also located in Greenland. Many of Marion's more vivid memories come from time spent working and playing on the family farm located west of Greenland where his grandfather, M. B. Crider, began the production of Polled Hereford Cattle. Marion's entire public school years were spent at Greenland where he graduated in 1963. Most members of this class began the first grade together and over that twelve years, many close friendships were developed and many still exist today. His high school friendships and athletic efforts are among Marion's most cherished memories as he was fortunate to have been a member of Greenland's only undefeated football team in 1962-63 which was one of the last years for the eight man football program statewide. The Greenland team of 1962-63 were the undisputed district and conference champions setting several offense and defensive records. Marion was named to the all-district defensive team that year. Immediately after football season, practically the same team became basketball players and brought home the County Champs trophy in district 1B. That same year, the Greenland athletes won the first ever state championship in volleyball with the state tournament being held at the University of Arkansas. The Greenland team had to compete against many class AAA and AAAA schools to clinch that title. Marion began his college career at the University of Arkansas in 1963, attended one year at Arkansas Tech at Russellville, Arkansas in 1966, then earned his degree in Business from the University of Arkansas in 1969. While at the University of Arkansas, Marion met the love of his life, Carolyn Ann Ray who hailed from West Fork, Arkansas, the daughter of Maurice L. Ray and Lois Nell Carter Ray of West Fork, Arkansas. Carolyn had graduated from the University of Arkansas in 1967 earning her BS degree in education. Marion and Carolyn were married July 30, 1967 at the First Christian Church in Fayetteville, Arkansas. Carolyn began her teaching career in the Fayetteville Public Schools in 1967 while Marion continued his final year at the University of Arkansas. After graduation, Marion went into business with his father at Crider Grocery in Greenland. On May 2, 1970, Marion and Carolyn celebrated the birth of their first child, a son, Matthew Lane Crider. Then on April 13, 1971, a second son, Marcus Marion Crider was born. In 1971, after his father's retirement, Marion became sole owner of Crider Grocery which he then sold in 1975. Marion worked for various local retail major appliance outlets for several years and currently works for a large major appliance wholesaler specializing in contract sales. Carolyn earned her masters in education degree in 1980 and currently teaches kindergarten in Fayetteville Public Schools. Both sons attend Fayetteville schools where Lane is a senior involved in Band and Marcus is a junior with football as his main priority. Both boys make excellent grades and are hoping for college scholarships. Marion and Carolyn built their first home in 1978 where they presently live. They and their sons are active members of First Christian Church in Fayetteville and spend much of their time raising Polled Hereford cattle on their farm south of Greenland.

Michael D. Crider

Michael Don Crider was born October 11, 1941 at Greenland, Washington County, Arkansas, the first child born to parents Mitchell H. and Laura E. Crider and first grandchild of M. B. and Ollie Gollaher Crider. Michael's early pre-school years were spent playing at the Crider home and early snapshots, at about age four, indicate he, with shovel in hand, pretended to dig evergreens from the Nursery healing lot which was then near his home. Also, he visited his Granddad Crider's Grocery often, where he received special treats. Michael's public school years began at Greenland in the fall of 1947 and continued until his graduation in the spring of 1959, he was active in sports, both basketball and football from fifth grade and was quarterback of Greenland's six man football team his junior and senior years. The first game won by Greenland in 1958, was in defeat of Prairie Grove.

Upon graduation, Michael entered the University of Arkansas School of Business Administration. In Fayetteville, at the Braden Freewill Baptist Church on December 15, 1962, Michael married his high school sweetheart, Barbara Carol Napier, the daughter of Verlon E. and Mary Drake Napier of Greenland. They were making their home in Fayetteville at the time when Michael, while doing part-time landscape work for Crider Brothers

Nursery, became acquainted with the manager of Elkhart Products Corporation, a new Arkansas Industrial Plant just opening, manufacturing and shipping copper fittings, parts for refrigerators and air conditioners, and whose parent company is located in Elkhart, Indiana. Following a six-month tour of duty with the U. S. Army National Guard, Michael was told he had a job waiting at Elkhart Products Corporation of Arkansas. He began work there on August 5, 1963 and for sixteen years, was office manager before receiving a telephone call one night in 1979 about 10:30 p. m. informing him that as of that hour, he had been made Plant Manager and where he currently serves in that capacity. The plant employs approximately 120 people, and has been enlarged twice with the most recent changes being a 1987 addition of 21,000 square feet to house a copper melting, casting and drawing facility.

In 1964, Barbara's father, Verlon Napier, gave Barbara and Michael a nice big building lot from his hilltop farm in Greenland. His generosity made it possible for them to build their first home which was a pretty little two-bedroom white frame house, total construction cost 6,600 dollars. It was the first house built on a new street which circled a new addition, so the street was named Scott Circle in honor of their first son, Clayton Scott Crider, who was born on February 6, 1965. A second son was born on August 18, 1968 and named John Paul Crider. The family lived in the Greenland area for the next thirteen years at which time they returned to Fayetteville to live. Scott and John attended the Fayetteville schools before graduation from high school. Scott attended four years of college studying communications and advertising and graduated from Quachita Baptist University at Arkadelphia, Arkansas in the spring of 1987 and is currently employed by TCBY Company in Little Rock, Arkansas. John Paul plans to attend the University of Arkansas beginning in the fall of 1987.

Mitchell Henry Crider

Mitchell Henry Crider, son of Marion Bruce, Sr. and Ollie Gollaher Crider of Greenland, Washington County, Arkansas, and Laura Elizabeth Bradshaw, the daughter of Fred B. and Mamie E. White Bradshaw, also of Greenland, were married December 21, 1940 at home of the Lynn Bradshaw family, brother of Laura, and then living in Greenland. Mitchell and Laura had known each other since her family had moved to the city in 1929, even attended school together, but had never dated until Laura returned in May of 1940 from an extended visit to Venezuela, South America with her sister and family and where she had been employed by Pan American Airways, in Caracas. Mitchell had served three years in the National Guard and at the time of their marriage was a motor route carrier employed by Northwest Arkansas Times and was part owner of Crider Brothers Nursery along with brothers, Paul and Bruce. At the time a home was established by this couple, Greenland lacked the use of two important utilities, natural gas and running water, so those first few years fuel for heating and cooking was provided by wood and coal. In setting up housekeeping, a brand new little white enameled wood range was a source of pride, while the wood heater, also goodlooking, was black with lots of shiny nickel, gave out needed warmth for comfort.

Water for home use was carried from a well. On October 11, 1941, a son, Michael Don Crider was born to this couple, and the first born grandchild to Bruce, Sr. and Ollie Crider. World War II was just getting underway and during the early months of Michael's life, Mitchell was employed as guard at an ammunitions plant in Chouteau, Oklahoma. He lived in Tulsa, commuted to work and home on weekends, until both brothers had been drafted into the armed services then he returned home and devoted full time to the nursery business. On August 25, 1945, a second son was born and named Marion Paul. At about this time, plans were being made for a new first home to be built. Mitchell, with the help of Laura's dad and other family members, built the house ready to move into in October of that year.

A year or so later, natural gas was made available to Greenland residents by Arkansas Western Gas Company of Fayetteville, a great improvement to the city. Mitchell was serving on the Greenland City Council when talk began about trying to get Fayetteville city water extended further south, so he was appointed to head a three member water commission to meet with the Fayetteville council and after numerous meetings and discussions a water district was formed, agreements reached, contracts signed and water lines began being laid about 1949, the greatest improvement since electricity. Indoor plumbing was installed in most residences and the schools. In 1950 on March 11, a third son was born and was named Malcolm Frederick. This little family was very happy, very busy, and everything seemed so right when tragedy struck a crushing blow. Two years later on April 19, 1952, Malcolm died of a sudden illness. He is buried at Baptist Ford Cemetery at Greenland. The Crider Brothers Nursery which was located on Highway 71, south of Fayetteville Airport, demanded full time year around work plus the employment of five other men. They cut their own bud sticks, grafted their own seedlings and grew their own fruit tree stock in the fields until the young trees were old enough and large enough for transplanting, then in the fall, after the first good frost and leaves could be easily stripped off, they were dug, labeled as to variety, healed in, packed in sawdust and wood shavings to prevent freeze damage. As mail orders were received, the young trees were wrapped to protect tender roots and shipped to different states and sold locally as well. The concrete block nursery building provided a warm place to work while preparing and wrapping. Balled and burlapped evergreens, shrubbery and hybrid tea roses were purchased for resale from Texas, Oklahoma, Fort Smith, Mountainburg, and Benton County nurseries in Arkansas and sold from the healing lot. Crider Brothers also gave estimates and did landscaping in surrounding areas of Fayetteville for many years.

On August 19, 1953 a fourth and last child, a daughter, was born to Mitchell and Laura and named Marla Fay. Following the death of their father, Mitchell and Paul were left with the grocery store, so they sold the nursery and in 1958, a new concrete block store building was erected a few feet east of where the old one stood on Highway 71. The new building housed Helen's Beauty Shop, owned and operated by Helen Crider, sister of the Crider brothers, also the Post Office of which Paul Crider was postmaster several years until his sudden death on March 16, 1968. Mitchell was then appointed and served as Acting Postmaster for a time but because of deteriorating health was forced to give it up. Georgetta Smith was appointed Officer in Charge and Laura Crider became clerk in 1971. A new and first ever post office building for Greenland was built in 1975 east of the Crider grocery on Crider property and rented to the Postal Service.

William Yoes became postmaster and Laura Crider continued as clerk for ten years before retiring in February of 1981. Mitchell, in failing health, was replaced in the grocery by his son Marion who operated it until he went out of business and after seventy five years of service, there was no longer a Crider grocery. Mitchell served his community and the public for over forty years. He served as chairman of the board of officers of Baptist Ford Cemetery for twenty five years. He and his family were active members of the First Christian Church in Fayetteville since 1956. Mitchell died on February 2, 1985 and is buried in Baptist Ford Cemetery beside his son Malcolm and among other family members.

Alexander Cruse

The Washington County, Arkansas census of 1860 lists household No. 73 as William Cruse, age 33, a farmer born in Tennessee in 1827; his wife, Martha Lacy Cruse, age 28, born in Morgan County, Alabama; presumably near Lacy's Springs in 1834, and a daughter Susan, age 6, born in Alabama; a son, Alexander, age 4, born in Alabama; and a son, William, age 1, the first of the family to be born in Arkansas after their move (no later than 1859) to Cane Hill, Arkansas.

Lacy Neal Cruse and Wallie B. Ross Cruse, parents of Lillian Cruse Woods. 1901 photo.

William and Martha were married on March 26, 1851 in Madison County, Alabama and lived in Whitesburg, Alabama before moving to Arkansas.

Tax records show that Thomas H. Lacy, a half-uncle of Martha's was living at Cane Hill in 1856. It may have been his influence that caused the Cruses to relocate in this area.

The William Cruse family lived just north of the intersection of the New Hope, Greasy Valley and Cane Hill-Fayetteville Roads, but during the Civil War their home was burned by Union soldiers, and all that was saved were a few clothes and one featherbed. Martha and the children carried their few remaining possessions to the Mitchell house nearby, but it is not known where the Cruse family lived during the remainder of the war.

After the war, William bought a farm at Apple Hill near the settlement now called White Church. He and Martha lived there until his death. Martha spent her last years living with her daughter Susan Cruse Henbest and her husband, John Albert Henbest at Mt. Comfort. She died in 1916. She and William are both buried at Prairie Grove, Arkansas.

Alexander Cruse married Lucy Crawford, daughter of Andrew Crawford and Rachel Tinnons Crawford, at the old White Church near Cane Hill on January 13, 1878. The officiating minister was a Reverend Mr. Davies.

Alexander bought a farm in Apple Hill—said to adjoin that of his father, William, and Lucy named it Idlewilde. There, six of their twelve children were born. The other six were born in Prairie Grove. While living in Prairie Grove, Alex served as Constable of the township for at least four years and City Marshall for two.

An 1880s manuscript by Lacy McColloch states: "As an indication of the recognition given to him as a worthy citizen, Alex was elected to and served on the local school board for fourteen years".

In 1906, the Alex Cruse family moved to Fayetteville to educate their children. Alex joined the police force and served as Chief of Police for a number of years before retiring in 1926.

Upon retirement, he and Lucy returned to "Idlewilde" in Apple Hill and remained there as long as they remained in good health.

Lucy Crawford died in 1938 in Fayetteville, where she and Alex had lived for two years with their children. After Lucy's death, Alex lived for a time with his daughter, Bess Cruse Yates and another daughter Clara Cruse Sexson. He remained active, gardening and helping with chores until his death on August 19, 1950. He was 94. He and Lucy are both buried at Prairie Grove.

Children and grandchildren of Alexander Cruse and Lucy Crawford as listed in the Family Bible are: Nannie Leila, born February 11, 1879; unmarried, died September 18, 1919. Lacy Neal Cruse, born January 17, 1881, died April 30, 1972, married Willie Ross, September 18, 1901, born February 13, 1881, died February 6, 1942. Martha Rachel, born February 3, 1888, married Richard Carney, died March 23, 1959—no children.

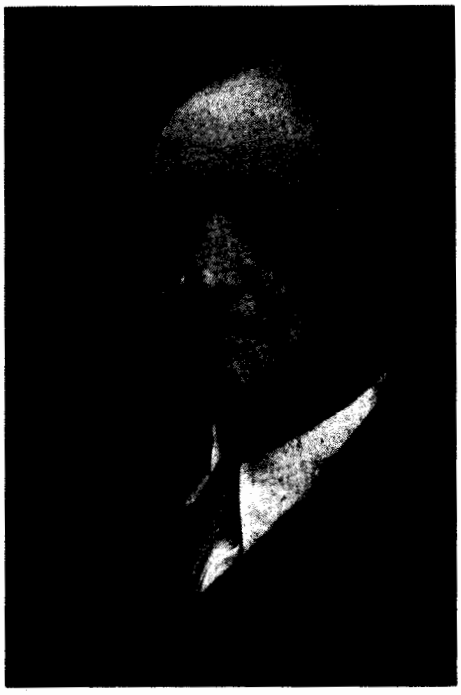
Maurice Theodore Cruse, born March 2, 1890, married Susan Amelia Carnahan March 29, 1913, died March 18, 1965. Children: William Alfred Cruse, born June 18, 1919, died May 14, 1927.



Alexander (Alex) Cruse born February 11, 1856 at Whitesburg, Alabama, married Lacy Crawford January 13, 1878 at Cane Hill. Died in 1950 at the age of 94. Buried at Prairie Grove, Arkansas.

Mary Emma Cruse, born January 31, 1892; married Clyde Maguire on May 15, died January 1968. Children: Harold Hugh Maguire, born August 22, 1926.

Elizabeth Ruth Cruse, born February 9, 1894, married Robert Yates; no children, died September 28, 1959.

Alexander Cruse, Jr., born March 2, 1896, married Beulah Pyeatt on May 19, 1918; died June 14, 1931. No children.

Robert Hugh Cruse, born January 1, 1898, married Golda Lucas; died October 16, 1965. No children.

Rufus Merle Cruse, born December 24, 1899, died April 15, 1946, married Dixie Bader first, had one child, Billie Lou Cruse. Married a second time to Oleta Lewis and had one child, Robert Merle.

The Cruse-Lacy lineage started with Hopkins Lacy II, eldest son of John and father of Martha Lacy Cruse. Early family history was taken from Theophilus Lacy of Colonial Virginia and his descendants by Lacy P. McColloch, and the later history of the Cruse family is from the book To Kimberly With Love by Lillian Cruse Woods and Buell B. Woods.

Lucy Crawford Cruse and Alex Cruse, exemplified many admirable qualities. Lucy's heritage was very important to her. The Cruse-Lacy families both have a great deal of pride when it comes to family heritage—at times to the point of boasting.

In spite of all the work involved in rearing a large family, Lucy found time to read and expressed her feelings by writing poetry.

Alex Cruse, a personal favorite, was a jovial, kind and proud man. He was a good friend and neighbor and had the time to spoil his grandchildren. His regal bearing and bright eyes remained so until the end of his ninety-four years of life.

Lacy Neal was a handsome man but was strict with his children, insisting that they entertain friends at home under his watchful eye rather than going out. Though strict, his family was allowed to play cards at home or make snacks and meals to entertain friends. His house was a gathering place.

He had a soft heart for all children, and the house seemed always to have at least one run-away. He always brought children home and called their parents to pick them up there rather than taking them to jail. This, of course, made extra work for his wife, Willie B. Ross Cruse, but in spite of her relatively carefree girlhood, part of it spent in a well-to-do Tennessee family, she never complained.

Orphaned, herself, early in life, she was brought up by an aunt in Cane Hill. She always saw the best in people, never belittling them or tolerating gossip from others. She attended Cane Hill College and enjoyed good music and classic literature.

Her life was a strong influence with her love of people and led her family into service careers. They have tried to emulate her quality of seeking the good in others.

Buell Woods, was another influence on Lillian Cruse Woods helping her to work with people and serve the community. As an educator, Buell believes that a school can be no better than the community that fostered it. His life has enriched the lives he has touched and has helped others to accept serving the community as a way to fulfill their lives.

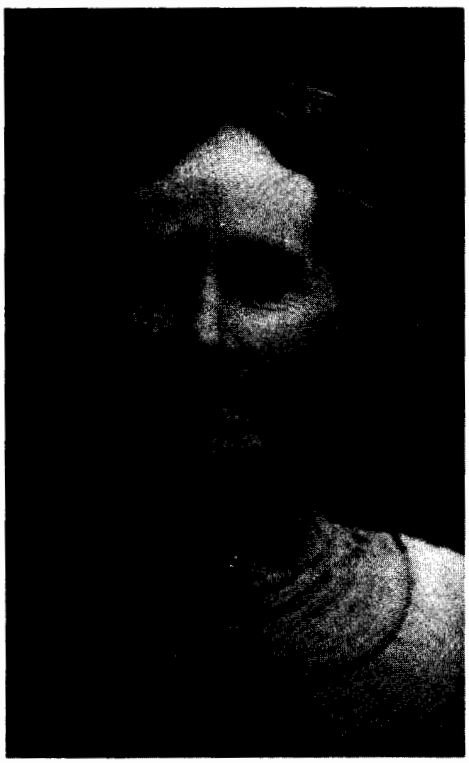
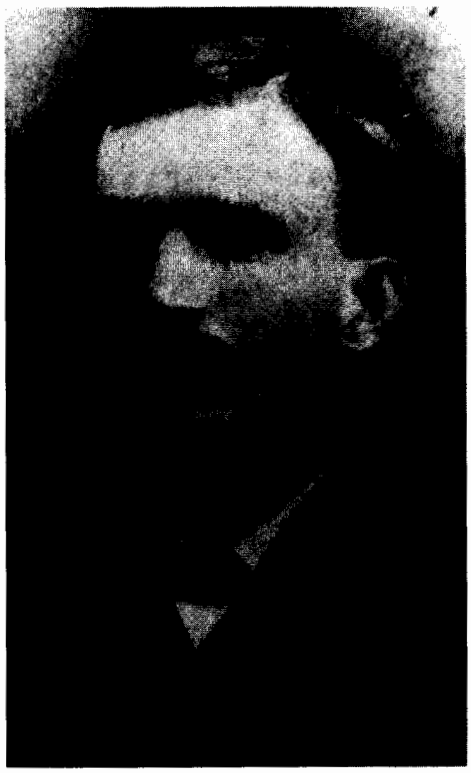
Dixie Dupree Deaver



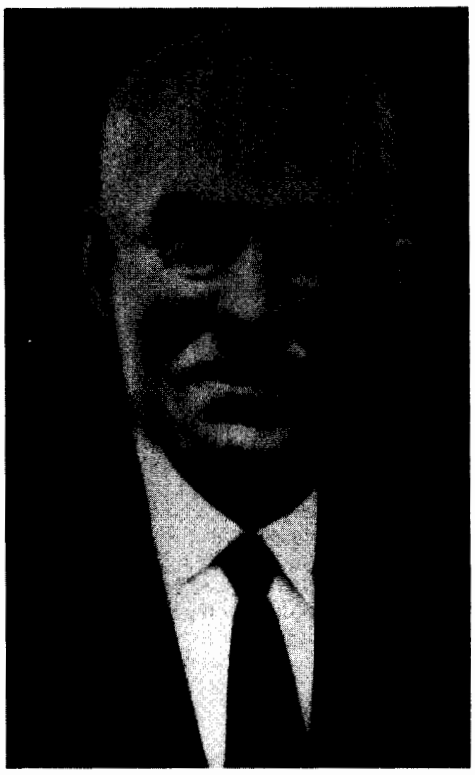
Emma Deaver - ca. 1925

William Shipley Deaver was born April 14, 1813 in Frederick County (?), Maryland, the son of Richard and Margaret Rebecca Wilt Deaver. His mother, also born in Maryland in 1791, along with his wife and four children, accompanied him to Missouri to join his brother, Benjamin Jackson Deaver, then both families moved to Elm Springs in 1850. His wife was Sarah Margaret Martin, born in Virginia, June 8, 1823 and they were married September 21, 1842 in Shepherdstown, West Virginia. The four children born in Shepherdstown are: John Richard Deaver, born 1843; Mary Elizabeth Deaver, born 1845; George William Deaver, born 1847 and Benjamin Franklin Deaver, born 1849. The family arrived in time to be included in the 1850 census. After their arrival, a fifth child was born: David Wilson Deaver, born 1851.

Mr. Deaver owned and operated a grist mill and his occupation is listed "Miller". He became Postmaster of Elm Springs in



Jacob P. Deaver



Jacob Deaver - ca. 1925

1853 and belonged to the Methodist Church, which had been organized in 1832. After Sarah Margaret Deaver died on January 9, 1853, Mr. Deaver married Sarah Eden Pearson, born February 16, 1817 in Elm Springs. They were married August 11, 1853 and one child was born to them: Jacob Pearson Deaver, born April 25, 1855.

William Shipley Deaver lived the rest of his days at Elm Springs and died May 9, 1876. Sarah Eden Pearson Deaver died May 29, 1887. They are buried in the Elm Springs Cemetery along with Mr. Deaver's mother, Margaret Deaver who died in 1852.

John Richard and George William (Billy) Deaver both lost their lives while serving in the Confederate Army. John Richard was in the 16th Arkansas Regiment and was killed June 17, 1862 in Pine Bluff, Arkansas. Billy Deaver was on furlough with his friend John McCamey, also from Elm Springs, when they were "bushwhacked" by members of the Union Army on March 21, 1865 a few miles northeast of Elm Springs. They were both killed and their bodies and saddles burned; the Union soldiers kept their horses and escaped. When the two families heard of this, they returned the bodies to Elm Springs by ox cart and buried them in a single grave with a single headstone. Mary Elizabeth Deaver married David Washington Woodruff in 1870. He was born July 27, 1831, the son of William Rivers and Matilda Ferguson Woodruff. She died August 9, 1916 and is buried in Greenwood Cemetery, Marshall, Texas along with her husband who died in 1928. David Wilson Deaver left for Texas when he was 15-years-old and father and son never saw each other again. However, he is shown as living in the year 1889. Benjamin Franklin Deaver resided in Elm Springs until he was eight, then was taken to a farm about two miles east of there, where he lived until 1880. On October 11, 1874, he married Miss Ellen, daughter of William and Rebecca Holcomb, and by her became the father of three children: Infant son, born and died August 29, 1875; William Shipley Deaver, born April 22, 1877 and died September 6, 1879 and Bertha Stella Deaver, born May 14, 1879.

Bertha married Dr. Moses Stearns and was still living in Great Falls, Idaho when visited by Dupree and Nita Deaver in 1951. Ellen Holcomb Deaver died June 19, 1882, just one year after she and B. F. Deaver moved to Springdale, where he owned a general merchandise store, which was the first dry goods store in Springdale. He was active in the Elm Springs Masonic Lodge Number 154, becoming a member in 1875, then he became a member of the Springdale Lodge Number 316 in 1881. Mr. Deaver married his second wife, Mary B. Putman, daughter of Dr. R. and Elizabeth Putman of Fayetteville, on June 4, 1884. They had one child, born and died on September 10, 1885. They were both members of the Methodist Episcopal Church. B. F. Deaver died July 2, 1903 in Springdale.

Jacob Pearson Deaver, known as "Tip" Deaver, attended school in Elm Springs, also Viney Grove and the University of Arkansas. He was employed for some time by a company furnishing supplies to a construction company doing the grading for the Frisco Railroad. In 1884, when he was 29-years-old, he came to Springdale to accept a position as bookkeeper in the mercantile establishment of his half-brother, B. F. Deaver. On October 21, 1885, he married Emma Brandon DuPree, born October 1, 1864, the daughter of Captain and Mrs. T. C. DuPree. After the death of her father, she was the step-daughter of Joseph Holcomb, who was the first mayor of Springdale. He named Emma Avenue for her when she was a small child. "Tip" and Emma were married and lived at 429 Holcomb Street, where the Post Office is now located, and just across the street from the John Stafford home. They had two sons, both born in that house: James Franklin Deaver, born May 30, 1887 and Dixie Dupree Deaver, born October 15, 1891. A new home was built on the northwest corner of Shiloh and Emma Avenue in the year 1898. Dupree is quoted as saying he remembers carrying a mirror from the old home to the new one when he was a small child. The new home had three stories plus a basement and included land in back for a barn and horses. Later, a smaller house was built in back, facing Shiloh Street, which was occupied by both sons and their families at different times. The larger house was demolished in 1968 and a filling station is there now. The small house was relocated. "Tip" was a member of the Masons, also was superintendent of the Methodist Church Sunday School for many years, until he withdrew from the church in 1908, when the minister made known his disapproval of him allowing his sons to form a club, togethere with several prominent young men of Springdale. They called it "The Knights of the Round Table", and had officers, lovely formal dinners on occasions and met some evenings to play cards in one of the upper rooms of the Deaver home. All this was done with Mr. and Mrs. Deaver's approval, as they thought it better to have these young men in their home instead of in the pool hall and on the streets. They chaperoned many parties and the members had a booklet printed for one of their Christmas dinners on December 23, 1913, giving the menu, details of the club and listing the members and officers. Mrs. Dupree Deaver has one of these booklets now. The Bank of Springdale was organized in 1888 by three men from Kansas, chartered in 1889 and then was sold to local citizens. "Tip" Deaver was cashier of that bank until 1907 when he organized the first National Bank and on January 1, 1908 the Bank of Springdale was consolidated with the First National Bank. He served on the Board of that bank until his death. Mr. Deaver was one of the first citizens in Springdale to own an automobile, it was a Buick, and he never learned to drive. However, both sons made good use of it, every Sunday afternoon, one of them had to take their parents for a drive. He was active in civic affairs and was attending a meeting of the Springdale Community Club at the Springdale Library (which is now the Shiloh Museum), when he fell, striking his head on the concrete steps. Partial paralysis developed and he was unconscious until his death a few days later on March 25, 1930. Emma DuPree Deaver died January 1, 1927, they are both buried in Bluff Cemetery in Springdale.

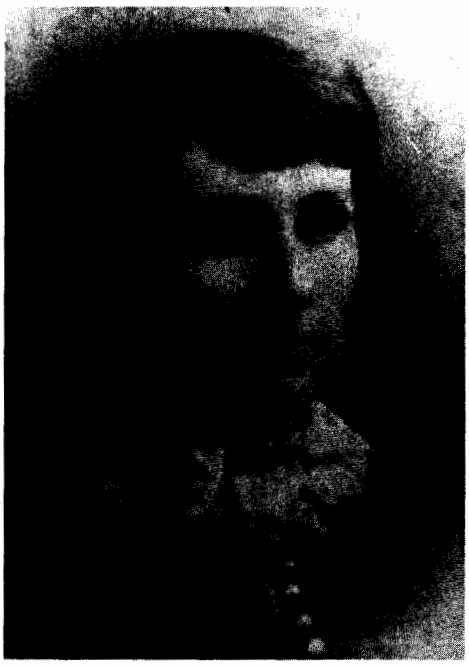
James Franklin Deaver graduated from Springdale High School in 1906, then attended the University of Arkansas. He married Mary Kennedy in 1914, she was born in Sedalia, Missouri October 4, 1891. Frank was a stockholder and manager of The Pioneer Lumber Company from around 1910 until his death. For many years, he was a member of the Springdale Water Commission and was serving on that commission when the first water works were installed. He was a member of the Rotary Club, Chamber of Commerce, the Masonic Lodge, charter member of the Springdale Country Club and worked on many civic projects. He was a very quiet unassuming man, but an avid fisherman who also enjoyed hunting. He died November 7, 1939, Mary died October 4, 1967 and they both are buried in Bluff Cemetery, Springdale. Their descendants are as follows: 1. Franklin Kennedy Deaver, born January 10, 1918, married Gayle Smith, born October 22, 1921. A. Franklin Kennedy Deaver, Jr., born 1947, married Sherri Green, born 1946. B. Suzanne Denise Deaver, born 1950, married David Ballenger, born 1949. a. Brynn Elizabeth Ballenger, born 1977. b. David Michael Ballenger, born 1980. 2. Sarah Dupree Deaver, born November 10, 1920. 3. William Walden Deaver, born November 6, 1922 married Mary Scott, born 1924. A. William Scott Deaver, born 1951, married Becky. A. William Scott Deaver, Jr., born 1986. B. Mary Catherine Deaver, born 1953. C. Daniel Dupree Deaver, born 1956.



Emma B. Dupree

Dixie Dupree Deaver was born October 15, 1891 at 429 Holcomb Street. The following is his birth announcement taken from The Springdale News, dated October 16, 1891: "Wednesday night, a bright little bud was transplanted from heaven to the home of J. P. Deaver. We congratulate Tip and his excellent wife on being the happy possessors of the last rose of summer. It's a boy and weighs twelve pounds." He became a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church at an early age, attended Springdale Public School, University of Preparatory School from 1908-1909 and graduated from Springdale High School in 1910. While in high school, he attended a state track meet in Little Rock and won first place in the hammer throw and second place in shot put and broad jump. He also played on the high school football team. In 1910, he entered the banking business at the First National Bank in Springdale, and later in that same year went to the First National Bank in Fayetteville as bookkeeper. In 1916, he went to Rogers, Arkansas as assistant cashier of the Farmers and Merchants Bank, also in that same year he married Juanita Smitherman on July 23rd. She was the daughter of Otis and Belle Greathouse Smitherman and was born in Milton, Illinois on June 8, 1894. Her family moved to Springdale and she finished her last two years of high school and was the jump center on the State Champion Basketball Team of 1910. Dupree and Nita joined the First Presbyterian Church in Rogers in 1916 and have remained members of that church. In 1918, they moved to Little Rock, Arkansas where he was a teller in the Exchange National Bank. On November 7, 1921, he was made a 32nd Degree Mason and in 1925, they moved to Fort Smith, Arkansas where he was a General Line Salesman for Goodyear Tire and Rubber Company. In 1929, they legally adopted Mrs. Deaver's niece, Mary Frances Smitherman, who had lived with them since 1923. Dupree Deaver was elected President of the First National Bank of Springdale on January 13, 1931 and served until May 1932, driving to Springdale each month for board meetings. The Deaver family lived in Tupelo, Mississippi until 1936, when they moved to Springdale in August of that year and Dupree went into the hardware and appliance business with Howard Clark. The store was opened December 12, 1936 under the name of Clark-Deaver Hardware Company and was located on the south side of Emma Avenue. A building occupied by lawyers is located there now. In 1939, he was elected President of the Rotary Club and on May 2nd of that year, he received the Arkansas Distributive Education Training Award from the University of Arkansas. He also started blowing the jug in Doc Boone's Hillbilly Band and continued this until 1942.

Juanita S. and Dixie Dupree Deaver - 1977

In 1941, Dupree was elected President of the Chamber of Commerce and in 1942 started blowing the jug in the Skunk Holler Gang, continuing this until 1973. They performed at many functions in Northwest Arkansas and even went to Cheyenne, Wyoming to the rodeo there. From 1944 to 1946, Dupree served as a member of the City Council and also was made a member of the Board of the Rodeo of the Ozarks in 1946. In 1950, he received the Silver Beaver Award from the West Ark Council, Boy Scouts of America. On March 30, 1950 the Clark-Deaver Hardware Company consolidated with the Pioneer Lumber Company under the name of The Pioneer Company. On April 2, 1954, Dupree was appointed Chairman of the Springdale City Planning Commission and also in that year joined the Presbyterian Church in Springdale. In 1956, the Pioneer Company was closed and he was appointed as liquidating agent for the company. The First State Bank is located there now. Also, in 1956 he was elected a Ruling Elder of the Presbyterian Church. He and Mrs. Deaver had both been choir members of churches they attended. On January 28, 1957, he was named Washington County Pioneer by the Washington County Historical Society and was appointed City Treasurer upon the death of Lee Sanders. In 1959, he started working for The Springdale News, setting up and managing their Office Supply Department. In 1960, he was elected President of the Library Board, serving until 1962 and elected Institutional Representative for Presbyterian Boy Scout Troop. In 1965, he compiled and had published Forty Years of Rotary, which was distributed to members. In 1967, he received the Pioneer Citizen's Award from the Springdale J. C.'s. In 1968, he was appointed to the Board of Directors of the Shiloh Museum and on July 28th of that year, received Distinguished Citizen Award from the Washington County Historical Society. In 1969, he was asked to serve as Board Member and Chairman of the Building Committee for the Fine Arts Organization. In 1969, he received a Pioneer Children's Certificate from the Shiloh Museum in honor of his father, J. P. Deaver. In 1970, Dupree was elected President of the Shiloh Museum and made the lay-out for their brochure. After he had retired, he worked many hours as a volunteer at the Museum. In 1972, he began compiling a History of Springdale, and this information was used in various publications and he also made a tape recording of the history, which included every phase of the growth of Springdale. Copies of this tape are in the Springdale Library and Shiloh Museum. Mr. Deaver's daughter, Mary Frances Page has a copy. In 1973, Mr. Deaver received a Citation from the Chamber of Commerce for Outstanding Service and also received a Life Membership from the Shiloh Museum. On October 8, 1974, he received a resolution from the City of Springdale in recognition of services to Shiloh Museum, signed by members of the Council and the Mayor. On January 19, 1978, he was made an Honorary Director on the Board of Directors of the First National Bank. In 1978, Dupree Deaver experienced a series of small strokes and his health gradually grew worse until he death on March 30, 1979 at the age of 86. He was loved and admired by many people and was known as "Mr. Springdale", and his hobby truly was the City of Springdale. Nita Deaver is still living in their home on Mill Street. Their daughter, Mary Frances was born in Springdale on November 21, 1916. She married Earl Cranston Reid, Col., U. S. A. F. in 1947. They have one adopted son, Cranston Dupree Reid, born in Reno, Nevada on February 6, 1951. He is married to Karen Miller, born February 8, 1953 in Wakita, Oklahoma. They have one son, Christopher Dupree Reid, born in Lubbock, Texas July 30, 1983. Earl Cranston Reid died January 1, 1975 and Mary Frances married Jack Edward Page on June 4, 1978 and they live in Springdale. He is the son of Earl and Jennie Hitt Page and was born in Fayetteville on June 26, 1915. Dixie Dupree Deaver is buried in Bluff Cemetery in Springdale, Arkansas.

John Wesley Dorman M. D.

Dr. John Wesley and Susan Tucker Dorman moved to Dyess Colony, Mississippi County, Arkansas in October 1939, with their son John Ernest. Jerry Sims was born while his parents were living in Dyess. Dr. Dorman practiced at Dyess Colony Hospital until drafted to serve in the U. S. Army Medical Corporation in 1941. His first assignment was with the 142nd Field Artillery, from northwest Arkansas. It was while on maneuvers in Louisiana and assignment in Lawton, Oklahoma that he became friends with many people from Washington County, including Dr. Friedman Sisco and Dr. Fount Richardson. After three years in several Army camps, including six weeks at Command and General Staff School in Leavenworth, Kansas, he was assigned as commanding officer of 177th, a medical ambulance battalion, and sent to England. This ambulance battalion crossed into Germany with General Patton's third Army, and served with the third Army until V. E. Day.

Col. Dorman received a commendation for meritorious service from General Eisenhower, and Croix DeGuerre from General Charles DeGaule.

When he returned home in December 1945, Dr. Sisco was first to call and bid him welcome home, and ask him to consider coming to Springdale as a location to practice medicine.

Springdale, a little town of approximately 3500, seemed just right for a young family. He brought his family — wife, two boys, and a red cocker spaniel, to Springdale in January 1946, arriving in a six-year-old Ford Sedan with four new retreaded tires, the four he started with from Tennessee having given up on the way.

Dr. Dorman practiced with Drs. C. P. and Friedman Sisco, in their office over Arkansas Western Gas Company on Emma Avenue for a year. The office was not adequate for three doctors and the situation in the building industry was such that a new building was not feasible. So, Dr. Dorman moved in January 1947 to the second floor of the Johnson-Steele Building at 101 Spring Street, where he practiced until 1952. The third son, Carl Wesley, was born in 1950.

Dr. Dorman, having purchased a lot on the corner of Meadow and Blair Streets for a clinic, asked Dr. Stanley Applegate to join him in practice. Plans were underway for building a clinic and the decision was made to call it "The Springdale Clinic", when Dr. Dorman became ill with poliomyelitis.

Wendell Powers, a respected drug retail man, recommended his brother, Dr. Ralph Powers, to hold up Dr. Dorman's practice while he was ill. Dr. Powers came and worked in this capacity for several months. Dr. Applegate continued to supervise building of the clinic which was planned for a staff of three doctors. After Dr. Dorman was able to practice, he and Dr. Applegate, finding Dr. Powers congenial, asked him to join them in the Springdale Clinic.

The Springdale Hospital was built in the meantime and opened in September 1952. Dr. Dorman served as the first Chief of Staff. He also served on the State Board of Health from 1960 to 1974, and the Springdale School Board, from 1964 to 1974, and the Board of First State Bank since 1975.

In 1968, Drs. J. W. Dorman and John E. Dorman moved into the new Dorman Clinic on Sunset Avenue. The clinic was built on the lot adjacent to the home where the family had lived for 17 years, commercial zoning having overtaken the area as the nice little town became a thriving little city. Dr. Jerry Dorman returned to Springdale and joined the clinic staff in 1972.

Dr. J. W. suffered a stroke in 1977 and was forced to retire from the practice of medicine, but by no means from active living. He serves in many ways in First United Methodist Church and in the community. He is a member of A. M. A. Arkansas Medical Society, American Academy of Family Practice, S. W. Surgical Congress and International College of Surgeons.

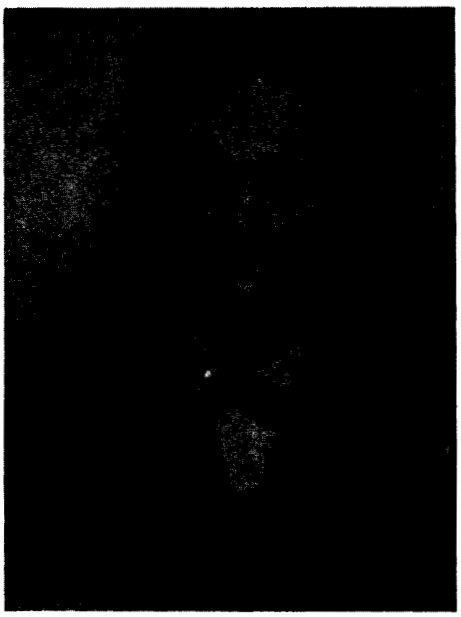
James Drake

James Drake was born in 1795 in the state of Virginia and raised in the lower part of Kentucky. His mother died when he was young and his father remarried. He did not get along with his stepmother so when he was about sixteen years old he left home and went to Shawneetown, Illinois where he lived with Rev. Jacob Sexton, a Methodist. He enlisted in the War of 1812 on September 5, and served for six months for which he recieved a land warrant. On January 4, 1816, he married Margaret Fields.

Mary Shockley Drake, wife of Noah Fields Drake

James Drake and Margaret Fields Drake had three children, born in Shawneetown, Illinois: Elizabeth, Wesley and Susanna.



Wesley Drake, b. October 23, 1818, d. May 4, 1907. Grandfather of Vera Wade. Buried at Ganderville Cemetery in Washington County, Arkansas.

With the Rev. Jacob Sexton they moved to Arkansas in 1822. James settled on the south side of the Arkansas River near McClains Bottom. Then they moved to Lovely's Purchase but had to move when that part was given to the Cherokee Indians. The next move was to Big Frog Bayou, then to Washington County in 1829. This time they settled about 4-1/2 miles south of Lincoln on the Morrow Road on what was later known as the Whittenburg Farm. Sexton also moved to this vicinity.

James Drake and family settled a place in a wild forest with not a mark of improvement. He fenced in some 20 or 30 acres for cultivation and built a small log house with split puncheons for a floor. Of the ten children born to James and Margaret, eight grew to maturity. Stephen died at the age of three and James at the age of fifteen. They are buried side by side in the Drake Cemetery south of Lincoln, with one marker for the two graves. Melissa never married. Elizabeth was married twice, the first time to a Mr. Graham. They had two children, Margaret and Sarah. Elizabeth's second husband was a Mr. Billingsley.

Wesley Drake, my grandfather, the second child and oldest son, married Martha Kellan, April 26, 1849, at James Drake's home. Rev. John Oliver performed the ceremony. Their children were: Paulina Jane, John Wesley, James Calhoun, Francis Macklin, Martha, Noah Fields, Charles Homer, and Preston Hickerson. They lived on a farm west of Summers, Arkansas.

Wesley Drake was a farmer, a staunch supporter of public schools, and a worker in his church (New Church) for which he was a trustee. Several terms of subscription school were taught in his home, where one large room of his five-room house was set aside for a school room. Mr. W. E. Rosser, father of the late Judge Malcomb Rosser of Muskogee, was his first school teacher. The Rosser family at one time lived on Willow Street in Fayetteville.

Wesley Drake was very kind and always willing to help his neighbors, especially newcomers. He would never start to the mill with his corn without going by to see if Mr. Rosser, a neighbor, wanted his corn taken also. He was always ready and on hand to go for the doctor when anyone was sick. It is said he had at one time sold his entire wheat crop for 20 dollars, and loaned it to Mr. Rosser to pay the hospital and doctor bill for Rosser's wife.

Susannah Drake, third child and second daughter of James and Margaret Drake, married William Nunley. To them were born James, Margaret, Wesley, Lizzie, Frank, Eva, John and Mattie. They lived near Cane Hill, Arkansas. James Nunley was killed at the Battle of Pea Ridge, while fighting in the Confederate Army.

Malinda Drake married William Rinehart April 26, 1849. Their children were Margaret, Jane, Ann, Sarah, and William. They lived near Lincoln, Arkansas. Malinda Drake Rinehart is buried in the Drake Cemetery beside her sister, Martha Jane Drake Pyeatt.

Martha Jane Drake married James Pyeatt. They lived near Cane Hill, Arkansas. Their children were: Mary, Samantha and Finis.

Jackson Walker Drake was married to Mary Clark, a mixed blood Cherokee. They lived in the Cherokee Nation near where what is now Choteau, Oklahoma. He was married the second time to a Miss Vann, also a mixed blood Cherokee. In 1856 Jackson Walker Drake graduated with the degree of Bachelor of Arts from Cane Hill College.

Sarah Evaline Drake was married to Capt. William Shannon on September 15, 1859. To them the following children were born: Samuel, Ella, Thomas and Lilly.

Paulina Jane Drake, first daughter and oldest child of Wesley and Martha Drake, was born November 29, 1851. She married John Augustus Wilson, cousin of Claude Wilson of Chelsea, Okalhoma. They lived near Cincinnati, Arkansas. She died in 1896 leaving no children.

John Wesley Drake, the eldest son of Wesley and Martha, was doing a man's work on the farm at the age of twelve. He left home when about nineteen and went to California in 1874, where he met and married Meta Marie Tholcke. Their children were: Mae Henrietta, born November 19, 1904, who married Charles Harold Sexsmith on August 30, 1936. John and Meta's second child was named Noah Fields after John's brother. He died a few weeks after birth. Their third child was Charles Wesley, born March 22, 1908. He married Kathryn Thorp and lived on a ranch near Gonzales, California, that his father and uncle owned. They had two children.

James Calhoun Drake was the third child born to Wesley and Martha. He was born July 26, 1858. Although schooling facilities were meager, he obtained by unusual perseverance and no small amount of self education, a primary education that later enabled him to successfully compete in the entrance examinations for the Naval Academy in Annapolis. He borrowed money to enroll and graduated in 1880. He saw service on five different seas, thus gaining a vast fund of first-hand information regarding harbors, commerce and shipping, and which, during his later business years proved invaluable to him.

In 1893 he married Fanny Wilcox, daughter of Capt. Alfred H. Wilcox and Maria Antonio Arquello, descendant of Jose Dario Arquello, an early Spanish Governor of California. They lived in Los Angeles where his first position was auditor and director of the Los Angeles Water Company. He afterwards became vice-president of the First National Bank and for over 20 years and up to the time of his death served as one of the Bank's officers. He was president of the Los Angeles Trust and Savings Bank for a time; director of Southern California Edison Company, Southern California Telephone Company, Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Company, the Mortgage Guaranty Company, California Delta Farms Company, and the Pacific Finance Company. He rose from a Washington County (Arkansas) country lad to become one of the West's most successful financiers.

James and Fanny Drake had two children, Daphene who married Sayre MacNeil, and James Wilcox Drake.

Francis Macklin Drake, third son of Wesley and Martha, married Flora Evelyn Jobe who was born at Dutch Mills, Arkansas. They lived on a farm adjoining his father's farm near Summers, Arkansas. Their children were: Clarence, Fannie, Beulah, Martha Beth, Dorothy and John. Mack, as Francis Macklin was called, went to Cane Hill College for a time and later received a teacher's certificate from the college at Tahlequah, Oklahoma. He moved from the farm near Summers to Westville, Oklahoma, and then to Vinita, Oklahoma. He died in November of 1941, and was laid to rest beside his wife in the cemetery at Westville, Oklahoma.

Martha Drake died at the age of three years, six months and six days on March 19, 1865. Noah Fields Drake said there were no doctors to be had at the time because they had all gone to war.

Noah Fields Drake was born January 30, 1864, near Summers, Arkansas. When a young boy, he helped with the plowing and raising of the crops. He helped market the produce at Van Buren, and Tahlequah, the two places where the people in that area did their trading. Since it was impossible to make the trip to either place in one day, he had to camp out along the way. The trip to Tahlequah was dangerous because the Indians often stole their goods at night while they camped.

Noah Fields' early education was in his father's home and at Cane Hill. He was graduated from the University of Arkansas in 1888 with a degree in Civil Engineering. He worked for the Arkansas Geological Survey where he came under the influence of Dr. J. C. Branner, whose inspiration encouraged him to devote his life to geology. From 1888 to 1893, he pioneered in the geology of Texas, on the State Geological Survey of that state, and also did geological work in the Indian Territory.

During his four years at the University of Arkansas he walked home from his boarding house in Fayetteville, the old Gunter home at the corner of Mission and Maple Streets, to his home west of Summers. When he had to spend the night along the way, he usually spent it at some school ground for he had the assurance of finding drinking water there. All this walking prepared him for his geological work in Texas, Oklahoma, California, Mexico, Idaho, and China in later years, for he almost always walked, seldom using a horse and buggy. No one had a car in those early days.

In 1893, he entered Stanford University as a geology major. From that institution he received the degree of A. B. in 1894, A. M. in 1895, and Ph. D. in 1897. Dr. J. C. Branner, professor of geology at Stanford University, writes of Noah Fields Drake's thesis for his Ph. D.: "It is the best doctor's dissertation I have ever seen. It represents a geological study, including economic geology, structure, mineralogy, and paleontology of 2,000 square miles in the coal fields of Indian Territory." These papers have been given to the Archives at the University of Oklahoma, at Norman.

Noah Fields Drake was professor of geology and mining at the Imperial Pei Yang University, Tientsin, China, from 1898 to 1900 and from 1905 to 1911.

In China, Noah Fields Drake met Mary Eleanor Shockley, a Methodist missionary from Lancaster, Ohio, who had attended Ohio Wesleyan University. She had preceded him to China in 1897. They were married in Pei Tai Ho, China, on August 30, 1904. Their children are: Doris, born at Pei Tai Ho, China, July 22, 1906, and Vera Marie, born at Tientsin, China, February 19, 1909.

Doctor Drake returned to the United States in 1911 to teach at Stanford University where he held for a year the position of Associate Professor of Economic Geology. In 1912, he was elected by the Board of Trustees of the University of Arkansas to the position of Professor of Geology, a position he held until 1920 when, at his request, he relinquished teaching. Besides his teaching duties at the University of Arkansas he served on several University committees. Doctor Kirtley F. Mather, Professor of Geology at Harvard University, comments as follows in a letter of July 10, 1947, concerning Dr. Drake's work in the University.

"I recall with great pleasure my brief association with him when he came to the University of Arkansas to take charge of the Department of Geology while I was a very junior instructor there. He was a very able geologist, especially conscientious in field work, and well informed concerning the geology of the Ozark Ouachita region. He did much to continue the excellent reputation of the Department of Geology at the University of Arkansas, that had been established by his predecessors."

Doctor Drake was State Geologist of Arkansas during the period he was Professor of Geology in the State University. Although the legislature provided no funds for the State Geological Survey, he rendered notable service by handling correspondence and consulting with visitors who made inquiries into the opportunities for investment.

In the field season of 1913, Doctor Drake was associated with Hugh D. Miser in a geological study of the Waynesboro quadrangle lying mostly in Wayne County in southwest middle Tennessee. This work was a cooperative project between the Tennessee Geological Survey and the U. S. Geological Survey and involved the mapping of the geologic units and an examination of the mineral resources, chiefly brown iron ore. Because of his long experience in the field of economic geology, he made a notable contribution to the project in his examination and appraisal of the mineral resources on which he wrote a summary report. In that area they worked closely together and lived in camp. Hugh Miser, many years his junior in age and experience, profited immensely from his wide experience, wealth of knowledge, good ideas, and sound judgment.

As early as 1915, and especially after 1920, he did much consulting geological work in the United States, but during this period he made one trip to Mexico in 1921, and one of several months duration to China in 1919 and 1920. In this type of work he conducted numerous geologic examinations and prepared reports thereon for both individuals and companies on many subjects including oil, gas, lead, zinc, slate, limestone, damsites, water supply, and pollution possibilities. Most of his consulting work was done in his home state, and his recommendations contributed especially to the oil development of southern Arkansas and the gas development of western Arkansas. The Kibler gas field was discovered in November, 1915, when a 19-million cubic feet gasser was completed at a location recommended by him, including the Clarksville and the Lavaca fields.

Beginning in 1921, he served as geologist on the staff of the Arkansas Bureau of Mines, Manufacturers, and Agriculture, and one of his special projects was an investigation of the mineral fertilizer deposits of the state.

In Arkansas, as in China, Doctor Drake's interests and activities outside the field of geology were many, and because of his good judgment and sound scientific approach he accomplished much. In addition he was a public benefactor with his time and his funds.

He devoted much time over a period of many years to the experimentation and improvement of the American black walnut. The scene of this work was his farm three miles north of Fayetteville. By developing new varieties, of which some trees are now 65 years old or older, increased the kernel content 28 percent and decreased the shell content 26 percent and offered the prediction that further experimentation could produce a black walnut having a thin shell like that of English walnuts. The entire 1947 walnut crop from the Drake walnut grove was contracted for by the Texas Nursery of Sherman, Texas, which planned to plant the nuts for the growth of trees for grafting.

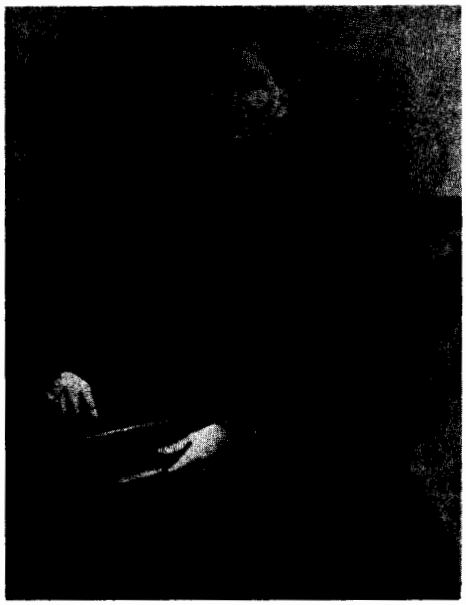
As a resident of Fayetteville his community activities were numerous. He was an officer of the Ozark Playgrounds Association. He was a member of the Board of the Fayetteville Country Club in 1926. He was a Director for many years of the Fayetteville Building & Loan Association organized in 1922 and he was one of three members of the first board of appraisers. He was one of three original trustees of Fairview Memorial Park Association. He was a member of the Board of Governors of the Chamber of Commerce for about 10 years. He was a member of the City Council from April 7, 1924, to April 7, 1930.

As a member of the City Council, he was a leader in many activities. He was chairman of the finance committee. He personally did much assessment work of property in connection with street improvements in the paving districts. He investigated the possibilities of additional city water supplies from deep wells and from reservoirs and made surveys of reservoir sites including that for the Wilson reservoir in the White River Valley. As chairman of the committee to obtain natural gas, his recommendation for bringing gas by pipeline from gas fields in the Arkansas River Valley was accepted, and natural gas thus been used in Fayetteville since 1928. He was a member of the airport committee, and on June 10, 1929, the Council accepted his offer of the payment of $3500 and appropriated $1500 of city funds for the purchase of land for a municipal airport.

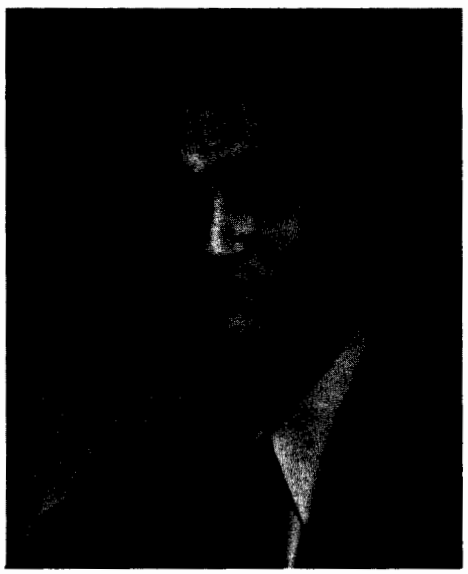
A tract of park land, known as Trent's pond, which was owned and developed by A. L. Trent, was bought in 1926 by many men including Doctor Drake who organized the City Park Company. The company constructed a large concrete swimming pool and equipped the grounds for a tourist camp including cabins and modern accommodations. Doctor Drake owned and operated the park for several years and sold it to the city in 1945 for a nominal price.

Eleven substantial attractive residences were built by him in the north part of the city, and in 1928, a business building was erected by him which he leased to Montgomery Ward & Company. It is now annex to county courthouse.

The municipal governments of Tientsin, China, and Fayetteville, Arkansas, the two cities in which Doctor Drake lived the longest, honored him for outstanding service to each community. The Tientsin Provisional Government awarded him three medals-one of them "The Order of the Lotus" -and City Council of Fayetteville changed in 1947 the name of the Fayetteville Municipal Airport to Drake Field.



Martha Killum Drake, great-grandmother of Vera Drake Wade.



Noah Fields Drake

Doctor Drake's full life of different scientific activities and interests is reflected by the societies which honored him with membership. Besides the Geological Society of America, of which he was a Fellow since 1898, he was an original member of the American Association of Petroleum Geologists and presented a paper on the oil possibilities in Arkansas at the organization meeting in Tulsa, Oklahoma, in February, 1917. Other societies of which he was a member are American Association for Advancement of Science, American Institute of Mining and Metallurgical Engineers, Seismological Society of America, Royal Asiatic Society North China Branch, China Philosophical Society, Northern Nut Growers Association (vice president for Arkansas), American Poultry Association.

Doctor Drake and Mary Eleanor Shockley, a North Methodist missionary from Lancaster, Ohio, were married at Pei Tai Ho, China, August 30, 1904, and they had two daughters, Doris and Vera Marie. Mrs. Drake died December 25, 1926, at Fayetteville, Arkansas. Six years later, he married Lota West Fairchild on December 23, 1932.

As a man, Doctor Drake was kind, quiet, modest, conscientious, generous, and his words and actions were all based on an intellectual and logical approach. These qualities and his ability, integrity, and capacity of leadership were recognized at all times by his associates and fellow citizens.

The Arkansas Gazette, the state's leading daily newspaper, paid the highest tribute to his memory in an editorial on May 6, 1945, the following his death:

"Doctor Drake contributed to the progress of his science. His teaching stimulated the careers of geologists in the Orient as well as in this county. As a cosmopolitan citizen of Fayetteville, he earnestly worked to improve his community. With a knowledge of world-wide problems he directed his attention to the best utilization of Ozark resources. He had an international reputation as a geologist and he knew far regions of the earth but his eyes always saw the Ozarks."

Doctor Drake died suddenly of a heart attack on May 4, 1945, at his home. His death removed a field geologist and engineer who had worked in many countries, a teacher who had taught geology in the Orient and the United States, an authority on American black walnuts, an author of scientific papers on varied subjects, a builder in China and Arkansas, a public benefactor, and a distinguished citizen of his community.

Charles Homer Drake was the bachelor of the family of Wesley and Martha. He graduated from the University of Arkansas with the class of 1891 as a civil engineer. He was retained by several railways and also by the federal government in levee work on the Mississippi River. Due to the unhealthy conditions in the area at that time, he contracted malaria. It was for the sake of his health that he went to California in 1910. He engaged in farming with his brother, John, who had preceded him to California. Four years later he moved to the 700-acre ranch north of Gonzales that he farmed until his death March 22, 1951. It was there that he helped to rear his niece, Mae, and nephew, Charles Wesley.

Preston Hickerson Drake, being the youngest son, helped his father with the farming in his father's later years. He married Mary Floretta Kirk in April, 1901. They lived in Fayetteville for a while where he helped his brother, Noah Fields, in the building of some houses. He was also associated with Peal's Grocery on Center Street for a while. His children were: Fred, Charles Fields, Ruth and Connie. They all moved to Santa Ana, California, in 1917. In 1922, Preston Drake died of a heart attack. His oldest son, Fred, also died but the other three children are still living in California. Charles Fields Drake is married and lives on the Irvine Ranch at Santa Ana. Ruth is now Mrs. George Mehm of Montrose, California, and Connie is Mrs. Harry Zarp of Long Beach, California. Ruth has no children. Connie and Harry have two girls, both married.

This brings us back to the children of Noah Fields and Mary Eleanor Shockley Drake. Their daughter, Doris, first married Robert A. Leflar in 1927. They were later divorced. There were no children of this union. On April 5, 1949, Doris married Belden Wigglesworth in the American Church in Paris, France. Doris had gone to France to study art. She had received a B. A. and Master's degree from the University of Arkansas. Doris and Belden now live in Washington, D. C.

Vera Marie, second daughter of Noah Fields and Mary Eleanor Shockley Drake, graduated from the University of Arkansas with a B. S. degree in Home Economics in 1930. During the school year of 1930-31, she taught home economics in the high school at Prairie Grove, Arkansas. Vera Marie married George Clifton Wade on December 28, 1928. They are parents of two children. Their daughter, Mary Sue, was married to Philip Colwell. Both are graduates of the University of Arkansas. They have three children, Linda Marie, Wade Clark, and Ted Drake, making the sixth generation of the Drake family living in Washington County, Arkansas.

Vera Marie and George Clifton Wade also have a son, Lynn Fields Wade. He is practicing law with the firm McAllister & Wade, P. A. of Fayetteville, Arkansas. Robert H. Eidson

W. H. Eidson or "Uncle Billie" was born in Hawkins County, Tennessee, April 19, 1823 the sixth child of William and Martha (Wilson) Eidson. His father was born in North Carolina about 1782 and his mother in Hawkins County, Tennessee, being about eight years younger than her husband. W. H. was reared on the farm and educated to a limited extent in the old subscription schools. At the age of 19, he married Susan Begley, also a native of Hawkins County. In 1851, they came to Arkansas where they homesteaded forty acres of land. This was to increase to over 1200 acres near Springdale. He was one of the pioneers of this section (Zion Community), literally carving his home out of the wilderness. They had ten children, six sons and four daughters: McCoy, John, Henry, Mary (wife of Moses Anderson), Samuel L., William S., Martha E. (wife of M. C. Weir), Ellen (wife of J. A. Joyce), George P. and Orlena B. Irvin. The two eldest were killed at the Battle of Vicksburg, being soldiers in the Southern Army. Henry, the third child, married a Foster. He was a good farmer and trader, dealing in livestock. Sam, the fourth son, was also reared on the farm and followed that occupation for a few years until he commenced distilling apples and peaches and manufacturing whiskey. He had on hand in 1889, 3500 gallons of whiskey, of the finest quality on which had a good trade and shipped principally south and west. Besides his distillery, he owned 220 acres of fertile and well-improved land from which he derived a comfortable competency. Mr. Eidson's (W. H.) wife died and in October 1903, he married Mrs. Augusta Nickerson. His obituary listed him as a good citizen that had the confidence and respect of all who knew him. He had been a resident of the county for thirty-seven years, and had lived on his present property all of that time. He was Democratic in his political views, was a Justice of the Peace four years and both he and his wife were members of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. He was stricken with apoplexy while working in his garden on a Friday afternoon. Although conscious most of the time, Mr. Eidson never spoke again. He was buried in the Zion Community Church Cemetery in 1911 under the direction of Reverend Armstrong.

William Smith Eidson and Cynthia Ann Patton were married in Missouri on May 26, 1874. They returned to the Zion Community soon after their marriage to reside on the acreage given to them by his father, W. S. Eidson was born June 15, 1855, the son of W. H. and Susan Begley Eidson. Cynthia was the daughter of Paschel Patton (also a double cousin of Judge Isaac Patton), born February 24, 1858 in the vicinity of Zion. She came from a family of five sisters, two brothers, and two half-brothers. W. S. and Cynthia had six sons: William Kyle (August 26, 1875-June 19, 1948), John Ellis (July 29, 1877-June 26, 1925), Robert A. (November 8, 1879-March 29, 1960), Oliver Lee (Ollie) (March 26, 1882-April 12, 1961), Clarence Edward (July 20, 1889-July 1977) and Toy Young (December 26,1891-November 3, 1964). Mr. Eidson died on May 12, 1923. Mrs. Eidson died July 1, 1927 at the home of her son, R. A. Eidson in the east part of Springdale. The service was conducted by Reverend C. H. Sherman (Pastor of the Central Methodist Church), and Reverend Earl Herrington (Pastor of the First Baptist Church). Burial was in the Zion Cemetery.

R. A. Eidson and Ruby Ann O'Neal were married November 22, 1909 at Fishback in the home of the minister, the Reverend Mr. Boyd. Robert A. was born November 8, 1879, the third son of W. S. and Cynthia Patton Eidson. Ruby Ann O'Neal was born May 23, 1884 in Friendship Community, the daughter of James B. and Nancy Jack O'Neal. At this time, the economy in the county was at a low and very little work could be found. Relatives in Oklahoma urged the young couple to come live with them and work on their farm, so they traveled by covered wagon to Foraker, Oklahoma. They soon returned to the Oakland Community where they lived and worked at "truck farming". When

Mr. Eidson was offered the job of "fruit broker", they returned to Springdale. Apples, strawberries and peaches were drawing a large number of businessmen from outside the community to purchase the fruit. This became Mr. Eidson's vocation — to buy from the fruit farmer and sell the produce to out-of-town buyers. They were the parents of four children: Gus A. (January 1, 1911-August 9, 1976), Helen Mae (September 3, 1912), Robert H. (May 25, 1917) and Neva Bernell (June 8, 1920). Mrs. Eidson was a member of the First Baptist Church, Women's Civic Club, Friendly Neighbors Club, Springdale Memorial Hospital Auxiliary and past president of the Washington School PTA. Children and grandchildren can recall with loving memory the smell of homemade bread and the taste of fresh strawberry jam that came from her kitchen. Some of her recipes are still being used today and will continue to be handed down in her family. Mr. Eidson will be remembered as a quiet person and a man who loved to play the violin for his family.

Marvin Wallace Walker and Lela Bessie Brown were married July 10, 1915 by Justice of the Peace Sims Betterton in North Crawford County, Arkansas. Born to this marriage are three daughters and one son: Hazel Luvene (June 21, 1918), Velma Lorene Shamblin (April 25, 1921), Lela Marvelene Wilson (November 7, 1924) and Marvin Ronald Walker (April 11, 1939). Marvin taught school at Fine Springs, Dean Springs and Mountainburg, Arkansas during the early 1920's. He was also a farmer when not teaching school. In 1926, he packed up his family and made his way to Wewoka, Oklahoma oil boom. He had a grocery store there for about six months. After he sold the store, he came back to his farm north of Alma (Crawford County). He built a new, red barn where his family lived (and shared with the livestock) until he could build a house. Farm life was not for the Walker family and they decided to move to Springdale. In the spring of 1928, he purchased his first "Sav-It Grocery Store" from Gene Goff, which was located on Emma Avenue. Luvene recalls she and the girls working long and hard hours, especially during the fruit harvest. Emma Avenue would be lined with trucks loaded with produce, but the farmers could not buy the goods they needed from the store until they had been paid. The employees of the store would start around 6:00 a. m. sacking up small amounts of beans, etc. not closing until around midnight, or until after the farmers had left. The employees hand picked each item off of the shelf and placed it on the counter for each individual customer. Eventually, Marvin and family would own stores in Bentonville, Fayetteville and Elm Springs. Mrs. Walker continued to live in Springdale after the death of her husband in December of 1940. She enjoyed farming, gardening and always had a few head of cattle on the farm. As Springdale continued to grow, it was necessary to sell the farm for commercial expansion. Lela celebrated her 91st birthday on January 11, 1988 and continues to enjoy cooking for her family. Relatives don't recall her ever using a recipe book, not even for her prize-winning Angel Food Cake. No one in the family inherited her ability to grow African Violets, a hobby in which she has taken much pride.

Robert H. Eidson and Luvene Walker were married October 2, 1936 by Reverend O. H. Bolin in the parsonage of the Springdale First United Methodist Church. During their early married life, he worked for Springdale Motor Company. During the winter months, part of his responsibility was to start the fire in the wood stove each morning. After serving in World War II, Robert returned to Springdale where he and his brother Gus founded Springdale Lumber Company. The lumber for inventory was hauled by truck from the sawmill located at Mt. Ida (near Hot Springs) and owned by Gus' brother-in-law. Along with the lumber company, Robert had business interests in farming (growing poultry), and banking (charter board member of Springdale Savings & Loan). He was very instrumental in the land and housing development in the Springdale and Rogers area. Luvene was in church, school and civic activities that involved her children and family. With the formation of Southside Building Supplies, she worked alongside her husband in the business. The company is now owned by son, Jim. The four children of the family are: Roberta Ann Platt (October 10, 1937), Mary Elizabeth Tune (August 16, 1939), Margaret Luvene Brown (November 25, 1940) and Jimmie Robert (March 28, 1942). On October 2, 1986, the Robert Eidsons celebrated their 50th Wedding Anniversary with family and friends. Their eight grandchildren are: Dennis and Michael Tune, Kathryn and Mark Platt, Teresa Brown and Monica, Wendy and Elizabeth Eidson. Today the Eidsons have met and made many new friends that share their interest in Field Trial Dog Shows competition. This sport involves horses, dogs and quail, all the things the Eidsons love.

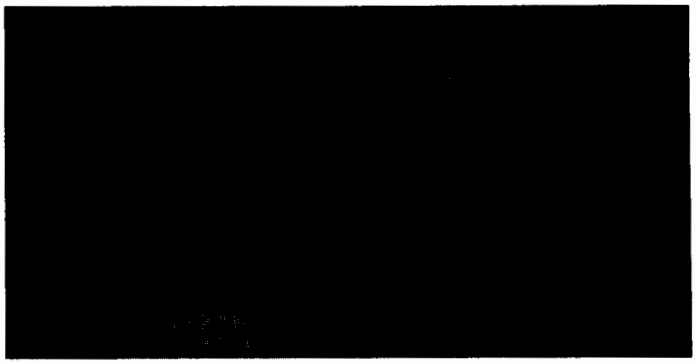
Lois (Cunningham) Eubanks

Lois Maude Cunningham's genealogy is in the story of her sister, Dovie Ellen Cunningham, in this book.

Lois was a young teenager in Madison County, Arkansas, when she realized that a husband and family would be her true calling even though she aspired to be a nurse.

Lois married Otis Carl Eubanks, December 24, 1938, in Madison County. The young couple lived with Otis' parents,

J. A. "Doc", and Martha Eubanks until a small house was built on the Eubanks farm for them. Otis' sister, Vassie (later Mrs. Gordon Faulkner) still lived at home when Otis and Lois married. Otis' brother Clayton Eubanks was married to Alice Glenn and the older sister, Dessie was married to Harrel Harriman.



Lois Maude Cunningham Eubanks, 1988.

October 23, 1939, Mary Ellen Eubanks was born to the young couple. Times were hard and a meager living could be made by planting and harvesting crops such as tomatoes. A nearby cannery would buy the crops and also give employment to area residents.

The lure of jobs in the forests of Oregon caused the couple with their small child to join with a group going out to work. Lois loved the ocean and the lush foliage and the climate. Otis quickly longed for home and once again they returned to Madison County, Arkansas.

May 12, 1945, Sharon Kay Eubanks was born in Fayetteville, Arkansas. Kay was a small baby when the little family went to the state of Washington with a group from Arkansas to harvest apples and cherries. Here Lois would line up with others to get food during the World War II rationing years.

Again, Otis became homesick and he, Lois, Mary and Kay loaded up their car and headed for Arkansas knowing the birth of their third child was only weeks away. Otis had built a Model A from parts he gathered together. The motor was ordered from Sears and Roebuck. He bought the frame and running gears, added gas tank, radiator, doors, and other necessities until he had a running vehicle to carry the family in.

October 31, 1946, Larry Dale Eubanks, Otis and Lois' last child was born. All the rest of his life, he would hear how he was the only one to carry on the Eubanks name through "Doc"'s lineage. Later his son, Jeremy, would be told the same family tradition. To Grandpa (Doc) Eubanks carrying on the family name was somehow an extension of his family he was prone to mention frequently. Doc lived to be 106 years old. He was an avid baseball fan.

Otis and Lois bought a house on Poplar Street in Fayetteville. Sharon Kay and Larry Dale attended Leverett Elementary and later Fayetteville Junior and Senior High Schools. Mary Ellen went to Meadow Valley school one year. Meadow Valley later became the U of A's Agri Park on Highway 112. Mary attended Leverett one year and was in the first class of the new Hillcrest Junior High, formerly Fayetteville High School on the corner of Center and School streets. Mary also attended FHS the first year of forced intergration with black students.

Mary Ellen married Marion Leroy Johnson and became the office manager for the Washington County History Book (this book) in 1986 and stayed with the project as a management consultant until completion. Mary Ellen and Leroy's story is in this book.

Sharon Kay married James M. Griffin, Jr. (b. 3/10/42) and their children are Niki Ann (b. 2/19/62), Wesley Allen (b. 1/13/64), and Kimberly Kay (b. 8/6/68). In 1989, Kay and Jim live in Huntington Beach, California, after spending most of their married lives in Wichita Falls and Burkburnett, Texas.

Larry Dale married Nancy (Cox) Hollen, December 22, 1972 and adopted Amy Eubanks (b. 2/9/69). Jeremy (b. 10/11/75) was born while Nancy and Larry lived in Memphis, Tennessee. Irreconcilable differences made divorce necessary, Larry spent several years single but while working in California renewed an old friendship with Christie (Rosenbaum) Radcliffe. Christie and Larry were married January 28, 1989, in Lois' home in Springdale. Presently Christie and Larry are living with Lois.

Amy Eubanks is studying at the University of Texas (Austin) to be an attorney of international law. Jeremy lives with his mother in Dickinson, Texas. He holds a black belt in karate and is a skateboard enthusiast.

Lois and Otis Eubanks

Niki Ann lives in Iowa Park, Texas, Kimberly Kay is in Florida and Wes lives with Kay and Jim in California, only a few miles from Mary's second son, Ronald Wayne Johnson. Mary has two children living in Austin, Mary Renee and Tony. Ben, her oldest son lives in Springdale, Arkansas.

While living on Poplar Street, Lois worked at Oberman's, later became Levis, as a floor lady. Otis was on the staff of the physical plant at the University of Arkansas. The family had a barn with a milk cow, hogs and chickens to supplement their food supply. A big garden was raised and canned. One year the garden was ruined when Larry and a neighbor boy got on the tractor, started it and couldn't stop it. Plowed up the garden.

Next door neighbors on Poplar Street were the G. L. Beavers family. See their story in this book.

Sadly, Otis died when only 38 years old with lung cancer. Lois was only 34 years old, Kay was 13 and Larry was 11. Mary was married and had one son, Benjamin who was one year and one month old when his grandpa died.

Lois went to Cosmetology School in Springdale, received her liscense and opened a shop in her home. The City of Fayetteville informed her the zoning would not allow her to expand her business at that location, so she moved to 105 South West Street and opened a beauty shop in her home so she would be with Larry and Kay more than if she worked outside the home.

For a few years business was good. Kay got married and moved to Texas, Larry went into the Army, and off to Viet Nam. Larry volunteered and after basic training went to Germany. In Viet Nam he worked in supply depot headquarters.

Lois' sister Dovie moved in with her October 19, 1964 shortly after Larry left for service.

In December, 1969, Lois became blind with early senile macular degeneration and other retinal problems. This forced her to close her shop at 105 South West Street.

With the help of Doc Dockery, rehabilitation specialist, Lois enrolled at the Arkansas Enterprises for the Blind in Little Rock. Here she learned mobility and independent living.

Coming home from AEB, Lois took a job working with Raymond Paslay in the lunch room at the Levi plant in Fayetteville. Food service is hard physical work but the experience prepared her for what was later to become her career.

When the Northwest Vo-Tech school opened on Ford Avenue in Springdale, bids were let for a snackbar operator under the Randolph-Shephard Vendors Act. Lois was awarded the job and today is still there.

Lois's unique ability to sense attitudes has made her an unofficial counselor at the Vo-Tech school, a student body averaging 500 per year (day and night classes). Many of the former students still come up to her in public shopping places, speak and tell her how much they admire her and thank her for just listening to their problems.

A devout Christian, Lois teaches the first grade (Sunday morning) class with her daughter, Mary, at Robinson Avenue Church of Christ.

Since Larry and Christie have moved home, Lois is once again going fishing, a sport she missed after losing Otis and going blind.

Newspaper articles have been written about Lois' homemade rolls and about a surprise birthday party given for her by the entire student body at Vo-Tech, this year (1989).

In 1976, Lois and Ray Paslay chartered the Northwest Chapter Arkansas Council of the Blind, a support group for the blind and visually impaired. The group meets monthly and once a year holds a workshop. The workshop was an idea Lois had and acted upon several years ago. Through the workshops many blind and severely visually impaired persons have found the means to a better more productive and satisfying life.

"I miss driving a car," Lois said. "And I would like to see the faces of my family." But she says this with a smile knowing the impossibility.

In 1989, Lois began to learn how to use a computer. Not bad for a blind lady, 65 years old. Larry's field of expertise is computers but teaching a blind person has given him a challenge. Always seeking new obstacles to overcome, Lois and Larry are finding solutions not only for her but also to share with other blind persons.

As Lois' oldest child, I sit back and wait to see what remarkable thing my mother will do next. I would not be one bit surprised if the woman became a host on a radio talk show, or a teacher, or. . .who knows what. One thing I am sure of. . .if Mama wants to try it, Kay, Larry and I will be her strongest supporters encouraging her to go right on. After all, she has always told us to "Go for it!!!!"

Claire Farrar

W. T. Farrar

The Farrars came to Arkansas from Tennessee in June 1850. They homesteaded a farm near Cave Springs, Arkansas, with plenty of running water from Big Spring that furnished water for the home place. They had 200 acres to begin with and finally got 640 acres.

Father Junice Farrar, born February 12, 1823, died June, 1899, was in the Civil War as a Sergeant in Compnay F of the 2nd Arkansas Calvary. He and his wife Catherine (Cassie) had a large family; John, French, Jack, W. T. (Doc), Jimmie B., and Betty Farrar. Junice Farrar brought his sister Mary and brother Galton to Arkansas. Mary married a Nail and Galton had a peg leg. Galton didn't live long and was buried in the Farrar Cemetery west of Cave Springs. Junice and Cassie were buried in the Elm Springs Cemetery.

In 1888, John Farrar (born December 5, 1841, died July 12, 1902) was the postmaster of Cayton, Arkansas (later changed to Cave Springs). John married Sarah Phillips on December 26, 1869. They had three daughters. The first daughter, Nancy (Temmie), married William McDonald and had three children; Hope, Jewel, and Lyle. The second daughter, Flora Bell, married an Alterman; the third daughter, Martha married John Hart.

French Farrar (born 1862, died 1906) married Sarah Viola (Ola) Murlock on August 13, 1881, at Ozark Mills, Arkansas. Their children were Mina, Denzil, and Earl. Mina is living at Healing Springs, Arkansas. Alta got killed in a buggy wreck—the horses ran away. She was sixteen and a beautiful girl.

Denzil Farrar (born November 23, 1889, died December 29, 1924) married Josie Pattshall. Their children were Bert Lewis Farrar, Fred Farrar, Dallas Farrar, Frank Farrar, Coy Farrar and daughter Wilma. One morning Denzil got up and shot himself. They made it on the f arm, all married and raised families.

Bert Lewis married Mable and had one son. Fred married Vilma and had four children. Dallas married Vida and had six sons. Frank married Lena and had three children. Coy married Mary Frances and had two boys. Wilma married Smythe and had four children. The boys all passed away except Coy Farrar, who lives in California. Wilma also passed away.

Earl Farrar married Jessie, a sister of Josie. Their children were E. P. and Helen. Helen Farrar married Thomas and had one son. E. P. Farrar married Geneva. They had five boys and one girl. E. P. died in 1972. Bettymarried G. W. Crank. They had eleven children, but the names are unknown.

W. T. (Doc) Farrar (born 1857, died 1910) married Dora (born 1866, died 1952). They had E. Claire, Frank, Jewel and Hal. One morning W. T. (Doc) got up and told his brothers that they could have the farm, for he was going to Springdale and make a living. W. T. Farrar had the first hardware store in Springdale in 1886. He sold everything from horseshoes and nails to coffins. He didn't take care of the bodies, though. W. T. Farrar sold the hardware store to Ed Cummings and Bob Clark on March 12, 1907. W. T. Farrar had a hardware in Fayetteville on the west side of the square, W. T. Farrar Hardware and Co. Doc had a massive stroke and died in 1910. In 1912 the name was changed to Lewis Brothers Company. They added a furniture line. The Lewis brothers moved from Springdale to Fayetteville in 1904. The W. T. Farrar heirs sold their shares to Lewis Brothers in 1958.

Gene and Alma Farrar

W. T. Farrar was a successful businessman and very active: president of Farmers and Merchants Bank, Springdale. President of the Bank of Lowell. President of the Bank of Westville, Oklahoma. President of W. T. Farrar Hardware and Co. and Director of the Bank of Exeter, Missouri.

Mrs. W. T. Farrar (Dora) lived many years in hotels in Colorado, Missouri and California after Doc passed away. Her son Claire took care of her business until he passed away in 1950. Then her son Hal took care of her business and she lived in the Cluncy Hotel in Sacramento, California, where Hal was the manager. Mrs. W. T. passed away in 1952. Hal brought her body back to Bluff Cemetery and buried her by her husband and daughter, Jewel G., who died very young (1898—1906). Jewel was eight years old and a beautiful child. Son Hal just lived one year after his mother passed away and is buried in California, leaving a wife and three children.

E. Claire Farrar (born 1884, died August 21, 1950) finished high school in Springdale. That summer he and a friend ran away from home. When his father, W. T. Farrar, caught up with him some place in the north, Doc brought Claire to St. Louis, Missouri, and put him in a Christian college for two years. Then he came back to Springdale and finished college at the University of Arkansas, majoring in Business Administration. Claire was a banker in Springdale for several years.

Claire Farrar married Inez Blake in 1906 and they had one son, Eugene Claire Farrar, born February 6, 1909. They built a new home on West Huntsville Street in Springdale when Eugene was four years old. He went to school in Springdale until he was fourteen. They sent him to Kemper College in Missouri for one year, and he went to high school in Springdale for one year. Then they sold out and moved to Pasadena, California. Claire bought into a bank in California. Eugene graduated from Pasadena High School. He wanted to go to the University of Arkansas, so Claire sold out and moved back to Springdale. He bought a brick home on one acre at West Emma Avenue and Pleasant Street.

Eugene was in ROTC for four years at the University of Arkansas. He graduated in Business Administration in 1930. By that time, Claire and Inez had been very active buying up property, rent houses, and business property. Eugene had to go to World War II for four years. While he was in the service, his father bought a farm, 117 acres, at Lowell, and gave it to his son. When Eugene got out of the service, he helped his parents with everything and raised cattle on the farm.

Claire's health wasn't very good, so he went to Fort Smith Hospital for a check-up and died before the doctors got the tests run. He died August 21, 1950, and was buried in Bluff Cemetery.

Eugene and Alma Lenora Graham were married April 24, 1952. We moved onto the farm in Lowell and raised cattle and cats. Eugene spent every day in Springdale with the rent property and other business. We lived there twenty years. Eugene died December 26, 1969, leaving no children.

My mother-in-law, Inez Farrar, lived for five years afterward with her old-maid sister, Maude Blake. So I took care of them. I stayed on the farm for thirteen years with my cats and had the pastures rented out. The new Highway 71 came along and took 42-1/2 acres of land and all of the buildings, so I was forced to move out. I landed in Springdale on Cheyenne Trail. I still have what the highway left of the farm, with its odd-shaped fields. And I still have one white cat.

Shelby Ray Ford

Shelby Ray Ford was born in Caneyville, Kentucky, to Alice Ann (Gary) and Kenneth F. Ford July 23, 1902. His parents separated when he was three years old and he lived with his father in Louisville until he was eight. His father decided to move to western Oklahoma where he had two brothers and family.

After he was settled, he sent for Shelby. Shelby and his grandfather traveled to Oklahoma in a covered wagon in the spring of 1910. He said he was really scared when the team and wagon started their crossing of the Canadian River in Oklahoma.

Shelby and his father lived with his aunt, uncle and five cousins until his father remarried and moved to Mena, Arkansas. His father was in the real estate business. Shelby worked at odd jobs after school and in the summer, saving all the money he could so he could attend college.

In 1921, he graduated from Mena High School valedictorian of his class. Times had been so hard while growing up, he was determined he would go to college somehow. He agreed to fire a furnace for his board and wait tables for his room.

In the fall 1921, he enrolled at Oklahoma University. His goal was to become a doctor but after receiving a degree in pharmacy, he realized there wasn't enough money, so in 1925 he graduated with a degree in business.

During his summer vacation he took a job in a bank in Mena, Arkansas, and enjoyed it very much. By the time he graduated from college, his father had moved the family to Shelby Ray Ford, 1965.

September 30, 1961, in a surprise ceremony the Arkansas Bankers Association and Arkansas Poultry Federation honored Shelby Ray Ford for his contribution to the industry by placing this bronze bust at the entry to Murphy Park in Springdale, Arkansas.

Brownsville, Texas, so he joined them and worked in a bank until 1928 when he accepted a job with the Farmers and Merchants Bank in Springdale, Arkansas.

He met Ferne (Shelton) Ford and they were married October 25, 1930. Her parents, Francis Henry Shelton, and Pamela Ann (Luce) Shelton, were retired wheat farmers from Kansas. Shortly after Shelby and Ferne were married, he accepted a position as cashier with the Bratt Wasson Bank in Siloam Springs.

BRATT STATE BANK HELD UP TODAY

And Released in Springdale

Gun Battle in Front of Bank

PROJECTS ISSUED

Shelby Ray Ford was the cashier taken hostage March 28, 1933, in bank hold-up at Bratt-Wasson Bank in Siloam Springs, Arkansas.

On March 28, 1933, the bank was robbed and he was taken hostage. As they were fleeing the bank a lot of gunfire was exchanged and he was shot in the leg and ribs by a friend in a building above the bank who did not realize at the time he was hitting Shelby. The robbers let him out of the car about a mile west of Springdale where he walked to a house and was taken for treatment.

One week later April 4, 1933, Shelby and Ferne's only child was born, Frances Ford Dorsa.

Shelby continued to work in Siloam Springs until 1939 when he accepted a position with the First State Bank (Springdale) as vice president. It was the end of the depression and the challenge of building a bank and helping his community was the beginning of a way of life for him.

The conditions were very bad. The population was only 3000, most were destitute and there was no money. Deposits in the bank were only $250,000.00. The fruit and vegetable businesses were virtually gone. Poultry raising was just starting. The entire northwest Arkansas area raised less than five million broilers that year. Like all pioneers, he was looking ahead. Poultry houses supplied fertilizer from chicken litter for the fields, enabled the farmers to build better homes, drive on better roads and enjoy a higher standard of living. He knew the poultry industry could do this and figured out how.

A method of financing was required. Banks loaned money on cattle, corn, cotton, wheat and rice; why not on chickens? So Dad worked out a plan. The bank would grant a feed dealer a line of credit on his financial statement secured with a fifty percent margin on "chicken paper" discounted by the bank. Funds would be advanced as broilers grew. When the birds were sold, the note would be paid and a new note executed for the succeeding brood.

Fellow bankers told him it wouldn't work. They even nicknamed him "The Chicken Banker". But his faith in poultry was unshakable. Poultry growers and feed dealers made money. This went into the bank and helped finance loans to other growers. Both the bank and the industry grew. Soon other bankers stopped kidding and started asking questions. Dad was asked to speak all over the country. He was asked to write articles for leading publications. In March, 1953, issue of Feed Age, he said, "Our bank has been in the broiler financing business about 13 years, and we have loaned ten million dollars on chickens and not lost a dime."

September 30, 1961, he was honored by the Arkansas Bankers Association and the Arkansas Poultry Federation for his contribution to this great industry with a surprise ceremony in which a bronze bust of himself was unveiled as a gift from more than one hundred anonymous contributors from six states. Today the statue stands at the entry to Murphy Park.

Shortly after he began financing the poultry growers, World War II began and he was called on many times to serve as auctioneer for local pie supper bond drives. Our roads were in terrible shape and he worked with committees to pave and build new roads. He could see the widening and rebuilding of Highway 71 would be a great asset to our area when others did not.

He served on the industrial board and made numerous trips to influence industry to settle here. He secured financing for many local canners, knowing all these project would create jobs for the community.

Preston Chandler, oldest son of Jacob and Elizabeth Reeder Chandler.

Joseph Shurtleff Bartlett, father of Bathsheba Bartlett

Mary Christine Chandler Gamble

Joseph Shurtleff and Amanda Porter Zacry Bartlett's daughter married Preston Chandler in 1852 in Evansville, Arkansas. This Bartlett family descended directly from William Brewster who came to America on the Mayflower, enabling descendants to seek membership in the Society of Mayflower.

Joseph Bartlett was born in Massachusetts. It is through the Bartlett side of the family that we are Mayflower descendants. John Alden and Richard Warren, as well, were our Pilgrim ancestors.

Our great-grandfather, Micajah Reeder, fought in the Revolutionary War and is buried in Vineyard Cemetery, north of Evansville, Arkansas.

Preston Chandler, thirty-two, and his sixteen year-old bride, Bathsheba, built a log house near his father Jacob's house where they raised eleven children.

Preston and Bathsheba's children were: Mary Lynn, b. February 1854; Lucinda, b. July 1856; Elizabeth, b. November 1858; John Franklin, b. September 1861; Emma Helen, b. October 1864; Joseph Preston, b. 1867; Anne Margaret, b. 1870; Orpha b. 1872; Albert Thomas, b. 1875; James William, b. June 1877; and Flora, b. 1880.

During the War of Rebellion, Preston fought on the opposite side from his family. One night when Preston came home to see his family, he was shot in the back by one of his neighbors who had been his friend. The bullet lodged in a lung where it stayed until he died in 1884 from pnuemonia at the age of 63.

In 1854, Bathsheba Ann and two of her older daughters watched the Pin Indians, a group of renegade Cherokees so called for the bright pins worn on their clothing, leaving the home of Mr. James Greer, Sr. with his scalp hanging from the rifle of one of the Indians. As soon as they had gone, Bathsheba, Lucinda and Mary found the body, wrapped it and buried it, marking the site with a sandstone rock.

Bathsheba was a devout Christian, a faithful Baptist. She rode her fine black mare, Delsey, never letting rain or dark of night keep her away from a church meeting. On Sundays, she took the whole family in a wagon to worship.

Bathsheba told Jacob he was committing a sin by keeping slaves. Jacob agreed to free them. After writing their letters of freedom, he called them to him to tell them they were free to go. They all left, except Jubal.

At night, a week or so later, a loud commotion was heard coming from the slaves' quarters. Jacob took a lantern and went to see what was happening. All the slaves had returned. They begged him to let them stay. Jacob's arrangements to pay them twenty-five cents a day, furnish food, housing, clothing and medicine seemed to agree with the daughter-in-law, Bathsheba. Several of these freed slaves were buried in the family cemetery.

One night the Pin Indians found a door unlocked at the Chandler home. Thinking Jacob would tell them where he had hid his gold, the unruly troublemakers put Jacob's feet in a hot skillet. He refused until they finally left. Jacob felt his family needed the gold badly enough to withstand the torture even though it left him crippled for a long time.

James William Chandler married Elizabeth Priscilla Choate on December 22, 1898, in the bride's home which was the custom of country people at that time. Elizabeth's wedding dress was dove gray, trimmed in mauve satin. The wedding was in the parents' home.

The Infair Day was celebrated the day after the wedding at the home of the groom's parents with feasting and dancing folk dances. The bride wore a blue dress called her "Infair" dress. This was quite a large celebration.

James and Elizabeth's first child, a son, died at birth.

James Herbert b. May 16, 1903, married Vera Moore. Newton Albert b. October 8, 1905, married Marie Pinkerton. They had two sons, Newton Albert Chandler, Jr. and James Chandler. Anna Mae b. March 27, 1908, a talented singer, married Maurice Robinett of Kansas City, Missouri. Their daughter is Susan Brown of Louisville, Kentucky, married to Morgan Brown. Mary Christine married O. H. Gamble, a contractor and real estate professional. Julia Irene b. November 6, 1912, married Irvin Fitzgerald. Edward Lafayette b. September 5, 1915, remained with his parents.

O. H. and Mary Christine have two daughters, Mary Elizabeth and Anna (Buck). Mary Elizabeth married W. P. Watkins, II, of Fayetteville. Bill Watkins (W. P. III), son of Mary Elizabeth and W. P. II, graduated from the University of Arkansas Law School and is (in 1987) a very successful practicing attorney in Rogers, Arkansas. Anna Christine, daughter of Mary Elizabeth and W. P. II, is married to Mark Moore of Little Rock, where they reside. Anna Christine is head of the gift shop at Steinmart's, and her husband works for Hilton Hotels while he finishes work on his accounting degree.

Anna Jones' son, Jeffery Buck, is a senior at the University of Colorado. He is a computer science and electrical engineering major with a third major in German. He spent the summer of 1987 as a courier in Washington D. C. While there the awesome feeling of residing so near the seat of power in our nation's capital gave him to voice the inner feeling "This is IT! The seat of our government and our nation." He later described the "neat" feeling that came over him, the pride of being an American.

James Buck, age 16, Anna's younger son, is a high school senior in Denver, Colorado, with his sights set on attending Colorado State at Ft. Collins, Colorado, to become a basketball coach.

O. H. Gamble joined the real estate firm owned by James William Chandler and two of his sons, Newt and Herbert. Newt's sudden death left an emptiness in the firm that O. H. quickly filled. James Chandler owned the earliest real estate office in Washington County. Mr. T. S. Tribble, after finishing his second term of office as Mayor of Fayetteville, became an associate of the firm. The doors of the business closed forever when Herbert Chandler developed leukemia and died in 1966.

J. W. Chandler always had fine pleasure horses and was one of the founders of the Northwest Arkansas Riding Club. The summer he died, he broke two pedigreed two-year old Tennessee walking horses to ride but didn't live to enjoy them.

O. H. Gamble later became a contractor and built some beautiful houses in the area, remaining in real estate also. He was Treasurer of the First United Presbyterian Church for thirty-two years and is now retired.

Christine Chandler Gamble was active in civic affairs, especially PTA and was asked to organize the first PTA for the Fayetteville Junior High School in 1952. She was a charter member of WRMC Hospital Auxiliary when Mrs. Vera McNair organized it. She was president of the Women's Civic Club for four years and was instrumental in placing shade trees and blooming trees all over Fayetteville as well as allowing property owners the chance to purchase trees wholesale and donating the labor to plant them. O. H. Gamble donated shade trees to every school in Fayetteville, and Christine gave one to the City Library.

Christine was active in the Presbyterian Church serving as President of the Women's Society of the church, circle chairman, teaching Sunday School, and singing in the choir.

Eva Francis Gash

Eva Francis, (named for her father's sister and mother) was born January 8, 1898, at Trenton, Missouri, first child of Laura Jane Johnson and her second husband, George William "Willie" Gash. Rose (of Spanish descent) lives in Pueblo. Her father died in November, 1986 and was about 90 years old. We had 4 reunions of Gash family-starting in 1980 and it just fizzled. He was cremated, so no burial place.

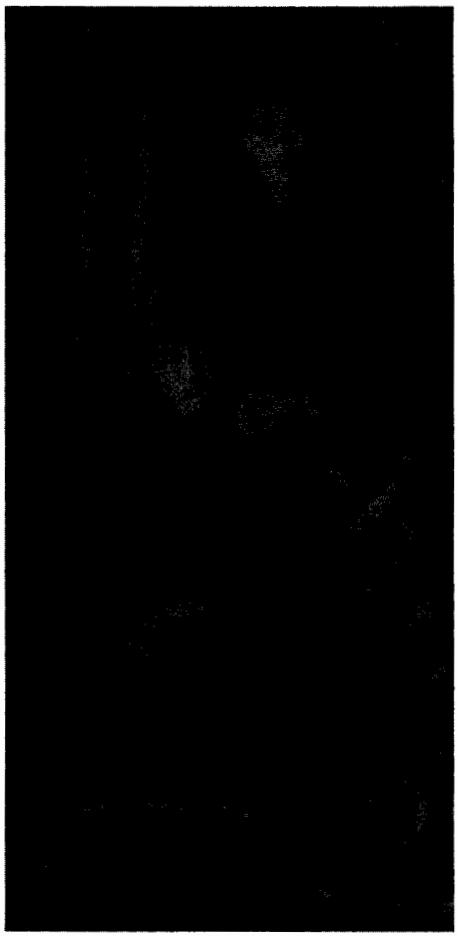
Willie was born October 14, 1866, in Kirksville, Missouri, but his mother, Sarah F. was pregnant when they left Barren County, Kentucky. George W., Sr., b. Barren County in 1835, m. Sarah F. Garrison, b. 1833, Barron County, at her father's house, (James Garrison), on April 4, 1856, by George B. Harland, Neither had been married before. Both had clear, legible handwriting. George, Sr. enlisted in Co., I, 51st Reg., Mo. Vol. Inf. as a private on March 3, 1865 at Memphis, Missouri. Honorably discharged on September 12, 1865. While in service he suffered from headaches, results of neuralgia, etc. and was sick in U. S. Post Hospital, St. Louis, Missouri, on August 31, 1865. The severe headaches were inherited (at least they had them) by his son, Willie, Willie's daughter, Eva, Eva's daughter, Ada. Maggie had them, too. George, Sr. applied for a pension when he was 52, a farmer, unable to do manual labor. Pension was denied. He died December 16, 1897 and is buried in Highland Park Cemetery, Kirksville, Missouri, beside his wife, Sarah, who died from general debility and ascites June 11, 1911.



Ella and Eva Gash, Aunts of Eva Francis.

Sarah applied for a pension in her own behalf December 21, 1897 at Kirksville, Adair County, Missouri, filed in U. S. Pension Office January 8, 1898. Pension was granted and paid to May 4, 1911. On June 18, 1912, at Memphis, Scotland County, Missouri, Eva Gash Branstetter filed for reimbursement for last sickness and death of Sarah. Sarah had no will, but husband had left a will. Had $50.00 cash and real estate (value not shown). Property was sold and possessions divided among heirs, pursuant to will of George, Sr. Frank Gash said his father, Willie, received $1,000.00 about the time they came to Arkansas but Sarah didn't die until 1911. Eva, daughter of Willie, was notified she had inherited some furniture after they were in Arkansas but she never went back for it.

Eva daughter of George, Sr., was born 1873, m. Ephraim Branstetter, and Ella, her sister who married John H. Regnold, where the two who nursed Sarah. Physicians were W. E. H. Boudurant, assisted by W. E. Alexander. Doctor and burial expenses were $181.50 total. Other children of George and Sarah were: John, Henry, an attorney, Owen, a gambler, Clarissa m. Ben Snow, had 9 children.

These were in addition to Eva, Ella and Willie. There may have been an Aunt Doshe (Josephine?), another child, or one of the brother's wives. Some of this is hearsay, passed on by word of mouth. Henry had a son "Little Henry". Writer has 2 pages of a 4 page letter written by Laura to Willie; Excerpts- "Kirksville, Missouri, March 27, 1898. My dear husband. . .I was real glad to hear from you. We are all well, only Eddie has the stomach ache from eating fresh meat. He will be all right. My brother Jake (Dilks) was here to see me Friday. I wrote to Annie to ask her if they had sent the things. . .sent it off Friday. As to what is the matter with little Henry, we don't know. He took to vomiting. . .Eddie is sending you a kiss. What is the name of the railroad that goes through Mountain Grove? . . .With a lot of kisses to my husband." Then she drew the outline of a little hand, with a note, "the baby's hand, she wouldn't be still." The baby was Eva Francis, almost 4 months old. Eddie was Laura's son by Joe Snow.

We don't know the parents of George W. Gash, Sr. Sarah's parents were: James Garrison b. November 29, 1796; d. May 3, 1871, Scotland County, Missouri m. March 17, 1821, Barron County, Kentucky, to Agness Pedigo, b. July 5, 1804, Virginia, d. January 6, 1873, Scotland County, Missouri. Their children were: Charles B. Garrison, Marinda, John R., James Green, William, Sarah Francis, (above mentioned) Martha Jane (m. John F. Pedigo), Joseph, Lewis F., Willis W. All of above children came to Missouri with their families.

James' father was Shadrack, b. 1770—1775, North Carolina(?), d. after 1842, m. ca 1794, probably South Carolina; served in Franklin Company, Georgia militia, October 1793; Cherokee Indian War. To Virginia and on to Barren County, Kentucky by 1802. This is from the Isaac Garrison book. Shadrack's children: James (father of Sarah F.) John, Eleanor, Caleb, Matilda,, Patsy, Thomas, Elizabeth, Samuel A., Mary?. Writer has given our line; will not go into more detail. Shadrack left a whole mess of descendants. Garrisons were of Irish descent.

Willie Gash died July 29, 1920, at Kansas, Oklahoma and is buried there, has a nice marker. Laura's 3rd husband's last name was Potner. This was after she was old and sick. They didn't live together. Laura lived with her daughter, Lula.

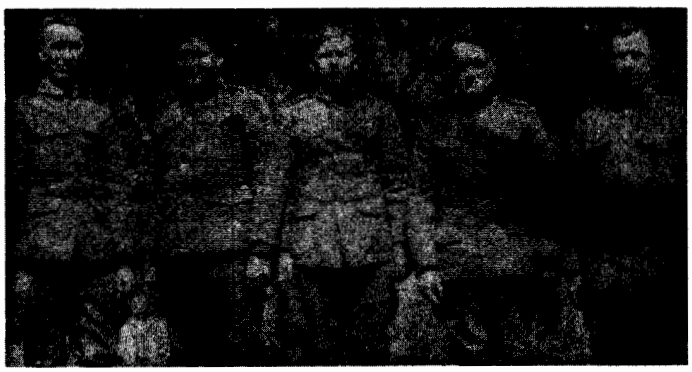
Anna Broyles lived in Elwood for 55 years and was well liked. She made and gave away over 100 quilts and helped many people in various ways. She was a Methodist and is buried in Bellemont Cemetery north of Wathena. Obituary states her childhood summers were spent in Missouri with grandparents who were wealthy slave owners. Laura spoke to writer about her ancestors owning slaves but writer never did understand as Laura was born long after the Civil War was over. They perhaps just talked about when they had had slaves. Benjamin Rose, b. ca 1809 in Virginia (per census) b. April 1, 1798 (per tombstone). It is believed his parents were born in Virginia. Ben died September 3, 1888, and is buried in Rose Cemetery, near Graysville, Putnam County, Missouri. He is the most flamboyant or outstanding ancestor we have.



Clarence Edward Snow in the center with friends in WWI half-brother to Eva Francis.

He was in Macon County, Missouri in 1840; his family in Pike County, in 1850, but he was "to the mines"; he was in Putnam, County, Missouri, October 17, 1856 B. Rose was indicted for permitting a slave to sell spirituous liquors, and gave bail in the sum of $100. Slave holders listed in 1860 as to number and assessed value: Benjamin Rose has 8, value $3,600. (History of Adair, Sullivan, Putnam & Schuyler Counties, Missouri.) Ben had troubles over the slaves, he was chased out of Missouri, and up into Iowa several times. (Have misplaced the record) Ben's son Enoch McDonald, was raised by Negro Marg, who was an excellent cook. Ben would lend her to his neighbors to cook for them on special occasions, and many times Enoch would ride behind her on a horse to the neighbor's house. With the event of the Civil War, Benjamin told the slaves they were free to leave, but some of them did not know where to go or what to do with freedon. Marg, John and Henry stayed with Rose family for sometime after the Emancipation Proclamation. Most just wandered off; they didn't know how to manage for themselves. One day Henry said he "believed he'd go look at the corn and see how it was doing." He never came back. In Ben's will dated March 12, 1858, which was recorded but never probated, he left property to oldest daughter, Nancy Vesteal; 2nd daughter, Eliza Frances Vesteal; 3rd daughter Susan Martha Dilks; to oldest son James William, 2nd son, Benjamin Robinson; leaves land (2 acres) for a cemetery; leaves $200 to build a church under express conditions & sets forth the conditions: Excerpts:. . .reserve from 1 to 2 acres out of land heare given to James W. Rose to Bild a Church on where his Mother, Sarah was berried. . .at a large dobble Elam near the Senter of the 2 acre lot. . .Church to be bilt Due So. about 50 feet. . .land is to be given to Methodist Church South. . .also give $200. to bild said church upon this Express condititoon, that is in case the trustee shall bild a church house 30 by 40 feet,. . .the House. . .with 2 doors in East End. . . also 4 winders 2 on back side. . .Sky lites over Each Doore. . ." Says if bequest isn't carried out as specified, it will be void. Ben signs with an X so doubt if he wrote this will. Writer doesn't know if he actually donated land for cemetery. He gave his slaves, by families, to be kept Forever; not sold but to be kept by wife and sons. His obituary, September 12, 1888, states in part."one of the oldest settlers in the county. . .last Monday he passed into silence. . .laid to rest in Rose Cemetery. . .large crowd.to pay. . .last respects to one who was a loved and loving husband, father and grandfather. His heart was tender and affectionate. He was a good neighbor and a friend to the poor and needy. If every generous act he did would bring a blossom to his grave, he would sleep beneath a wilderness of flowers." In last will, dated October 3, 1888, he had other heirs, shown by application for Letters of Administration by Enoch M. Rose: Elizabeth, widow, resides in Putnam County, Missouri, Nancy Vestal, Eliza Vestal, both in Putnam County, Missouri, Martha Sipes, Grundy County, Missouri, James W., Jefferson County, Kansas; Benjamin R., Macon Conty, Missouri, Mary E. Rose, Benjamin R., Macon County, Missouri, Mary E. Rose, Dallas County, Missouri, Enoch, Linn County, Emily J. Irvin, Linn County, Missouri, John W., Putnam County, Missouri. Signed by mark. Witnesses: John S. Morrow, Daniel Jackson, both of Graysville, Missouri. Ben's wife to remain in full and undisputed possession of home farm until she remarries. Ben m. (1st) December 3, 1830, Sarah Ann Holman b. May 1, 1813, Madison County, Kentucky. Her parents James and Sarah Ann Holman. Sarah was united with Presbyterian Church, and in 1848 united with Methodist Church. She died August 8, 1857 and is probably buried with husband in Rose Cemetery (footmarker only), Children are listed in Ben's first will dated 1858. Ben m. (2) Elizabeth Ann Robbins 1857-1858; Elizabeth b. January 16, 1839 and d. December 13, 1924, buried with husband. She was daughter of David Ashley and Mary Ann Roberts Robbins of Oldham County, Kentucky. Children: Mary Ellen Terrel, Enoch, Emily J. Irvin, S. A. and John Wesley. Many of our relatives rest in Rose Cemetery. Back to biography of Eva Francis. Gash family thought there was good water in Arkansas. They came for Laura's health, as she had kidney trouble. They came by covered wagon from Trenton, Missouri, first settled in Benton County, then moved to Son's Chapel. Cecil was born here. Eva's father kept a bunch of hounds which she didn't like. One hound was lost and Willie went back to look for it. It delayed them 2 days. They arrived here about 1909. Brother C. W. was about 9 months old. He had been able to walk when they started the trip but after sitting on someone's lap all the way, he had to learn to walk again. Eva belonged to Zion Home Demonstration Club for many years. She was an ambitious woman, since she didn't get to realize many of her goals she wanted her only child to do better; to have an education and be independent. She was always making quilts and things for Ada. She insisted Ada go to school every day and not work on the farm. Ada was ready to go. There was no one to play with at home. Eva was very close and fond of her half-brother, Ed. Whatever Ed did, he made Eva do so she couldn't tell their mother on him.

They got out behind the barn and chewed tobacco one time. Made them both sick. Ed made her take a chew every time he did. They they went to the store to get a jug of molasses; on the way home they tried to crack nuts with the jug. Yep, they broke the jug. In about 1904, their mother said to them, "Take this carcass and throw it away." She had rendered the oil out of a skunk, the oil was used for some ailment in those days. They took it out, but it was so brown and smelled delicious, so they decided to eat it behind the house. Perhaps that accounts for the fact that Eva was never able to eat wild game, in fact, she wouldn't even cook it.

Her parents sent her out to do domestic work when she was about 14, she did not like it, especially having to bring the money she earned home to them. So, she got married. Ada worked about 7 miles from her mother's home; nearly every Sunday they would come and take her home with them.

Eva and Carl went to Missouri and picked strawberries soon after they were married. Several other people went. They camped out. Ada went with them that time. Eva and Carl raised broilers in later years. Eva's mother, Laura died February 24, 1951. Eva wasn't able to go to Colorado. But she and Ada went to see her in 1947 and Laura had gone to California. Eva had gone and visited her mother in the fall of 1950, so they had a nice visit. When there in 1947 is when Eva and Ed talked about all the things they got into while they were kids. Eva loved to read and they listened to the radio a lot, but they visited with couples who didn't have any children Ada's age. She started reading when she was very young.

Ed's father deserted his mother, Laura, just before Ed was born and never did support him. Ed married Gertrude Crawford, whose mother was Cherokee Indian. They lived in Arkansas for a couple of years at one time. Then went back to Oklahoma and on to Colorado, and finally to California. Ed farmed when he was young, always raised big gardens. He was a veteran of WWI, and drew a pension. Ed died first but they are both gone now, buried in Turlock, California.

Eva was very active up until she got very high blood pressure. Doctor sent her to Barnes Hospital and she had a heart attack. After she came home she had a stroke and never walked again. She died when 59 and is buried in Zion Cemetery. She left many pleasant memories with her daughter and friends. Carl Lenox, Eva's second husband, served in WWI.

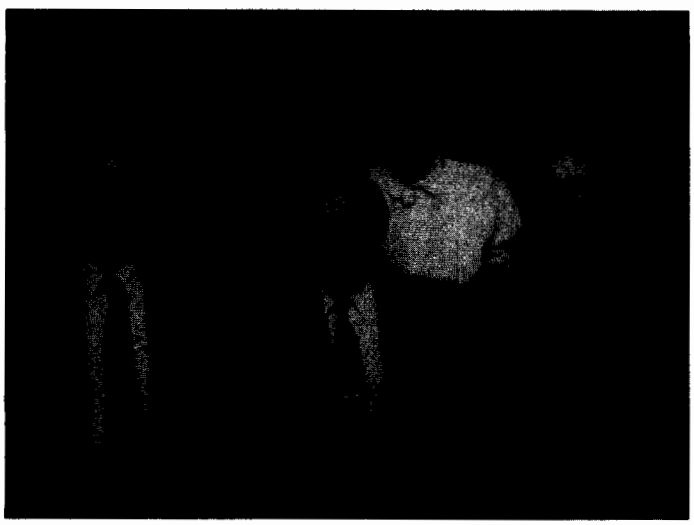
Juel Benbrook Hamblen Giles

The writer, Juel (Jewell) Addie Benbrook was born in 1899. I was named for my great uncle, Hosey Maguire's daughter, Addie Maguire and my grandfather Hosey Maguire Benbrook was named for Hosey.



Juel Benbrook Hamblen Giles with 3 sons: Maclin (Mac) Leroy Hamblen, Herbert Jackson (Jack) Hamblen, and Albert Adrian Hamblen, Jr.

I make the fifth generation of eight generations of Benbrooks to live in Washington County. The first 4 generations are all deceased. The last 4 are all living, but under the name Hamblen instead of Benbrook; Juel having married Albert Adrian Hamblen (1895-1956) on July 26, 1919.

Our 3 sons, were Maclin (Mack or Mac) Leroy Hamblen, Herbert Jackson (Jack) Hamblen and Albert Adrian Hamblen, Jr. Mac, a graduate of the University of Arkansas, married Dorothy Angelene (Dot) Garner and Jack married Leta Mae Garner, daughters of William Harley and Lena Daniels Garner, formerly of Clarksville. Adrian married Shirley Williams Uhl of Fayetteville.

Mac has one son, Leroy (Lee) Benbrook Hamblen, graduate of the University of Arkansas, operates 3 Christian Singles Dating Services in Dallas, Fort Worth and Austin, Texas, where he makes his home. Jack, sixth in the generation line has a son, Albert Adrian Hamblen, (my first husband) was born, raised and died on the ancestral Hamblen-Tollett farm, still in the family 159 years. He grew fruit, stock, and had a canning factory.

Gary Jack Hamblen and a daughter, Linda Marie, both University of Arkansas graduates. Adrian has an adopted daughter, Glenda Hamblen Dwyer. Gary Jack (Jackie) married Faye Farmer and Linda married Kelley Lewis, a pioneer Washington County family of Durham. Each of the two families designed and built their own homes, Linda and Kelley on a part of Memory Acres near Farmington, and Gary Jack, Sr. and Faye now living on part of the ancestral Asa King property in Farmington, now owned by the Hamblen boys. Gary Jack (Jackie) and Faye have one son, Gary Jack, Jr., age 7 years. Linda and Kelley have one son, Kevin Wayne, now 2 years of age.

All of my ancestors came to Washington County before the Civil War. My family all share in the ancestral, "Memory Acres" farm, where Albert and I came when we were married in 1919. It was settled by Henry and Eliza Tollett in 1829, 159 years ago. They owned most all of the Walnut Grove Valley (around 1700 acres) bought at $1.25 per acre, homesteaded, whatever they were allowed, and part was given to Henry for his services in the War of 1812. One of Henry's sons, Ferdinand, lost his life in the War between the States. William Thomas Hamblen, Sr. came to Walnut Grove some time before 1857, the year they purchased their farm from pioneer, George Lawrence, who had gotten it I believe from "Toby" — a Cherokee Indian.

Two sons, Thomas Woodson and James Alexander (Jim) Hamblen were soldiers in the Confederacy. Thomas lost an eye in the fray and their father, William Thomas, was murdered in December, 1862 by Federal bushwhackers, during the time of the Prairie Grove battle. He operated a slave mart for awhile. He and his wife Eliza, had about 8 children, the last one, Mary, was born March 1, 1863, three months after her father was killed. Eliza died two years later of tuberculosis. The farm was sold and the children were scattered among friends to raise.

Henry Tollett's son, William Jefferson (Jeff), took Andrew Jackson (Jack) who was 14 at the time, and helped two Farmington women who had found his father murdered by the roadside to Fayetteville, dig the grave "on the hill", now Cemetery Hill Memorial Park. When Jack was old enough he married Jeff's daughter, Temperance Laure (called "Tempie") Tollet. Jeff Tollett's wife was Martha Ann Sexton, daughter of the first known preacher at Walnut Grove and Cemetery Hill, Rev. John Jacob Sexton. He was a circuit rider Methodist preacher. He and his two wives are buried in Bethesda Grave Yard south of Lincoln. His name is mentioned several times (on pages 48, 72, 73, 372 and 373 in the history of Methodisim in Arkansas, by Vernon, copyright 1963). Walnut Grove was a Methodist Protestant church for 50 years before 1887.

Three Hamblen brothers and a sister came from Tennessee to Russellville in the early 1800s. The sister married an Albright and stayed there. One brother went to Texas and is the ancestor of Hollywood singer, Stewart Hamblen, and of the "3121 Restaurant" - "From Hubcaps to Hamburgers" in Dallas. Another brother was our own William Thomas Hamblen, Sr., my husband Albert's grandfather. His son W. T. Hamblen, II lost his fine son, William Thomas Hamblen, III, who was studying to be a doctor in World War II. The youngest Tennessee brother, Henry, was killed in the war and is buried in Russellville Cemetery.

When Andrew Jackson (Jack) Hamblen's sons, Rolleigh, Clyde and Albert were called to be in the next draft in World War II, Jack, remembering the tragedies of the Hamblens in the Civil War, said, "I will not live to see my sons go war", and he didn't. He died in 1917, Albert was then reclassified and he remained at home to tend the farm and look after his widowed mother.

After the Civil War James Alexander Hamblen, with the help of a few others in the devastated community, built a nice big one room log school that was used for the next 20 years. The little war baby, Mary, lived to be in her 90's and wrote a letter to Albert and me that she went to her first school to uncle Tom (Thomas Hamblen) at Walnut Grove. When the family broke up, Tom went to Ola, Arkansas where he operated a store, and is buried there. Jim, who built the log school house, also made coffins and other cabinet type work. He died of pneumonia not long after the war ended and is buried at Cemetery Hill.

Andrew Jackson and Temperance Laure Tollett Hamblen. Both witnessed the tragedies of the War Between the States. Seven generations in Washington County.

On the land where I live is a little well, dug by the Tollett slaves, Harry, not married, and Dennis, married and had several children. If the Tolletts hadn't had slaves to "pole" their big flat boat up the Red River they would not have made it to Hempstead County. Malaria and chills drove them to northwest Arkansas in 1929, after the Whites had driven Cherokee Indians from their hunting ground in Arkansas. They lost a son, Edward, in 1831 — the oldest marker in Cemetery Hill — and at which time Henry gave 2 acres of land for a cemetery. The negro slave "Old Harry", is thought to be buried there. He out lived "Miss Liza" and "Marsh Henry" (who died in 1871). Liza died in 1885 at age 90. Harry had stayed with the Tolletts after the war to look Frank Dinsmore Giles - fruit salesman, farmer, land developer (developed Giles Addition in NW Fayetteville) and school teacher for 29 years. Married Juel Benbrook Hamblen November 10, 1960.

Charity - daughter of John Jackson Van Hoose, and wife of Bennett Shumate, who lost his health in the Civil War and died leaving six orphan children to which she added her deceased daughter Nora Belle McChristian's two children to raise.

after "Miss Liza". When she died Harry said, "Now there won't be nobody to knit me warm socks and gloves and wash and iron my white shirt to wear to church". The colored people went to church, but had to occupy the back of the room, unless needed for white folks, and then they had to stand outside. Tom Dark (a cousin I believe) from Fayetteville, often visited Dennis' family and worked some for Henry Tollett.

The slaves suffered in the war too. Old Harry, a jolly old fellow, used to sing till he could be heard all over the valley. While Henry was down south during the war, to keep from getting killed, his fine team of horses were confiscated by Federal troops. Henry was a wagoner and Harry was his driver. When Harry was asked why he never sang anymore, he replied that he could never sing again "till them Feds bring Marsh Henry's horses home".

The other Tollett slave, Dennis, moved to Fayetteville after, "to educate his kids". He took the name of Tollett as he had never had a last name. One son, George Washington, called "Wash", became a porter on the train from Fayetteville to Muskogee. He married a Muskogee girl and is the ancestor of the present of Dr. Harrel Edward Tollett, Jr., of Muskogee, son of Dr. Harrel Tollett, Sr., deceased about 2 years ago. He has three brothers; Dr. Charles A. Tollett, Sr., Mr. Winston E. Tollett, Sr. and Dr. Kenneth S. Tollett — all dentists. In the 1960s when I visited there, a Dr. Tollett's picture hung in the lobby of the Veteran's Hospital in Muskogee. Dr. Harrel Tollett says he has cousins "all over the United States" from his ancestor Dennis's large family.

Wars have been hard on my family, as well as Albert's. My great grandfather William Shumate lost two sons in the Civil War; James and William, Jr.; "Little Bill", in the War Between the States, a grandson, Lenley Shumate in World War I and Webber Wilson, Jr. and Maj. Clyde R. Benbrook in World War II.

Regarding Lenley Shumate; he was born Lenley "McChristian", but his father, Henry, oldest son of Rev. John McChristian had deserted his little family just before their second son, Bennett, was born and at which time Lenley's mother, Nora Shumate McChristian, died. Nora's widowed mother, Charity Van Hoose Shumate, then added Lenley and Bennett to her own 6 orphans. Since his grandmother gave him all the care he had ever known he thought of himself only as "Lenley Shumate", and at school gave his name that way. He went to war, fought, and died overseas, and is buried in the Shumate Cemetery with a Government marker that reads, "Lenley Shumate". (The Fayetteville Newspaper stated that "one thousand people attended his funeral"). Someone changed his name to McChristian, at the library and on the life-size mural at the court house put up by the D. A. R. (in about 1919 I had an asterisk placed at his name to show Lenley Shumate and Lenley McChristian were the same person with the the consent of the D. A. R.).

The Shumates were French Huguenots and came to America in the 1700s, settling in Virginia, where they still hold a big annual family reunion. The first name in the family Bible was a son who had 8 given names.

My Irvin ancestors were John and Susan Windsor Irvin from England. When John Irvin died, a beautiful editorial was written for him in the Fayetteville paper. Mr. and Mrs. W. L. Morgan now live on their farm at Maguire Town, near Elkins, in a white frame house. The old log house the Irvins lived in was there in my early teens, but is gone now. The Irvins promoted education and often kept girls so they could attend better schools. Their daughter, Margaret (Mag) was a school teacher.

My Maguire ancestors, both at Maguire Town and the Strain Community, go back to Jefferson Green Maguire, who came to America on a boat from Ireland when he was 17 years old. Mrs. L. L. Rowley now lives in the old Maguire log home built in 1920 by Owen Maguire on Maguire Road on Highway 74.

My Fincher ancestors, Hiram and Harriet, came to Washington County from Tennessee in 1841.

My Mills family I know very little about. I believe Seth and Charity Thornsburg Mills were my great-great grandparents. My grandmother, Charity Van Hoose told me she was named for her grandmother, Charity Thornsburg Mills. Seth Mills' daughter, Rachel, married my great grandfather, John Jackson Van Hoose, who operated a store and Post Office at Durham. I know nothing of the Thornburgs.

My first Van Hoose ancestors in Washington County were John and Lydia Lewis Van Hoose. Their graves, north of Wilson Park, have been destroyed along with their noted lawyer son, Peter P. Van Hoose's grave. All were in quaint rock graves above the ground, and developers used the rocks for building projects. James Haden Van Hoose, their son, had deeded 1/4 acres of land from his farm to be forever a hallowed resting place for them. James Haden and his two wives Melinda McIlroy and Martha Skelton are buried in Evergreen Cemetery. There is a deed at the courthouse for the little 1/4 acre cemetery.

My Shumate ancestors, William and Sarah Ball Shumate, came first to Madison County, on Drake's Creek, then to Washington County (to Maguire Town). Old Bayles, William's father, came a short time later, settling on William's original Drakes Creek farm. He later gave that farm to his daughter, Mildred and her husband John Kennan, and he homesteaded a farm at Harris where he is buried. He gave that farm to his son Bennett, and wife, Charity Van Hoose Shumate, which Bennett later traded for the Ead's farm at Durham.

The Benbrook family name in Washington County is gone and I (and my children) are all that is left in Washington County of Nathan and Ewing Benbrook's families who came to Washington County before 1836.

There are other Benbrooks in Arkansas from two Arkansas cousins, Henry and Elbert Benbrook who "dropped off" the Benbrook caravan and "became millers" in Izard County. Two descendants of those boys are Robert (who lives on the ancestral farm in Salem, Arkansas and Francis Jernigan (Keith) of Little Rock, who is a Benbrook genealogist).

Another Benbrook cousin who spent some time here before he went into the service in the Civil War, was James (Jim) Benbrook, for whom the little town of Benbrook, Texas was named — and the big Benbrook lake costing $75,000,000. A street in the joining city of Fort Worth is named "Old Benbrook Street".

There are a number of Benbrooks scattered in the United States; all of whom I know about, date their lineage back to Ezekiel, Sr., "captain of Carolina troops in Washington's patriot army, 1779". All of the Benbrook lines say the Benbrooks are kin to John Bunyon of England, but only little research has been done on that. When I was in England in 1985, I visited the Bedford Genealogy Library and saw on microfilm, "Sarah Brown (a grandaughter — maybe 7th generation of John Bunyon) married Stephen Benbrook, who are in America". Several Benbrook cousins live in Natches, Mississippi. The Benbrooks here used to visit them by steamboat.

My first husband, Albert Hamblen was a liberal thinker. His favorite books were history and math, and he was well read in the Bible, having taught it from his youth in Sunday School at Cemetery Hill and Walnut Grove. He seldom missed a Sunday at church, being almost constantly a teacher for the young people's class. He was clerk of session for the church at his death, at which time his oldest son, Mac, was elected and still holds that position. His son Jack is an elder. Albert was a successful farmer despite the tragic depression and drought years of the 30's. He had 20 acres of grapes and operated the Hamblen Canning Factory, with the help of his 3 young sons, for 15 years — using 23 women tomato peelers. His motto was, "don't worry if you have to wait on the sun, but never let it wait on you". Albert and I were young people's leaders in church and the 4-H Club work for 17 years, when he died at which time I resigned as youth leader.

Four years later after Albert's death I married Frank Dinsmore Giles who had 3 married daughters by his first wife, Irene Dowell Giles, deceased. Frank was a liberal thinker, wrote a few articles, and could quote poetry and songs from memory by the hour. He was almost a charter member of the Unitarian Church in Fayetteville, and was on the board when the present church was built on Cleveland Street. He wrote a front page article in the Northwest Times when man set foot on the moon. Frank Giles family came from around Tyler, Texas, to Searcy County, Arkansas, then in 1908 they moved to Savoy. When Frank was 16 he taught his first school of 65 pupils, with an assistant teacher, Miss Emma Beavers of Robinson, near Savoy. He taught for 29 years and resigned at Greenland to take a full time "District Manager" job with the Hugh Rouw Fruit Company, for whom he worked until he retired in 1960. During the war, in 1918, he resigned his teaching job at Johnson to enter the University of Arkansas Students Army Training Corp. S. A. T. C. (stick around till Christmas, the boys called it for they thought the war would be over by Christmas) in preparation for joining the service as a Lieutenant. He was also a farmer, and dabbled in real estate developing his farm into Giles Addition, north west corner of Fayetteville. He died at the age of 90. Frank and I were charter members of the North West Arkansas Memorial Society (for cheaper funerals).

We all work in the Southern Memorial Association (of Women) 1872, who own and care for the Confederate Cemetery. Adrian belongs to The Sons of Confederate Veterans. His wife Shirley and a distant cousin, Brett Maguire's wife, Kimberly, are co-chair persons in charge of the restoration of the 100 year old bandstand. They now have the finances to start it and blueprint by architect Cy Sutherland of the University of Arkansas, is being drawn. The last public things that both Albert and Frank attended before their deaths were to their churches that on Sunday morning, then to the Southern Memorial Vesper services in the evening. Frank sang a solo "Whispering Hope" his favorite song.

My sons, Mac, Jack, Adrian, and grandson Gary Jack, have all served in military service - all overseas except for Adrian who was in the Air Corps stationed in the states.

I am the only local charter member of the 50 year old Walnut Grove Cherry Belle Extension Club. I am historian and associate member of the Walnut Grove Community Presbyterian Church, which Albert and I joined in 1920.

I belong to the Shiloh Museum and the "Elmira Love" Nature Club, (no work, just play). I am the only living member of the six who organized the Washington County Historical Society which now has some 900 members. It was organized in January, 1951 in Prof. Walter Lemke's Journalism classroom at the University of Arkansas. The other five were my husband, Albert Hamblen, Grace Albright, Lessie Reed, Oscar Williams, Shumate descendant, and Prof. Lemke.

I gave the two "gold bricks" to the City Hospital Geriatric Center in honor of Frank when he was a patient there. . .and in memory of the doctors in our family who spent time in Washington County - Dr. Garret T. Benbrook, Dr. Zack Van Hoose, Dr. Harvey Doak Wood and William Thomas Hamblen, III, studying to be a doctor when he lost his life in WWII at the age of 18.

I now live alone on the farm where Albert was born and reared and died (my children live nearby) and where we came to live in 1919 when we married.

Walnut Grove is situated in a valley five miles southwest of Fayetteville and one and one-half miles south of Farmington. Kessler Mountain is on the east, prairie land on the north and west, and Evans Mountain on the south. Evans Mountain was named for an Evans family who lived on the side of it. They had two children buried in the Cemetery Hill. They were from the Evans family in Evansville which split up in the Civil War when two sons fought on opposite sides and declared they would never claim kin with each other — and today some of the younger ones do not know that they were kin. They were a little kin to the Hamblens through a marriage into Rev. Sexton's family.

As I close this autobiography of myself and extending families, Mac, who a week ago retired from 32 years work in Plant Pathology at the University of Arkansas, is working on all of the families income taxes; Jack, retired from the postal department is typing this history, and Adrian, not yet retired, is starting his 30th year as a machinist at the Standard Register Company, in Fayetteville. Gary Jack, Sr. is a mail carrier for Farmington and Linda is manager of a sporting goods store in Fayetteville and Leroy is busy with his dating service in Texas.

Will there be a ninth Benbrook and a seventh Hamblen generation in Washington County? It seems that will be up to my great grandsons; Gary Jack age 7, an honor student at Farmington School; and Kevin age 2 and already letting us know where he stands on "important" issues of the day.

I will end this story with a poem — written on my 89th birthday, March 1, 1988, written for a time when I might not be here.

Portrait on the Wall:

Pause a moment when you pass, My precious descendants, and gaze on me a moment tho I am now only a portrait on the wall. Pause a moment when you pass, when my days on earth are done, when I can no more tell you stories of books, and poems, and roses. Pause a moment when you pass, toss me a smile or speak my name, who knows, perhaps from my portal I may blow you a kiss.

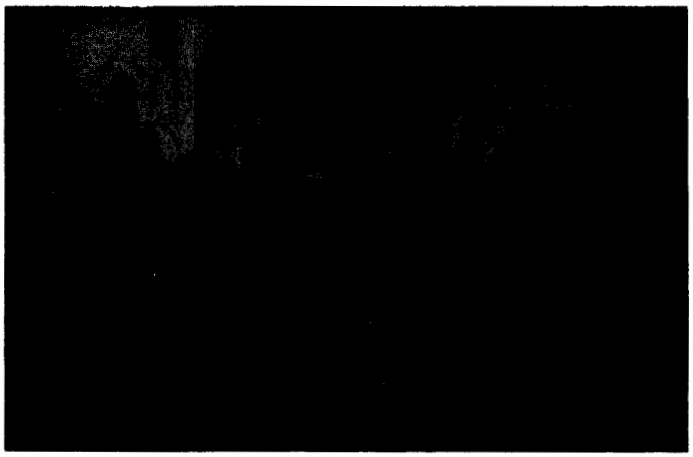
Peter Graham

In the spring of 1807, Peter Graham and his wife, Rachel, and their thirteen children left their home near Lexington, Kentucky for the area north of the Boston Mountain Range of the Ozark Mountains. Their youngest child, two year old Nelson, rode on a feather bed on the back of a pack horse. The others traveled on foot or on horseback. Part of the trip was covered by flat boat.



Old Dan, the star of the picture, carried or pulled all of these to school except for Elbert on the right, and he rode him to teach school. From the left are Robert, Roy, Irene, Alma, Orville, Ras, Carl, Tol and Elbert. Old Dan was ridden by many of their children. He died in the 1930s at about the age of 33.

Silas M. Graham, Ross, John Nelson Graham, Sara Ellen and Bedia Ann Graham (Phillips).

Grahams

After several weeks they reached Moore's Rock on the Arkansas River, a short distance above the Arbuckle Island, between Alma and Lavaca, Arkansas. Then they went up to the valley to Lee's Creek to what is now the Devil's Den State Park area. Here, they crossed over the divide to the valley of the West Fork of White River, near the present Woolsey.

They lived in this area, between where Fayetteville and Winslow now are. After young Nelson was grown and married, Peter and Rachel, Nelson and his wife, Louise Landers, moved down the White River to a place called the Horseshoe Bend. This farm was later named "The Nellette Ranch" but is now part of Beaver Lake. Peter and Rachel and two of Nelson's children were buried in a family plot on this farm.

The children of Peter and Rachel Graham were: William, John, George, Ira, Peter, Moses, Nancy, Cissy, Sally, Polly, Rachel and Nelson.

The children of Nelson and Louisa Graham were: Nancy, Lucinda, Cassia, Silas Marion, William, Sarah (Sally), Temple E., Peter, Elizabeth, Talitha C., Deborah I., Elias D. and Mary Frances.

In 1840, Nelson bought 160 acres of land (part of which is now on the north side of Springdale City Limits); 80 acres were purchased from a Mr. Mace Phillips and 80 acres from the Fayetteville Land Office. That same year the family moved to the new farm and set out an apple orchard. Two of those trees stood until 1920. He later bought two 40-acre tracts that gave him 240 acres of very good farm land.

During the Civil War, Nelson Graham and his youngest son, Elias took a mule and sled to haul a barrel of water from a spring. They heard a noise and Nelson sent Elias to hide in the brush. Bushwhackers came then and killed Nelson. They camped at the spring that night, while the little boy, Elias, stayed hidden in the brush all night. Nelson's family took him into the woods and buried him. This burial site was the start of the Phillips Cemetery where six generations of his descendants are buried.

The family lived on this farm until the parents died and the children married. One son, Silas Marion, bought out the other heirs, and continued to live on the place until his death in 1920. He divided the farm among his children, John Nelson Graham,

On farm near Accident School House (NE of Springdale). Graham's family Silas and Robert. Elderly lady in black front row, Catherine (Looney) Graham, wife of Robert. 1922 all of off spring at that time.

Sarah Ellen Graham (wife of James J. Graham - no relation), Elmer Ross Graham and the home to Bedia Ann Graham Phillips, who lived there until her death in 1932.

James Jefferson (Jim) married Sara Ellen (Sade) Graham (no relation). They had seven sons: Elbert, Ras, Tol, Carl, Robert, Orville and Ray; one daughter, Irene (Mrs. Hugh Crum).

Bedia Ann married George L. Phillips. Their children were: Stella (Nail), Wallace, Lenora (Cuppy), Walter, Silas, Pearl (Neil), Paul and Cynthia (Green).

John Nelson married Susan Arabella Phillips. Their children were: Harvey, Hobson, Tommy, Ruth, Katy and Ruby.

Ross Graham, father of Alma Farrar, was typical of the farmers of his day. His by-word, "By shots" was used quite often. "By shots, I'm not going to plant until the sign is right". Others in the community didn't believe in signs but they also didn't believe in taking chances, so they waited until Ross planted his corn and then they would plant. An ability of Ross' was to tell a person with warts when the warts would disappear. He may not have been able to remove them but he could accurately predict their disappearance.

Berry D. Graham, born 1797 in North Carolina, went to Kentucky. There, he married Sarah Wright, daughter of Thomas Wright, who lived near Greensburg. They moved to Taney County, Missouri and in 1840 moved to Arkansas, four miles south of Fayetteville. In 1845, he moved one mile west of Springdale.

In 1840, "The Regular Baptist Church of Shilo" was constituted. Deacon Berry D. Graham of the West Fork Church certified the church. He and his wife, Sarah, were Numbers 25 and 26 on the church roll in 1845 and were members the rest of their lives.

Their fourth son, Robert Wright Graham, was in the Confederate Army. He was given a furlough by the Union Army and two weeks later was paroled on good behavior.

He married Sarah Catherine Looney in 1865. They had seven sons: Jim, George, Ben, Jo, Al, Robert, Seborne; and one daughter, Ellen (Sargent).

Several of the Graham family members lived across the county line, in Benton County; however, the area in which they lived is now within Springdale City Limits, Springdale was their trading center and most of the children attended Springdale High School.

There were many family and community activities that were of interest to this family, one of which was "hog killing". Many of today's youth don't realize that animals have to be killed ("Yuk") before they are eaten. It seemed that the coldest day of the year was chosen. The hands would freeze and ears would sting as the cold penetrated. A barrel was filled with hot water and the hog was dipped (one end, then the other) to loosen the hair, which was then scraped off. It was then cut into pieces, then it was cooked. That was the best part of the operation.

Making apple butter was a family affair. Friday night was apple peeling night. About 30 gallons of sliced Ben Davis apples were ready for early Saturday morning activities, when they were piled up, in and on a 25-gallon copper kettle. Cider made from Staymon Winesap apples was poured in the kettle. A fire was built outside under the kettle and the stirring started with a paddle with a 12-foot sassafras pole handle. The stirring continued until about 1:00 p. m. Woe unto the kid who stopped stirring and let the butter burn. This would make about 18 gallons of prime winter time eating.

Thanksgiving at Grandpa Jim's and Grandma Sade's was an EVENT that was anticipated from November to November. All the offspring and many others were always there, usually there would be about 60 guests. The ham, fried chicken, baked chicken, venison, banana cake, heavenly hash, pumpkin, apple, raisin pies. Most of the food was home grown and homemade. It was Grandma's insistence that all must sit for this wonderful meal and since there were so many of us it was necessary to eat in shifts - the grownups ate first, then the teenagers and last of all the little ones. That wouldn't go over too well today. Many of the political problems of the day were "settled" there that day.

Times were hard in the years from 1920 to 1930. People died even if there was no money for burial. George Phillips and Ras Graham made several coffins, and Bedia Ann Phillips, Sade Graham and Vi Graham lined them. One time, two teenagers, Alma Graham Farrar and Cynthia Phillips Green got in one and lay down to see how it would feel "when their time came".

Nathan Virgil Hanks

Nathan D. Hanks, Sr. was born April 11, 1811 in Lincoln County, North Carolina. At the age of 21 years, he went to Henderson County, Tennessee. There he met Martha B. Baker, who was born in middle Tennessee, December 3, 1815. This couple was married September 17, 1833. They migrated west in 1834 and were among the early settlers at Boonesboro, Arkansas, the name of this town was later changed to Cane Hill. His trade was wagon maker, but like most men of his day, had other skills. Both he and his wife were interested in education and good schools and were devout members of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church.

They were the parents of eight children. This family suffered the usual hardships of the Civil War and one son, Sam Hanks, a Confederate soldier, was killed and is buried at Vicksburg. Family records are incomplete and many are missing, but it is known that Nathan Hanks, Jr. studied theology and became a Presbyterian Minister, son John moved to Higginsville, Missouri, where he married and raised a family. A daughter, Roseata went to Illinois to teach, and later married Willis Cooper, a druggist of Litchfield, Illinois. Another daughter whose married name was Holland were parents of a daughter, Mattie Holland. Mattie's parents both died when she was quite young and she went to live with her grandparents, Nathan D. and Martha Hanks. She eventually married David Ross.

Daughter, Medeline Hanks never married, but stayed home and helped take care of Mattie and a nephew that would arrive from Illinois. This young boy, Nathan Virgil Hanks was the son of Green Pinkney Hanks, another son of Nathan D. Hanks, Sr. Nathan D. Hanks, Sr. died June 11, 1892 and Martha B. Hanks died September 15, 1894. Both are buried in Cane Hill Cemetery.

Green Pinkney Hanks was born at Cane Hill, Arkansas, June 8, 1837. He was reared to manhood in northwest Arkansas and received his education at Cane Hill College.

In the fall of 1856, he moved to Illinois and was engaged in teaching until the outbreak of the Civil War. In 1861, he enlisted as a private in Company A, 61st Regiment, Illinois Infantry. He suffered a hip injury in the Battle of Shiloh, Mississippi. He was serving as Captain at the time of his discharge in 1865.

Nancy died in childbirth of this daughter. The family was living in Litchfield, Illinois at the time of her death. G. P. did not think he could properly take care of a baby girl with a family of boys to raise, so he gave her to an Illinois family that would provide a good home for her. Records are incomplete at this point in time and the name of the family that took her and the events that may have happened in her life are not known.

Later, after the death of Nancy, G. P. did remarry. Little has been known about his marriage. It was some time after this marriage that Nathan Virgil came to Cane Hill to live with his grandparents.

In 1885, G. P. Hanks returned to Arkansas. He was accompanied by son Wilbur, but the other sons remained in Illinois.

In 1888 he met and married Mrs. Frances (Fannie) Gault Fears, a widow. She was born in Bedford County, Tennessee, and had moved to Arkansas with her parents, when a young girl.

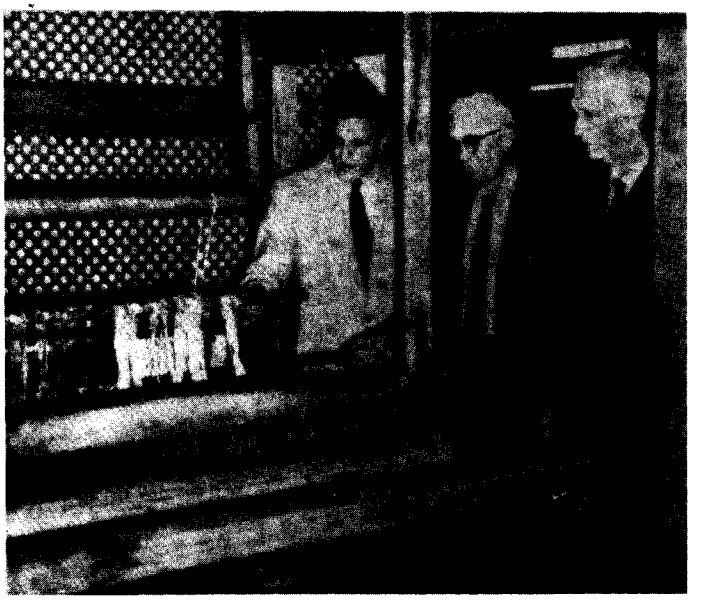
John Thomas Hilton

John Thomas Hilton was born April 9, 1857, in Hiltons, Scott County, Virginia and was one of the sixth descending generations from the Hiltons who lived in St. Mary's County, Maryland as early as 1668.



Presentation of family loom to University of Arkansas Museum by Grover and Lucian Hilton in memorial to brother L. L. Hilton, U of A faculty retiree. Left to right: Charles McGimsey III, Grover Hilton and Lucian Hilton, 1961.

The Hiltons were emigrants from England. Information of the early settlers is taken from the previous research data by James L. Hilton of New Carrollton, Maryland. E. Frank Hilton, Gate City, Virginia, and Mrs. B. L. Neal of Weber City, Virginia. Family history and knowledge of later families was given by Virginia Hilton Teasdale, Kathleen Hilton Bryant of Springdale, Arkansas, and Kathryn Hilton Fisher of Hutchinson, Kansas.

William, the first Hilton to come to America, sailed from London, England in 1621 on the Fortune, the first ship to arrive at Plymouth, Massachusetts, after the Mayflower. He was living in Dover, New Hampshire in 1627, and died in Maine in 1656.

Andrew Hilton, who died about 1746, was the first Hilton of Maryland, known to be a definite ancestor of the Scott County, Virginia Hiltons. The direct descending generations were: (2) John Hilton was born 1720 in St. Mary's County, Virginia, and died, 1790 in Randolph County, North Carolina. (3) Reverend Samuel Hilton was born 1766, in St. Mary's County, Maryland and was married 1787, to Nancy Bird Hilton in Randolph County, North Carolina. He was a Baptist minister and in the early 1790s, moved to an area near the Tennessee line, now known as Scott County, Virginia. He was the first preacher in this section of the western settlements and was instrumental in establishing the first church in the county. On October 26, 1805, the "United Baptist Church of Christ at Big Moccassin Gap" was founded. In 1812, among the members were, William Cody and Sarah Cody, grandparents of "Buffalo Bill" Cody. Reverend Samuel Hilton died, April 24, 1830.

(4) John Hilton was born 1788 in Randolph County, North Carolina and was married January 11, 1812 to Nancy Fulkerson Hilton. He was the largest land owner of the time in this area of Scott County, Virginia. In about 1887, the railroad was constructed through his property in the "Poor Valley", a station was established and named, "Hiltons" in honor of John. Six of his seven sons fought in the Civil War and two joined the California Rush. John Hilton died, May 31, 1873. (5) John H. Hilton, born June 26, 1824 in Scott County, Virginia. He and brother, E. B. and three Hilton cousins joined the Gold Rush to California in 1849, with pack horses and by wagon train, they arrived after 87 days in traveling. After about a year in the gold fields, they took a boat from San Francisco to Panama, walked across the Isthmus then traveled by boat to Norfolk, Virginia by train to Lynchburg and walked from there, home.

John H. was married in 1851 to Martha Ann Agee who was born April 22, 1831, the daughter of Lawrence Agee, born May 31, 1806 and died April 22, 1884 and Polly Cattron Agee, who was born January 7, 1804 and died July 1, 1870. John H. and Martha were the parents of nine children: Mary, William H., John T., Frank, Jeff, Nancy, James, Sarrah and Maggie. The third born, John, was our own John Thomas Hilton.

They were the owners of one slave, an infant, "Nigger Ed", was purchased in 1865 at the price of about $400 on condition that nothing be paid if the slaves were set free. Baby "Ed" was given a home and raised to manhood as a member of the family. After being set free, Ed was given the "Hilton" name.

John H. served in the Civil War by enlisting, April 6, 1862, in the 24th Virginia Regiment of the Confederate Army and served in Kentucky under General John Hunt Morgan.

John H. was a very colorful person, he was a Baptist, a Mason, a strong Democrat and a politician by attending all local conventions. He was the largest land owner in the area, owning lands on Clinch Mountain and along the North Fork of Holston River, where he built the Hilton Dam and Mill. He was a store owner, a postmaster and built the blacksmith shop, church and school.

In 1913, the family came to Washington County, and lived in the "little house" on father John's farm in the Mountain Home Community. While there, two daughters were born and died in infancy, they were buried in the cemetery on the Hilton farm. In 1915, the family moved to Hutchinson, Kansas seeking employment in the wheat fields.

In 1916, a decision was made to locate in St. John, Kansas, where their daughter Mary Kathryn Hilton Fisher was born December 8, 1917, and presently living in Hutchinson, Kansas. In 1918, Grover established the Oxide Battery Company.

The family returned to Hutchinson later establishing and owning the companies of Hilton Electric and Central Specialty.

They were a great asset to the community and made many farm building improvements. They attended First Baptist Church in Fayetteville and later became members of First Baptist Church in Springdale.

Paul L. Hilton died October 20, 1960 and was buried in a Hutchinson, Kansas cemetery. Following their son's death and leasing the farm, they returned to their home and business activities in Hutchinson.

Grover was a caring person for his family members and heritage. His travels in sales and promotion of Leech products permitted him to keep contact with relation in different localities.

In 1961, Scott County, Virginia, Grover secured the loom which was owned and used in the years between 1840 and 1900 by his grandmother, Betty Francisco of Gate City, Virginia.

The Franciscos were early settlers in Scott County, Virginia. The loom was disassembled and shipped to Fayetteville, Arkansas, then reassembled and readied for weaving by Robert Barnes of Greenland and Mrs. Elpha Kindred of Springdale, both of whom were weavers and members of the Council of Ozarks Artists and Craftsmen.

In December, 1961, the loom was presented to the University of Arkansas Museum by Grover and Lucian Hilton in memory of their late brother L. L. Hilton who served for many years as Dean of General Extension activities at the University, retiring in 1953.

From an old issue of the Northwest Arkansas Times, dated December 16, 1961, "University Director Charles McGimsey III accepted the gift for the museum."

Grover and Lucian remembered the suits made for them from material woven on the loom by their grandmother, Betty Francisco. Grover C. Hilton died December 17, 1964. Pearl Shrum Hilton died November 24, 1985 and they are buried in Friendship Cemetery, Springdale, Arkansas.

Neal Hilton, sixth member of the family, died in 1908 at the age of 18 years, soon after the family came to Washington County. He was buried in the Wedington Cemetery.

Martha Marie Hilton, youngest member of the family was married April 15, 1914 to Truman C. Campbell of Goshen. (See Truman C. Campbell story).

Mary Jane Francisco Hilton died in 1918 and was buried in Friendship Cemetery. In 1920, John T. Hilton moved to a farm near Goshen where he lived until the farm was sold to Wilburn Oxford, November 15, 1922.

John T. Hilton chose as his second wife Bessie Roxie Mayes Hilton and they were married in 1925, the daughter of the late James P. Mayes and Mary Louvenia Long Mayes of Mount Home Community.

Moving to Texas, they settled in Francitis, Matagordo County. After a year or so of farming they returned to Washington County, and purchased a farm in the Mountain Home Community near Bessie's original home. A grape vineyard, peach orchard and beef cattle provided the main source of income from the farm.

Bessie referred to John as "Mr. Hilton". Their mode of travel was by buggy with old "Prince". Prince was a good riding horse for grandchildren, while visiting.

John Thomas Hilton died September 23, 1940 and was buried alongside his first wife, Mary J. Hilton in Friendship Cemetery.

Bessie remained on the farm where she produced poultry for a number of years. After failing health, the farm was sold to Patricia Halbrook of Springdale. She resided with her niece, Mayme Ferguson and Clint Ferguson residence of Habberton Community, until her death in September 1974. Bessie Mayes Hilton was buried in Goshen Cemetery.

In early 1920s John T. Hilton's brother, "Jeff", owned the adjoining farm south of property purchased by John T. and Bessie upon their return from Texas.

Jefferson Beureguard Hilton was born March 29, 1862 in Scott County, Virginia, the son of John H. and Martha Ann Hilton and was married to Sallie Smith Hilton. Jeff was a former employee of the police force in Indianapolis, Indiana and had lived in Peculiar, Missouri before coming to Arkansas.

His anticipation and dreams of striking gold led to prospecting. The site is clearly visible where he picked, chisled, dug and shoveled. An accountable find was never publicly reported from "Jeff's Goldmine".

The farm is presently owned by Dr. Vincent B. Runnels of Fayetteville. The adjacent property west, known as the "Dick Sanders" farm was occupied by Walter Clatfelter and Gertrude Hilton Clatfelter family. Gertrude Clatfelter was the daughter of Jeff Hilton.

After leaving Arkansas, Jeff and the Clatfelter family made their home in California near another daughter, Bertha B. Hilton Hunter.

The farm has been divided into smaller tracts and they are presently owned by Bob Winkleman of Fayetteville. Doug Johnston and Karen Johnston, Ralph Maze and Theresa Maze, Toney Yates and Kay Yates living on farm and Ronald Harp and Sheron Harp of Lowell, Arkansas.

The two farms were previously owned for an extended period by Truman C. Campbell.

As the author of this story and the grandaughter of John T. Hilton, I am proud of the Hilton family and heritage and feel their support and service to have been an enrichment to the area.

Jerry Hinshaw

Jerrold Eldon (Jerry E.) Hinshaw brought his wife, Betty, and three children to the Springdale-Tontitown area in August 1956. He had met Elizabeth Byron Brockmeyer while they were working for the Ralston Purina Company in St. Louis. They were married in the Emmanuel Episcopal Church in Webster Groves, Missouri on June 25, 1949.

Ross, Darlene, Carrie, Dawn, and Waylon Kenneth.

They moved to Jacksonville, Florida that same year, Jerry having been promoted to District Salesmanager. Two of their children were born there: Anita Louise on October 11, 1950 and Cathy Elizabeth on October 1, 1951. In November, they moved to Dallas when he accepted an offer with Western Hatcheries. Their son, Ross Edwin (named after both grandfathers), was born August 29, 1955. He was still in the crawling stage when the family settled 2-1/2 miles south of Arkansas Highway 68 on the Tontitown-Wheeler Road in an old home that Joe M. Steele and his family once lived in. It is of local interest that Marjorie Steele Brooks, wife of Jim Brooks, was born there.

The Hinshaws came to Arkansas to set up a branch headquarters for Arbor Acres Farm, a leading meat-type poultry breeder. The operation was soon the largest supplier of broiler breeding stock in the southwest. The company built a hatchery and housing for 60,000 poultry breeders on the farm. Their fourth child, Dawn Marie, was born there August 28, 1957.

Ross, Sunny, Dawn, and Cathy.

Betty and Jerry Hinshaw.

Egg production increased dramatically the first year. Jerry had eggs brought down to the house and put on the porch off the kitchen. Betty and a neighbor, Margie Hull weighed eggs by hand, putting them in the proper categories. There were times when the floor was so filled with egg baskets they could scarcely find a place to stand. It got uncomfortably cool when the wind blew from the north. Soon an egg grader was installed and the operation was moved out of the home.

Nita and Cathy attended Stony Point grade school on Highway 112 until the end of 1959. Mr. N. T. Griffith was principal. Mrs. Helen Mount was one of their teachers and a marvelous one. After the country schools consolidated with the Springdale schools in the fall of 1960, the school bus picked them up at 7:05 a. m. and brought them home at 4:20 p. m.

In the early 1960s, Jerry set up poultry breeding operations for his company in Columbia, Venezuela, Argentina and Brazil. He started a market egg program under the trade style of Eggland and shipped fresh, fancy cartoned eggs to Safeway in Washington, D. C.

Jerry collaborated with a builder, Gene Davis, on Elmdale Terrace, a subdivision in Springdale. They tore out grape vineyards and platted streets. They decided moderately priced homes were the city's greatest need. Jerry's son is remembered where the street signs read Ross and Hinshaw on a single post. Betty decided this was a good idea because they had not sent out a birth announcement for him as they had for their daughters.

Calling their place Rocking Chair Ranch, they built their home on a hill in the winter and spring of 1960-61. Jerry tried without success to build a lake at the bottom of the hill. It would fill to a certain level but not hold water. Draining it before scattering a traincar-load of bauxite over the bottom, he invited their neighbors to bring containers to catch all the fish they could. They came, catching them by hand as they flopped around in the mud. The bauxite made the difference. People have been fishing in their lake every since.

In 1964, Jerry ran for Congress in Arkansas Third District and although defeated, received over forty-seven percent of the vote. The following year, he sold his interests in the company but worked for it in Europe and the Middle East until 1969. He resigned to develop five cattle ranches in Arkansas and Missouri which were sold in 1978. He then established Hinshaw and Associates, a real estate appraisal firm.

Jerry was elected to the Washington County Quorum Court as a Justice of the Peace in 1976 and served two terms. In 1980, he was elected as a State Representative from District 11 and has served three terms with no opposition for his fourth term.

Dr. "Sunny" (Anita) Hinshaw has owned and operated the Southwest Pet Hospital in Springdale for ten years. Cathy is Executive Director of the Arkansas Local Police and Fire Retirement System in Little Rock. Ross and his wife, the former Darlene Bates, live in Keene, Texas where he is studying for the ministry. Their children are Waylon Kenneth, born August 1, 1977 and Carrie Dawn, born January 20, 1979. They were both born in Springdale Memorial Hospital.

Dawn received her degree in Journalism from the University of Arkansas. Jim Morriss of the Springdale News; and Roy Reed in the School of Journalism were strong influences in her life. She is now a reporter for the Columbia Record at Columbia, South Carolina.

Through the years, Betty has been active in PTA, Girl Scouts, First United Methodist Church, Springdale Hospital Auxilary, Washington County Extension Hmemakers Council, Shiloh Museum; and in Siloam Springs with the Sager Creek Arts Center.

The Hinshaw family traces back to Thomas Hinshaw who was born in County Tyrone, Ireland in 1690. His son, Jacob, born in 1710 migrated to North Carolina in 1741. After four generations there, Jerry's grandfather, Milton, who was born in 1855, migrated to Indiana after the Civil War. Jerry and his family have come back to the South after an absence of two generations.

Betty has a mixed ancestry of English, German and French. Her father, Edwin deNomy Brockmeyer, was a graduate in architecture from the University of Illinois and was a life-long general contractor in St. Louis. He married the former Mildred Pauls, who taught at Central Institute for the Deaf in the same city.

Albert Thomas Humble

The Humbles came out of Texas to Noel, Missouri and moved to Lowell, Arkansas. My grandfather, Albert Thomas (Tom) Humble (born January 2, 1848, died November 30, 1910) bought a strip of land east and south of Lowell for $6.50 an acre from W. T. Looney and wife Telitha on April 8, 1884. Tom Humble had a brother named Clarence Humble and a sister named Eliza Elisiana Humble. Their parents were J. R. Humble and wife, Lucy Davis. Tom and Clarence lived in the house with J. R. and Lucy. Both were single men. Clarence Humble took typhoid fever and died. He was born October 22, 1850 and died March 26, 1878. The father, J. R. Humble, didn't live long after Clarence's death and was buried in Goad Springs Cemetery without a marker.

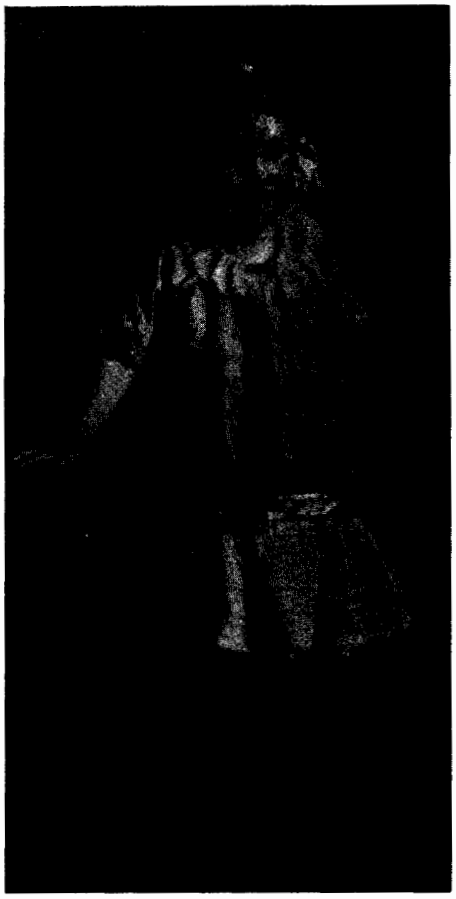
J. R. and Lucy Humble

Elmer Ross Graham and wife, Bessie Humble taken just before Alma was born.

On September 28, 1880, the St. Louis, Missouri, Arkansas and Texas Railway Company bought fifty feet of land off the west side of the farm, so that 46-1/2 acres were left. This was recorded by John Black, clerk and S. S. Graham, J. P. The railroad company paid $14.00 for the strip of land.

Tom Humble married Olive Branch, who was born April 18, 1858 and died December 20, 1887 in childbirth, leaving a baby girl named Bessie Humble. Tom Humble's mother, Lucy lived with Tom and helped him raise the baby. Bessie Humble married Elmer Ross Graham October 2, 1907. They had a son, Bernard T. Graham, born January 16, 1909 and died February 1, 1909. Later they had a daughter, born September 6, 1910, named Alma Lenora Graham. Bessie Humble died December 21, 1910 as a result of childbirth.

My father, Elmer Ross Graham's sister, Sarah Ellen Graham, and her husband, J. J. Graham, took me when I was two weeks old and raised me. They had seven sons and one daughter. The daughter, Irene, was three years older than I. So, I guess I was a very lucky girl for I had a Daddy and a Papa. I saw my daddy Ross very often, and he supported me. He married later but had no other children, and I never did live with him. I will always be thankful for all the good care and treatment I got. I felt like I paid for my raising for I lived with my mother (or aunt, the only mother I knew) until she passed away in August 1946.



Alma Farrar

Alma Lenora Graham married Eugene C. Farrar April 24, 1952. We lived on a farm in Lowell on Highway 264. The farm had belonged to my grandmother, Cynthia Winningham's folks. My husband's father, Claire Farrar, bought the farm and gave it to his son, Eugene while Eugene was in World War II. It just happened that I landed there on my grandparents' homestead.

My father, Elmer Ross Graham, was born September 19, 1884 and died July 17, 1952. My father was a farmer who grew apples, peaches, grapes, strawberries and cattle. When he died, I inherited the farm that was given to him from his father, Silas Marion Graham. On November 8, 1910, an affidavit was signed by C. M. Phillips that Alma Lenora Graham was the sole heir of the Tom Humble Farm. I sold the farm, 46-1/2 acres, to Odis Howard and wife on November 8, 1945.

After my husband Eugene passed away on December 26, 1969, I took care of his mother, Inez Farrar, and her sister, Maude Blake for five years. Inez Farrar had rent property, so I was pretty busy keeping up with everything. Maude Blake broke her leg twice in one year. Thank goodness for the hospital in Springdale

Tom Humble's sister, Eliza Humble married a Hopkins. They had a daughter, Eliza Elisiana Hopkins, and she married Walter Bequette. They moved to Lowell, Arkansas and raised a family: Eva, Charley, John, Essie, Hal and Carlton Bequette. Mrs. Bequette was the only living Humble that I ever knew. She said the only place she could take her family for Sunday dinner was to Uncle Tom's. On one special Sunday, Grandmother Lucy had the house all cleaned up and the beds were all fluffed up and the pillows had ruffles around them. Everybody in those days slept on feather beds and straw ticks. Anyway, little Bessie had to show off a little, so she ran and jumped in the middle of both beds so that the beds had to be fixed. I guess my mother was sort of spoiled. But they always had a good meal.

Grandfather Tom Humble rode a horse to church at Antioch, some place between Cave Springs and Rogers—a long way on a horse—in the year 1910, the year I was born.

Burtice Dayne Johnson

Burtice Dayne Johnson was born on the B. F. Johnson homestead farm on the Middle Fork of White River between Fayetteville and Elkins on June 29, 1902, he was one of the three children born to B. B. Johnson and Josie Lichlyter Johnson. When he was about four-years-old, the family moved to the Johnson Farm at Johnson to live with B. B.'s parents and help work the 320-acre farm. They cleared the land, planted grape vineyards and apple orchards, raised farm crops and feed for the livestock. Dayne and his brother and sister learned early to do their share of the many, many chores that were a part of farm life in the early 1900s. Always, there was plenty of work to do: cows to milk, hogs to feed, horses and mules to care for and chickens to feed. In the spring, they planted corn, wheat and oats to winter the animals and large fields of vegetables for family use; summer was harvest time — grain and hay were stored for the animals, potatoes, sweet potatoes, turnips and apples were stored in the wellhouse and vegetables canned and put in the cellar. In the fall, it was time to make apple butter and apple cider, kill hogs and a beef for winter. There were no freezers so the meat was hung to cure and part of it was canned for next summer's use. Wintertime was used for cutting wood, repairing fences, sharpening plow bits, repairing the harness, caring for the livestock, and of course - going to school. Life was never dull because of "nothing to do." When Dayne wasn't working, he found time to swim in the creek, go picnicing, horseback riding, sledding and ice skating, attended the community church, and even played in the local Stoney Point Band.

Burtice Dayne Johnson

At age 24, he married Mamie Wilson, whom he had met through a friend. Courtship was not easy, since Mamie lived at Baldwin which was some fifteen miles from Dayne's home at Johnson. Roads were bad and cars few, therefore fifteen miles was a 'long' journey. However, love prevailed and they were married on November 10, 1926. They moved in with Dayne's father and mother and grandparents - and dreamed of building themselves a home. However, the farm work load was heavy, and it was the spring of 1928 before they moved into a home of their own. By that time, their first child, Ina Mae had been born. The following year, Dayne and his father and brother decided to build a canning factory. They cut trees and sawed their own lumber in the sawmill they had purchased and then set out to build the factory. They talked with neighbors near and far and they agreed to raise large amounts of tomatoes and beans for the factory to can. Before dawn, during the coming summers, Dayne was up and on the road with the wagon and team to haul produce from the adjoining farms to be canned. He would then work all day in the cannery, learning all phases of the canning business. When the factory was not running, he was busy harvesting his own crops and getting ready for the coming winter. During the winter, he cut wood to sell while at the same time, he was clearing more land for farm use. During these years, another daughter, Doris Jean was born, followed by two sons, Charles and David Lee. The small two-bedroom house was getting too small, so in the fall of 1936, they purchased the adjoining "Bridgewater Farm" which had an older, bigger house. In October of that year, another son, Marion Leroy was born.

Larger factories, government regulations and two consecutive years of droughts hurt the factory business, so Dayne and his family decided to close the factory. Dayne tore down the canning factory and used the lumber from it to build 'frog-ponds'. There was a good spring branch running through the new farm they had bought, so they built ponds, fenced them in, and ordered twenty-four Louisiana Bullfrogs. It wasn't long until he and his small sons were shipping dressed frog legs to restaurants as far away as Chicago, Dallas and Atlanta. The frogs had to be caught after dark. Dayne would take a wet toe-sack, give the two older boys a flashlight apiece and they would go around the ponds locating the frogs they needed to catch. The boys would shine the flashlights in the frog's eyes, thus blinding them temporarily so they would not move, and Dayne would grab them and put them in the sack to be dressed and shipped the next morning. It soon became a full-time business, but after several years, it seemed their frog supply was dwindling faster than it should. By the time Dayne figured out the problem, it was too late. He had put minnows in the ponds for the frogs to eat. Some of the minnows were not eaten and they grew big enough to eat the 'tad-poles', which were the baby frogs. By this time, the chicken broiler business was getting a start in northwest Arkansas. So, Dayne decided to tear down the frog ponds and use the lumber to build him some chicken houses.

Mamie (Wilson) and Dayne Johnson

He built a total of eight houses, which had a growing capacity of five-hundred broilers each. He used hand feeders, had to haul water for the water fountains and used wood heaters made from big iron barrels for heat. At this time, he also bought some milkcows and started selling cream. The milk was poured into a 'diluter'. The cream rose to the top and was sold to the creamery in Fayetteville. He then purchased hogs to feed the milk to. The farm was beginning to grow up with underbrush since it was no longer being used for farming. Dayne's next step was to buy goats to clear off the land again so it could be seeded for pasture. A few years later, about the time things seemed to be going good, another change was necessary. Big broiler growers began raising chickens much cheaper due to volume and mechanized equipment, so the small chicken growers began to lose money. Meanwhile, two more daughters had been born, and the chickens, cows and pigs were just not bringing in enough income to care for seven children Dayne was offered a job at Forrest Park Canning Company firing the boiler. He took the job, but it meant he had to be at work early each morning, leaving the milking and hog feeding for the children. When school started, it was just too much of a problem, so he sold the milk cows and the hogs and bought beef cattle. He continued to work at the factory, gradually increasing his beef cattle herd. The children all married and settled down nearby. He retired at the age of 62, and enjoyed just looking after the cattle.

His favorite sport was 'wrestling'. He never missed a match that was on TV and if he could get someone to go with him, he took in all the live matches that were close by. He suffered a heart-attack at a wrestling match in Springdale and died at the Rodeo Community Center on July 6, 1979 and was buried at the Stuckey Cemetery near the Johnson Farm where he had lived all his life. This is a small accounting of the life of Dayne Johnson; however, it does not tell all the little things that endeared him to his family and friends. The raising of seven children was in itself a full-time job. When the children were small, there was no TV to entertain them and Dayne spent his evenings teaching the children to play Checkers, Dominoes, Old Maid and Rook. They learned early the art of winning and losing. In the summer, he taught them to play croquet, pitch horseshoes and spent hours repairing bicycles. He even bought them a Shetland pony. He built a cart and made a harness for the pony so the pony could pull the cart and everyone could ride. Now this pony took notions to balk, so one of the boys got the bright idea that if you built a fire under the pony, he would get going. Well, he did. He moved just far enough to get the cart over the fire, and that took care of the cart. Dayne spent a lot of time building 'homes' for all the animals that somehow managed to find a home with them. He built a cage for three small cottontail rabbits left homeless because one of the dogs ate the 'mama' rabbit. There were pet squirrels, the usual dogs and cats, and even a pet fox that made his home with the Johnsons for many years. The children were all taught to work together and play together. They were taught right from wrong and they knew that in church, just a raised eyebrow meant straighten up and stop talking or else. His patience was tested many times by the usual 'wrongs' that boys do while growing up. One time he had five gallons of red paint sitting in the garage that he had bought to paint the barn. While he was at work, the paint was 'discovered' and opened and a red stripe was painted around the pickup truck, around the trees in the yard and even a stripe went all around the garage wall. Needless to say, there were some 'stripes' made elsewhere when Dayne got home from work.

When you look back over the years, you wonder how he found the time and the energy to do all the things he did. He drove a school bus for several years, he loved to go to cattle sales, he always went to Springdale on Saturday nights to get groceries and 'visit' with the merchants. All in all, you must say that Dayne Johnson lived a full life — and left behind him his legacy — seven children who can look back and laugh at all the bad times as well as the good and remember him with love and affection. That in itself is an accomplishment.

Charles B. Johnson was born August 10, 1931. He married Mary Sue Simpson June 14. They had six sons and six grandchildren. He liked camping out and worked for the northwest Arkansas Mall for several years until his death on January 20, 1987. Charles was the first child of Dayne and Mamie to pass away. The other 6 live near the old home place.

Luther Edward Johnson

Luther Edward Johnson was born November 22, 1894, in Neosho, Missouri, the only child of Reverend Alfred Brown Johnson and Basheba Belle (Hudson) Johnson. Luther's father was 18 years older than his mother. Reverend Johnson was descended from Edmund Johnson, who came to Virginia in 1639 from Scotland. The early Johnsons came to Carroll County, Arkansas, by way of Tennessee. Luther's mother, Basheba "Bash", was the daughter of Joseph and Mary Margaret (Larue) Hudson. Joseph was the grandson of Edward Hudson, a Revolutionary War soldier who had come to Arkansas in 1817.

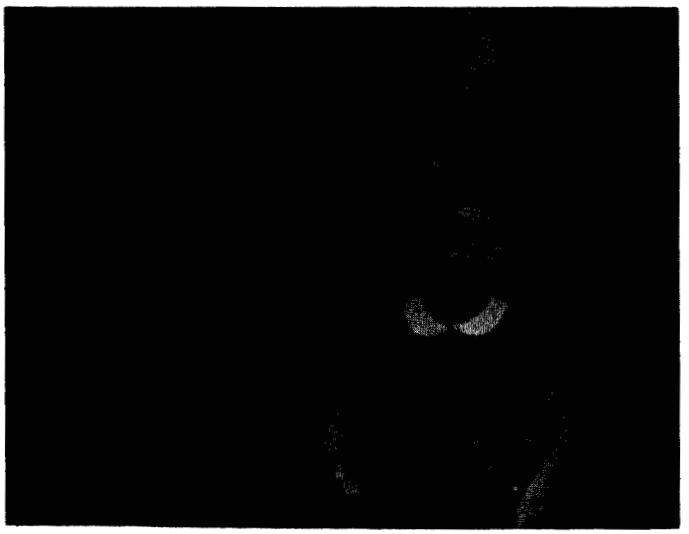
Because of Reverend Johnson's assignments as a Presbyterian minister, the family moved often. During Luther's early years, the family lived in towns in Missouri, Arkansas, Kansas, Texas and Oklahoma. By the time Luther entered Kendall Academy (now the University of Tulsa) at the age of 15, he had attended five different schools. After completing high school there, he stayed on for his freshman year of college.

The life of a minister's son was not an easy one. Luther could not make lasting friendships due to his lack of a permanent home and of course he had the usual problems of being a "preacher's kid". Because of these factors and his father's formal and austere personality, Luther of necessity developed a strong sense of self-reliance.

Mrs. A. B. Johnson, Basheba "Bash" Belle Hudson Johnson in 1941.



Martha Belle Johnson, Freda Bird Johnson, Luther Edward Johnson, Mary Margaret Johnson and Robert "Bobby" Johnson in 1943.

In 1915 Luther entered Maryville College, Tennessee, but in 1917 he joined the United States Army Field Artillery. He was made corporal and entered Officers' training at Camp Zachary Taylor in Kentucky. He was discharged at the close of the war and enrolled at Maryville College graduating in June 1919.

Luther found employment with the Cotton Compress in Chickasha, Oklahoma, but his parents moved to Springdale the next year. While visiting them, Luther was introduced to Freda Elva Bird, a piano teacher. Her parents were William Riley and Martha Jane (Linebarger) Bird. Both 28 years old, Luther and Freda were married on June 15, 1922, with Luther's father officiating. The couple returned to Chickasha, laden with food to get them off to a good start. Within a few months, however, they returned to assist on the farm that Reverend Johnson had purchased.

Growing fruit in their small orchard proved to be an undependable source of income. By 1923 they began raising hens and broilers, their first chicken house being a piano box made into two stories. They borrowed money to purchase a small incubator. They also owned several cows and sold butter and cream. On January 1, 1923 their family record book shows a net worth of $648.29; this increased to $837.90 in 1924.

During these years the Johnsons added a vineyard, a strawberry patch, and a field of tomatoes to supply their small cannery, by 1928 they were getting serious about the chicken business, which occupied a small frame building behind their home. Freda worked beside Luther in all of these endeavors.

Their first child, Luther Edward, Jr., was born in February 1924, but died April of that year. Their second child was Martha Belle, born on November 25, 1925. On November 21, 1928, their last child, William Alfred, was born but lived only to the age of six.

The Johnsons increased their production of chickens, and by 1930 Luther went into the feed business in Springdale with J. H. McKinney. The family moved to Springdale to live in the old Bird place with Freda's mother. Luther continued his interest in the poultry business, even installing incubators in the dining room of his mother-in-law's house.

In 1933 the family returned to the farm southwest of town. Luther built a 40' x 14' concrete hatchery building to house a 6,000 egg capacity incubator. Believing that the 12' x 12' brooder houses were inefficient, he built his first long 130' x 20' chicken house, and poultry men came from all over to see the new set up.

Luther and his cousin Joe Steele formed a partnership in 1935. Joe at the time owned a small cannery in the Steele Community and another in Springdale. They opened the Johnson and Steele Hatchery and Feeds at the corner of Graham and East Johnson Streets with the latest in feed mixing equipment and a 20,000 capacity incubator. This location gave them easy access to the railroad. The 1930s proved to be a wonderful period of financial growth for the family. However, it was also a period marked by family tragedy. During these years the deaths of their son Billy, Freda's sister Eula, her mother and Luther's father occurred.

In 1935 Luther and Freda purchased a home at 723 Deaver Street in Springdale and moved to town. They had always wanted more children, so they contacted the Rosalie Tillis Home in Fort Smith. In 1938 they adopted a little boy named Robert Riley (originally named Frank Bassett) and his sister, Mary Margaret (originally Mary Margaret Bassett).

A little later the Johnsons bought the old two-story Chapman home at 609 Maple Street, the present site of the Springdale Memorial Hospital. The house was completely renovated and modernized. Luther had room for his hunting dogs and for his horses on the back of the lot, which extended to Quandt Street. He was a member of the Springdale Riding Club and was on the Rodeo of the Ozarks Board of Directors. Margaret was selected as Rodeo Queen during her senior year.

Freda enjoyed gardening and had both flower and vegetable gardens. Luther was responsible for bringing a number of large blue spruce from Colorado to Arkansas and spacing them around the large front yard. Several of them are still living on the hospital grounds.

The business interests of the partnership prospered. In 1937 Johnson and Steele bought the Springdale Canning Company, opened a large hatchery at Centertown, and purchased the Stubblefield Hatchery (renamed the Boone County Hatchery) at Harrison. A little later they opened the Elm Springs Hatchery and Feeds. Luther managed all the poultry interests while Joe managed the growing canning interests.

Luther saw the importance of proper nutrition to accelerate the weight gain of his poultry. After completing a course in poultry nutrition he returned to build a 36,000 square foot warehouse and feed mill.

The canning business prospered too, and in 1937 the Springdale Canning Company and the Steele Canning Company shipped their first train-load of canned goods. . .28 car loads. By 1943—44 a full 70% of their production went to the armed forces. At one time the company owned or leased 16 canning plants in Texas, Oklahoma and Arkansas. Earlier the partnership had acquired the Lion Oil Company Franchise and built a large sandstone filling station with a garage on the corner of Emma Avenue and Highway 71 to service their large fleet of company trucks. They also opened a Nash Automobile Dealership.

Luther and Joe Steele along with Shelby Ford (then president of the First State Bank) purchased controlling interest in that bank. Luther and Joe served on the Board of Directors until deaths.

Not every venture they entered proved to be profitable. Some of these were; an effort to make dog food using the grains used for poultry feeds, an attempt to bottle grape juice, the purchase of property in Eureka Springs, and an attempt to establish a poultry laboratory.

Luther's business life was busy, but he found time for service to the community. He was a Springdale Chamber of Commerce Board Member and President, President of the Springdale School Board for four years, founding member of the Springdale Memorial Hospital Board, Springdale City Council member for eight years, President of the Springdale Country Club, member of the Rotary Club, congregation President, Treasurer, and Sunday School Superintendent of the Salem Lutheran Church, and involved in the establishment of the Springdale Airport.

He was the leader in the introduction of innovative ideas for raising poultry. He was one of the nine area poultry men who backed the Chicken of Tomorrow Contest held at the University of Arkansas in 1949—50. He was instrumental in introducing a new method of financing poultry production by means of loans based on a chattel mortgage on the flocks. Luther and Joe each maintained other business interests outside their partnership. In the 1940s Luther founded L. E. Johnson Company and over a period of time purchased 10 farms south and west of Springdale most of which are in the city of Springdale now.

By the mid 1950s Luther was growing approximately 200,000 broilers and 16,000 hens on his own farms as well as providing feed and baby chickens to other poultry growers.

His agricultural interests extended beyond poultry. He had a herd of registered polled Hereford cattle, registered Hampshire sheep and hogs, and improved his pasture land with chicken litter. He was a man who enjoyed hunting and fishing and being with his family, getting away often to a lake home which he personally designed on Grand Lake, Oklahoma.

Luther's health began to fail and in 1955 he suffered a light stroke and began resigning from many of the boards and committees with which he was involved. In January 1956 he suffered a serious head injury which left him in a coma for the next eight months. He passed away October 9, 1956. His poultry interests including his home farm were purchased by John Tyson (a portion of that farm was later donated by the Tyson family to the City of Springdale for the Randall Tyson Sports Complex. A portion of one of the poultry farms on Johnson Road and Oaklawn is now the site of Tyson's General offices). Joe Steele purchased Luther's half of their partnership. Freda remained in the house on Maple Street for another five years and died December 26, 1961 at the age of 67. Her mother-in-law Reverend Johnson's widow died two weeks before on December 11, 1961 at the age of 86.

Their oldest daughter Martha Belle who married C. Bennett Brogdon in 1946 had one daughter, Sandra Lee. Their daughter Margaret married Reverend James Luecke and had seven children. Their only son Robert Johnson, who was unmarried, settled in California.

They were married by the Reverend Jesse Glass at the home of Denton Plumlee in Tennessee. All of their children were born in Jackson County, Tennessee.

John H. Kirk had plans to go to Texas, but stopped in Arkansas, at Summers, and looked around. He camped on the creek for several days and liked the place, and the family liked the place, too. Some of the family were sick, so they stopped. He traded his wagon and team for a farm at Summers.

His father was George M. Kirk, born about 1812. He married Rachel Wilson about 1831. She was born in 1813. These were Clara Snodgrass Risley's great-great-grandparents. Their children were: Marian Kirk (born 1832); John H. Kirk (born January 6, 1834; died January 26, 1900) married Nancy Jane Plumlee (born July 23, 1838; March 26, 1917) on September 1, 1859; Margaret Kirk (born 1836); Pharaby Kirk (born 1839); George M. Denton Plumlee, born in Tennessee in 1803, was Nancy Kirk's father. He died in 1874. Denton was Clara's great-great-grandfather. In 1822 he married Nancy Jane Johnson (born 1806 in Tennessee; died 1885). Their children were: William Plumlee (born May 21, 1824; died June 27, 1904) married Lavona Kendall (born October 16, 1824; died November 19, 1893); Samuel (Black Sam) Plumlee (born 1825); George H. Sidney Lambeth

Sidney and Estelle Lambeth moved to Elkins, Arkansas in the early 1950s and remained there for the duration of their lives. They chose to settle there because their son and his family and some other relatives and friends lived in the area. Although their time as Washington County residents was somewhat brief, they were soon considered to be very prominent and respected community members.

September 10, 1917; Sid and Estelle Lambeth.

Robert Sidney was born April 3, 1891 in Pea Ridge. He was the son of Henry Thomas and Dora Bell Woods Lambeth. Tom was a local druggist at Pea Ridge. His ancestors were British immigrants. Sid had five sisters and two brothers. He grew up and attended school in the Benton County town, and graduated from the Pea Ridge Masonic College in 1911. He then taught school and helped operate his father's drug store. In November of 1912 he married his sweetheart, Rachel Estelle Wallis. They were both twenty one years old. Estelle was the daughter of Elmer Alanzo and Margaret K. Jones Wallis. She was of Irish/Indian descent. Born December 1, 1890, Estelle was the second child of six. She had two sisters and three brothers. The family moved to Arkansas when she was a little girl and she attended school in Pea Ridge. And, as fate would have it, she met Sidney. After they were married he continued to teach and work in the drug store while she stayed home and became a perfectionest at the "domestic arts".

Debi Lambeth, 1988.

Sidney and Estelle, both being from large families, wanted to have children. But Estelle was rather frail and physically weak, and her first two pregnancies resulted in miscarriage, one of which was twins. She suffered terribly and the anguish contributed to further deterioration of her health. But her agony seemed to re-enforce her ever positive outlook and undying determination, and on September 30, 1914, she gave birth to a baby boy. They named him Mark Wallis. It was a painfully difficult labor, and along with advice from her doctor, Estelle could clearly see that Mark (as he was called) would be her only child.

Sidney grew tired of teaching school, and after deciding to pursue a career as a full time pharmacist, they moved to Depew, Oklahoma. There he worked in a local drug store as a clerk/druggist. The year was 1917. The next seventeen years was a bit unsettled. They lived in at least five different towns. Some in Oklahoma, some in Missouri, and one in Arkansas. The longest amount of time spent in one place was in Sapulpa, Okalhoma. They lived there for fourteen years. Mark went to school and graduated from Sapulpa High, home of the "The Chieftains". Sid owned and operated a pharmacy there. In 1934 he got another case of the "fidgets" and the family moved to Lovell. They lived there for four years. Then they moved to Blackwell where they lived for one year. Next they settled in Marshall. Sid bought a drug store there and he and Estelle were quite happy in the once prospering Oklahoma town. Mark had joined the Army in 1942 where he became a medic and a surgical technician. He served for four years and separated January 6, 1946 with an honorable discharge. Four months later he married Bonnie Jean Pool, a native of northwest Arkansas. They moved to Marshall and lived with Sid and Estelle. They helped operate the drug store for awhile, but Bonnie Jean became homesick and she and Mark left Marshall and returned to Arkansas. Eventually, Sid decided that it was time to move on and he and Estelle relocated in Coyle in 1947. He then purchased the Coyle Drug Store and continued to maintain a successful business for four years. Finally, in 1951 he and Estelle moved to Arkansas. This time they made their home in Sulphur Springs where again, Sid owned and operated a pharmacy. They lived there for two years.

They were now in their early sixties and the concept of retirement began to appeal to both of them. Their life, so far, had been fast paced and rather unstable with Sid's restless desires to move about. And at last the idea of settling down and being close to their family was extremely tempting. Also, Bonnie Jean had given birth to a daughter on Christmas day in 1952.

She and Mark named her Deborah Louise. Estelle was particularly excited about becoming a grandmother and was anxious to experience her new role. So, in 1953, she and Sid sold the pharmacy and moved to Elkins where Mark and his family lived. They bought a beautiful native rock house with a chicken house out back. Sid raised chickens for about a year but quickly lost interest. He was a driving individual with a strong sense of management and he missed the excitement of owning his own business. And Estelle, being a loyal and supportive wife, agreed to do whatever it took to make her husband happy. They decided to trade their home for Mark's smaller house, which was located nearby. They would keep it for a retirement home, but chose to move to Gravette where they rented a house and bought the drug store there. They remained there for aproximately three years. Estelle's health began to fail her more and more. She had suffered from typhoid fever when she was very young and almost died. But her "inner strength" and love for life had pulled her through. However, the fever had left her very weak and susceptible to other illnesses. Realizing that the stress of their busy lifestyle was beginning to wear on both of them, and after receiving a generous offer for the drug store, Sid decided to sell out and return to his Washington County retreat. For the next few years he did relief work for some of the area drug stores. He filled in for people on vacation and worked part time at the Quaker Drug Store in Fayetteville and one in Eureka Springs for awhile.

Later he worked at Reason's Drugs in Siloam Springs three days a week. He and Estelle rented a room at the Crown Hotel there because commuting from Elkins would be tiring and impractical. On Sid's days off, they would return to their house. Sid was now beginning to adapt to a slower pace. He enjoyed working on home projects and being outdoors. Although the house was small, it sat on a large lot that consisted of some wooded land, which he transformed into a small wilderness area. It was a beautiful "park like" back yard with trails leading to a pond which he had stocked with a variety of fish. He planted fruit trees and raised a fine garden. Estelle was a creative lady with exquisite taste and a refined flair for decorating. Their home's interior was immaculate. She had collected rare antiques and fine china through the years. Among them was a collection of demitasse cups and saucers, originating from several foreign countries. She was very gifted and had a deep appreciation for music and possessed many instruments. One of which was a hand carved, legged dulcimer that her father, a carpenter, had built for her. It was a most unique looking instrument and she played it fluently. She and Sid were very proud of their home and loved to entertain family friends. They were especially fond of spending time with their only grandchild, Debbie Lou. They lived there until 1962 when Estelle passed away on February 17, after suffering from a stroke. After her death, Sid quickly lost interest in his home and built another house next to Mark and Bonnie Jean. Still he was lonely and dissatisfied and started seeing and old friend from Siloam Springs.

Her name was Elizabeth (Betty) Mayes Snapp. She was the daughter of W. P. and Anna H. Mayes. She was born on Cow Skin Prairie (Oklahoma) in 1886. Her father was interpreter in the Cherokee Courts at Tahlequah and was a brother to Chief Sam Mayes and Joel B. Mayes, two highly respected community leaders. Betty was the well traveled widow of the late Taylor Snapp. Sid and Betty were married and lived together for the next few years, until Betty passed away of complications from suffering a broken hip. Sid, still unable to adjust to being alone, married a third time to Juanita Walker, another old friend from Siloam. They had a happy but brief marriage. On October 16, 1972, Sid passed away after having throat surgery. He was eighty one. Sidney and Estelle's life together was an adventure, sometimes a challenge, and a love story with a happy ending. They were both ambitious indivduals sharing many goals. Together they succeeded in achieving the things that they wanted. They also made many contributions to their family, their friends and their community. Besides his services as a professional businessman, Sid was noted for his loyal support to his community and to various organizations. He was a Royal Arch Mason and an active church member. He was also known for his natural ability to make friends. Indeed he had many friends and unusual aquaintences such as Pretty Boy Floyd and other notorious "outlaws" that frequented the local drug store soda fountains of Missouri and Oklahoma. However these relationships were primarily superficial and his closer ties were of a more professional nature. Sid had another side also. He was an avid "outdoorsman" and a hunting or fishing trip was always a priority on his leisure agenda. Estelle was also known for her active interest in social and community matters. She was a true civic leader and participated in many charitable projects. She was Past Matron of the Eastern Star and was involved in numerous other organizations and church activities. Always bearing a radiant smile, she seemed to have the kind word for everyone.

She always had time for a game of bridge with her closest lady friends or a cheerful afternoon with her family. Sidney and Estelle are buried side by side in the Pea Ridge cemetery.

Mark and his family still live in Washington County. He was a farmer and worked for the U. S. Postal Service until he retired about ten years ago. He and Bonnie Jean are still citizens of Elkins. They bowl regularly and are active church members. Debi lives in Fayetteville and is employed in Springdale. Her hobbies include hiking and canoeing, photography, pottery and other arts and crafts, and writing short stories about her family history. She collects antiques and is an animal and nature lover.

James Little

James Little's father was John Little. He was born in Carolina. John Little was Clara Risley's great, great, great-grandfather.

Samuel Rector Little and first wife Judy Ann (Robertson) second wife Nancy Elizabeth (Dunlap) made in 1900. He had thirteen children. Top row from left: Myrtle Mary, Nancy Angaline, Dora May, Hillis, Mattie Ellen, Katherine Lee. Front row from left: Hugh Effie, Claude Ewing, Father Samuel Rector, in mother's lap is Elmer Creed, Samuel, (mother Nancy Elizabeth (Dunlap) second wife). Samuel Rector first wife Judy Ann (Robertson) Little, children; Ambrose H, (Jim) James Rector, Mary Elizabeth is not in the picture. December 1901.

James Little was born in Georgia, 1801, died September 22, 1844, according to daughter Melinda Catherain—found her story in the Goodspeed 1889 history. Probate court records say he died in 1845—it could be wrong (they had court in October 20, 1845—they had it in the wrong year).

James Little was married in 1821 to Nancy Gentry, who was born in 1802 in Nashville, Tennessee. Nancy Gentry's father (Clara Risley's great-great-grandfather) was Samuel Gentry, and he had a brother named William. She came to Clark County, Arkansas, with her parents. James Little, as a young man, also came to Clark County, where he met and married Nancy. Nancy died December 12, 1840, and was buried on their place now known as the Ross Little farm near Summers, Arkansas, in Washington County.

After their marriage James and Nancy moved to Summers, Arkansas, and engaged in farming, apple orchards, and raising stock. They had eight children: 1. John D. (born circa 1823; died

According to a family story from descendants of Lucretia and Rufus Hamilton, Tristham was shot by an Indian friend named Lone Star (during the Civil War?). The Indian rode out to tell Martha that he had shot Tristham, then rode away.

Martha married second, Reuben S. Hamilton (born February 10, 1817; died March 14, 1872) on March 17, 1864. 3. Melinda Catherain (born October 10, 1827; died March 2, 1896) married first, Alex A. Steward, 1848; then second, Luther N. Hollis (born June 23, 1827, died October 1, 1877) in 1854. 4. James A. Little, Jr. (born 1829; died unknown), no children. 5. William G. (born 1832, died January 1853), no children. 6. Nancy Angaline (born 1834; died circa 1861 or 1862) married Nestor Forte (born 1823 in Missouri; died 1865 or 1866) on July 1, 1851. He supposedly died of a broken heart, grieving over the death of his wife. 7. Samuel Rector (born February 25, 1836; died June 19, 1908) married (1) Judy Ann Robertson (born 1832; died May 24, 1868) on February 8, 1859. (2) Nancy Elizabeth Dunlap (born February 11, 1855; died June 3, 1936) on April 3, 1873. 8. Joseph Callaway (born January 1840; died November 29, 1840). Buried on the Ross Little place.

After Nancy's death James then married (1842) Elizabeth Franklin (born December 27, 1824; died March 14, 1890). They had two sons, 1. Ewen Marion Little (born June 5, 1843; died January 12, 1903 married Sarah E. Beatty (born December 3, 1847; died September 6, 1934) on June 18, 1869. 2. Ambrose Hunley Sevier Little (born April) 22, 1845; died March 3, 1919) married Sarah Jane Graham (born December 2, 1839; died May 5, 1917) on June 10, 1866.

Elizabeth (Franklin) Little was the daughter of John Franklin, who at the time lived in Madison County, Arkansas. John Franklin (born circa 1780 in North Carolina) lived to be 90 years old. He married (1) Polly Jarvis (born between 1800-1805). By then 1820 John had gone to White County, Tennessee.

In 1828 James Little was one of the first settlers to settle in Price Township, Washington County, Arkansas. He was a Primitive Baptist and a Democrat. He took out a homestead in May 25, 1836.

James and the men of the community would haul their apples to other areas to sell. On one such trip James became ill and died. He was buried by the roadside by his negro slaves who were with him at the time. The place of his burial is unknown.

After James Little's death his widow Elizabeth Franklin Little remarried, to Prillyn Francis Asburn Babb on December 15, 1850. They had two sons. When Asburn Babb went to Texas, Elizabeth changed her sons' name back to Little: De Wite Little (born January 12, 1854; died September 23, 1919).

De Wite Little married (October 14, 1875) Eddie Oleva Fortner. De Wite Little married again (January 14, 1911) to Ida Lewis (born 1865). Prillyn Francis Asburn Babb was the brother of Tristham E. Babb. They came here together. Tristham E. Babb married Martha Caroline Little.

Great-grandfather Samuel Rector Little was born February 25, 1836, in Tennessee, died June 19, 1908. Married February 8, 1859 to Judy Ann Robertson. She was born 1832 in White County, Tennessee, died May 24, 1868. Their children: Ambrose H., Mary Elizabeth and James Rector.

After the death of his first wife, Samuel Rector and his son Ambrose H. Little (born December 18, 1859; died June 10, 1909) moved to Oregon leaving his daughter Mary Elizabeth Little (born June 15, 1866; died February 2, 1928) and son James Rector (born May 4, 1868; died March 3, 1938). Mary Elizabeth Little went and lived with Elizabeth Elms. She was Judy Ann Little's sister. James Little went and lived with step-grandmother Elizabeth Little after his mother died.

Rector and Ambrose left with a group from Summers, Arkansas, for Oregon on a wagon train. They joined a group at Coffeyville, Kansas. The trip was very long, hard, and dangerous. They each took enough food to last six months. By leaving in the spring after the grass started growing the livestock would survive.

They would always drive the wagons in a circle at night with the tongues of the wagons toward the middle, and post their guards, appointed by the wagon master, as the Indians were always trying to steal their animals.

Mary Elizabeth Little (born June 15, 1866; died February 2, 1928) married Laten Jackson Hall (born January 4, 1841; died June 15, 1928) on February 1, 1885. James Rector (Jim) Little (born May 4, 1868; died March 3, 1938) married Annie Molley Messer (born August 20, 1870; died October 26, 1935) on August 19, 1891.

Ambrose H. Little (born December 18, 1859; died June 10, 1909) married Geneva Kirk (born December 4, 1861; died March 21, 1904) on November 24, 1881.

Samuel Rector Little married his second wife April 3, 1873, Nancy Elizabeth Dunlap Little, born February 11, 1855; died June 3, 1936. She was born near Houston, Texas. When she was 10 years old she came with her father, mother and brothers, and moved to northwest Arkansas in a covered wagon. She was buried at Ganderville Cemetery at Summers, Arkansas. Their children were: 1. Hugh Effie Little (born January 29, 1874; died January 14, 1941). Married Dora Douthit (born January 9, 1879; died December 4, 1972) on February 11, 1898. 2. Ambrose bought 120 acres and homesteaded 40 acres, September 15, 1890. It had a log home on it. He hired Carrol Moore to help him add on to the original log house. He paid him one large grey mule as his salary. This was built from the timber on the farm with 4 x 4 framing; all the material was planed including the ceiling, walls and floor. It was two-story with a hall in the center. They sold eggs to buy the nails and windows. Ambrose told people that he had a nickel when he started the home, and still had the nickel when he finished the home. He was a prosperous farmer with a large apple orchard. He sold cider for vinegar and hauled his apples to the Kirk dryer.

The children of Ambrose H. Little and his wife Geneva Kirk Little were: 1. Clell Albert Little (born March 19, 1884; died August 16, 1940), Salem Springs (Washington County), Arkansas. Married Lottie Virginia Morre (born March 9, 1887; died August 15, 1961) of Kansas on May 17, 1922.

2. John Carl Little (born November 25, 1885; died March 2, 1963), Salem Springs (Washington County), Arkansas. Married Elizabeth Finley (born April 22, 1888; died August 14, 1966) of Alford, Texas on November 14, 1917.

Ambrose H. Little remarried March 26, 1905, to Maggie Longwith (born December 21, 1868; died March 10, 1964). They had three sons: 1. Emit Lelon Little (born June 24, 1906; died January 14, 1988) married Opal Okin (born June 10, 1916; died May 28, 1986) on November 30, 1940.

2. Clarence B. Little (born August 31, 1907; died November 28, 1925). Buried at Ganderville at Summers, Arkansas.

3. Lafayette Little (born September 14, 1909). Married Mary Nealie Haywood (born January 28, 1902; died August 19, 1980) on September 30, 1959.

Ambrose H.'s barn burned in August 1906. Mary Etta saw the barn on fire and told her father, who ran out to open the doors and remove the livestock; one mule was destroyed. They rebuilt the barn with material from an old store building in Salem Springs. The price was two cows. He and his sons, Clell, John and William tore down the store building and hauled the lumber to their farm.

In June of 1909 Ambrose died from a heart attack. His son Emit Lelon who was three years old saw the wagon bring the casket to their home, and then take his father away to be buried.

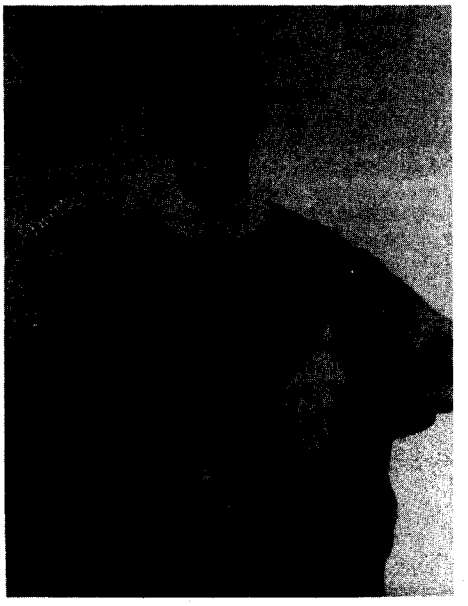
Mary Etta (Little) Snodgrass' grandparents were Rector Little, father of Ambrose Little. Ambrose Little's mother, Judy Ann Robertson Little, was Spanish and Portugese. Her mother's family came from Portugal. Judy Ann's mother was called "an old Spanish doctor". When the family was sick, she would doctor them—and close neighbors, too. They came here to Summers, Arkansas, from Spartan, Tennessee. Judy Ann's mother came here with Jones Elms. Elizabeth married Jones Elms on January 16, 1851. They came here about 1852. Judy Ann had a brother named Roysden Robertson. Her mother was buried at Beaty Cemetery in the middle of the graveyard—she doesn't have a tombstone. Judy Ann's father was buried at Spartan, Tennessee.

Clara Snodgrass Risley's great-great-grandfather James Little's father was John Little. They lived in Clark County - don't know John Little's wife's name. Some people say she came with James to Summers, Arkansas, and was buried on the Ross Little place.

Clara Snodgrass Risley's great-great-grandmother was Nancy Gentry Little. Her father was Samuel Gentry. Samuel came from Clark County, Tennessee, near Nashville. Samuel and his wife were buried in Clark County, Arkansas- don't know his wife's name.

From records found at Little Rock, Arkansas: Samuel Gentry had a brother named William Gentry who lived in Clark County. John Little and Samuel Gentry lived in the same township. William Gentry was in Little Missouri Township.

Hiram Little (born in 1822) and wife Sarah (Cape) Little (born 1826) were married 1848—he was second cousin to James Little. Harmon Little (born May 31, 1796; died September 24, 1852) was Hiram's father. Harmon was married March 7, 1816, to Mary Polly Simpson (born May 31, 1796; died April 24, 1879) of North Carolina. James Little was Harmon's father and his mother was Anna Duff. Harmon Little was Hiram's father. James and Harmon were first cousins (sic). Hiram came to Arkansas and bought land on October 24, 1872. He left Arkansas—don't know where he went. He left Sugar Hill, Arkansas; he could have bought somewhere else around here. Hiram visited Rector Little, so he lived close somewhere to Rector and Ewen Marion Little and A. H. Ambrose Hunley Sevier Little.



Elizabeth (Franklin) Little, second wife of James Little.

We started a reunion July 27, 1975 for the James Little descendants. It was located in Lincoln, Arkansas, Washington County, at the V. F. W. Hall at the southwest corner of the Square. The reunion will be held the last Sunday of each July, with a pot-luck dinner.

Clara Risley made a book on the Little family, covering 1801 to 1978. She has additional information in the book. She can't place all of the family history in the Washington County History Book. Clara's great-great-grandfather was James Little, who lived at Summers, Arkansas, but others had information on him in Clark County, Arkansas, including information on Cyrus Little and his wife, Elizabeth, on the Clark County, Arkansas Tax list in 1818. We don't know anything about Cyrus Little, however, I found some information about him in the tax records at Little Rock, Arkansas. I found some of the land records on James Little and Cyrus Little in the archives at Little Rock, Arkansas in the same township. James Little's father, John Little, had land in the same township. James had land at Clark County, Arkansas in about 1820.

James came from Clark County to Summers, Arkansas in 1828. He homesteaded land at Summers on May 25, 1836, and again on September 22, 1838. According to the homestead records, he had a son named John, who homesteaded land, also, about March 10, 1843, and on April 5, 1839.

James could have a brother named John Little who came and visited the family. The family says that he had a brother, but we don't know whether this is true.

Clara Risley has information on James Little's children, some of whom died in their 20's. We do not know exactly where they were buried, but some were buried at Summers, Arkansas, and some were buried on James Little's place on the family farm. James and Millie Arlene Holt own the place now. James Little's great-great-granddaughter owns the place now.

James Lynch

Our history books historically are filled with individuals who obtain recognition due to specific careers. Political positions in the national, state, county or city levels guarantees that your name will be in at least one history book. A specific career choice will merit a county or local level of historical recognition. The achievements of merchants, lawyers, judges, mayors and ministers are usually preserved for posterity. The bulk of the people who create the demands served by these individuals are obscured with time and not given recognition for their contributions to society. In this article it will not be possible to list the varied occupations and accomplishments of James and Deborah Lynch's descendants, but their names should suffice. I believe that each family member in any family lineage contributes to a community in which he lives; for it is the whole who create the services and sustains the prominent few.

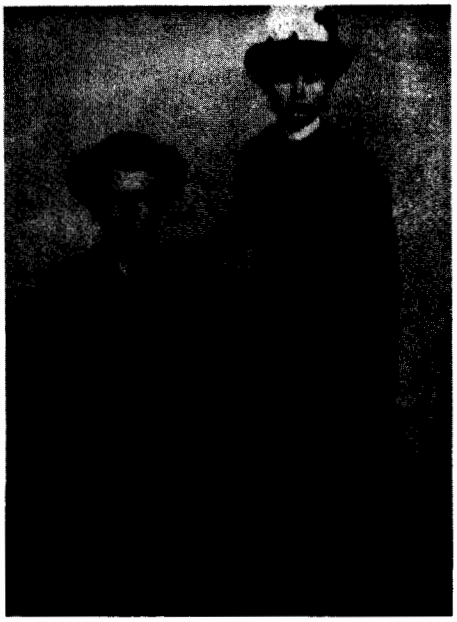
Martin Alonzo Lynch and wife, Nancy (Graham) Lynch. Copied from a tintype made circa 1860s.



James Franklin and Belle Dora (Holcomb) Lynch

The little village of Shiloh had many more first settlers than the few families which have been recorded. The Fitzgeralds, Quintons, Fines and Holcombs are the most noted families who filed on the lands. Various abstracts of our Springdale lands indicate it was platted before the Holcombs filed what is historically known as the first plat of 1868. Main Street was originally Seymore Street, named probably for Robert Seymore; an 1850 brick mason. His two wives, Nancy and Elizabeth; were the daughters of James Wilson Ingram, Sr. Center Street was originally Lee Street, named by or for Elijah Lee; one of the first members of Shiloh Church. Cross research of assorted documents will verify that names of some of the first recorded land owners were not the first settlers nor the original owners of the lands.

James Lynch born circa 1780-86 died sometime after 1843 and by 1850 census. He served as a jurist in 1843 and in October 1838 he was paid $12.00 for guarding our county jail, thus we assume he was considered a trustworthy individual. James is never shown as owning the land known as Lynch's Prairie in Shiloh. This land includes the present Springdale airport and contingent lands to the east and possibly some of the lands to the west. David Ware, Benjamin Hodge, Soloman Sherrod, John and Joseph Holcomb are shown as the first owners; with filing claim dates of 1843, 1848, 1852 and 1853 respectively.

The name, "Lynch's Prairie" has been preserved in Springdale history due to an early day post office which was located on the land that James and Deborah Lynch had homesteaded. As with all historical names; Lynch's Prairie acknowledges a site that was of importance in our city's past. When John Butterfield secured the contract for the Overland Mail Route in June of 1857, he cut a new road to give faster mail and passenger service. He used a road south of the John Fitzgerald Inn that originally had been cut before 1834 for the entrance to the log cabin home of James and Mahala (White) Fitzgerald. At the present day curve in Highway 265 south of Moore Drop Forge Company; Butterfield extended James' road and cut a new road south to a point approximately even with Phillips Litho Company. The cut connected with the original Old Missouri Road whiich had been Mill Street, a segment of South Crutcher Street and then turned due east on a road that is known today as Caudle Street. The Old Missouri Road then turned south on present day Highway 265 and continued south into Fayetteville. To secure a mail drop, the little town of Shiloh used a one room log cabin on the north west corner of Caudle and present day Highway 265. The log cabin, built on Lynch's prairie land; became known as Lynch's Prairie Post Office.

You will find James Lynch in the 1840 Washington County, Prairie Township census with 18 individuals in his household. His wife Deborah was born in North Carolina in 1786. In 1850 Lucinda "Lucy" Jane Walker born 1833-1835 Arkansas is in the widow Deborah Lynch's household. It is believed that she is a granddaughter; and her mother born 1810-1820 is a widowed daughter of the Lynchs and is living with her parents.

Known children of James and Deborah is the daughter born 1810-20 and believed to have married a Mr. Walker. Martha "Patsy" was born 15 March 1817 Tennessee and was the wife of Obediah Kendrick. An unknown son born 1820-1825, Martin Alonzo born 25 December 1822 in Alabama, an unknown daughter born 1825-1830. Records indicate Fred F. born 12 August 1827 could be a son. Benjamin born 1828 Alabama, Hiram Perry born 26 December 1828 Illinois according to his tombstone, but his birth year is probably an error. Cross research indicates he was born approximately 1830. Deborah Jane born 2 December 1828 Illinois, also a tombstone date and in error; Deb was born about 1832. (Note the three 1828 birth years) The name J. S. Walker, born 27 February 1830; is recorded in Hiram Perry Lynch's family record. It is believed he is a grandchild of the Lynchs and a member of the household in 1840.

In James' household, there are two females and a male child born 1830-1835 and four females and one male born 1835-1840. The identity of these small children, other than Lucinda Jane and J. S. Walker; are unknown.

Daniel Lynch married Nancy Sharp and lived in Madison County in 1840 and 1850. In Illinois the same time frame as James; Daniel could possibly be a son. Records indicate that our Lynch family originated from Lynchburg, Tennessee. They migrated to Alabama and were in Illinois by or shortly after 1830 and in northwest Arkansas by 1833. After James died his widow married William Graham, the son of Peter and Nancy Graham. William and Deborah were married the 4th of October 1856, Deborah was his fourth wife. Deb died sometime after 1856 and by the 1860 census. The burial sites of Deborah and her two husbands are unknown.

Lucinda Jane "Lucy" Walker, born in November of 1833 in Arkansas; married Pinkney G. Graham on the 27 July 1853 in Washington County. Pinkney, born 5 December 1833; was the son of Levi and Nancy (Graham) Graham. Nancy's parents were William and Leah (Bloyd) Graham and she was the stepdaughter of James Lynch's widow, Deborah. Pinkney and Lucy, in 1857; filed on the 40 acres that is at the base of Webber Mountain and is at the curve of Highway 68 East city route. They had three sons; James born 1855, William Perry born 20 September 1856 and Levi who was born 7 February in 1859. Pinkney enlisted in the Confederate Army, Co. E, 1st Batt'n Stirman's Arkansas Cavalry; in October of 1861. He apparently was killed sometime after February 1863. By 1870 Lucy departed Washington County, it is not known if her son James was deceased by this date. William Perry was a registered voter of Butte County, California and a resident of Chico in July of 1878. He married seventeen year old Martha Jane Holder of Chico the 17 March 1890 in Paradise, California. They had seven daughters and two sons by 1910; Jane E., James Lewis, Ada F., Josephine E., Ruth M., Charles L., Dorothy Ethel and Clara H. Graham. William Perry died 3 May 1945 in Magalia, California. In Hiram Perry Lynch's descendants home there are old family photos made in Chico, California.

Lucy's son, Levi; married Eunice Elizabeth "Mincie", the daughter of William A. and Mary (Davis) Adams; in Magalia on the 21 November of 1879. Their children were: Minnie Mable, Harrison Cleveland, Herbert Pickney, Magnolia Nanetta and Lucille Amelia Graham. Mincie died on Christmas Day in 1892; in 1915 Levi married May Belle Sturgess of Oregon. Levi was a registered voter of Butte County in 1884 and a resident of Paradise. Lucy lived with her son Levi in the 1900 Butte County Census; both of her sons listed their occupations as gold miners. Levi died 14 January 1947 in Chico. Both brothers are buried in Paradise Cemetery near their mother who died 15 April in 1903.

Two of Pinkney and Lucinda's great-great-granddaughters, Kathleen Louise (Graham) Fette of Muenster, Texas and her sister Anita Marie (Graham) Wike of Euless, Texas spent three days with my husband and me in 1986. Kathy was born in Berkeley, California in 1942 and is the wife of James Kenneth Fette. Their two children are Mikael Kenneth and Kristin Michelle. Kathy's husband works for the Mormon Church program which is microfilming our nation's county records. Anita, a Dallas based airline stewardess; was born 1946 in Oakland, California and is the wife of Jeffery Scott Wike. Jeff and Anita have two sons, Jeffery Shane and Jared Graham Wike.

Kathy and Anita are two of seven children of Herbert Stuart, born 1920 died 1978; and Agnethe "Anita" Louise (Hansen) Graham of San Jose, California. Herbert and Anita's other children are Michael Eric, Karen Ann, James Allen, Gerald Patrick and Martina Jean Graham. These children are the grandchildren of Herbert Pinkney Graham, born 1886 died 1971; and his second wife, Anna Belle (Jamison) Graham. Herbert P. had married Louella V. Miller the first time, their only child was Lillian born 1907 who married Kenneth Haber. In addition to Herbert Stuart Graham, Herbert P. and his second wife Anna had a son; Jack Martin born 1923 and a daughter Dorothy Lea born 1930 who married Clinton A. Bruce.

Martha "Patsy" Lynch was born in Tennessee or Alabama and married Obediah Kendrick, who was born 27 November 1809 in Tennessee or Alabama. It is believed they were married about 1835 in Washington County, Arkansas. They owned land in the War Eagle area and Accident Community before Obediah died, thus I cannot state with accuracy which property they called home. It is known by descendants that the old homeplace was on the northeast corner of Old Missouri Road (now Highway 265) and Reed Avenue. Both Obediah and Patsy were members of the Shiloh Primitive Baptist Church in Springdale. When Obediah died on the 15th January 1867, he was buried in the Shiloh Church Cemetery. Patsy, dying in 1895; was probably buried in the newly created plots at Bluff Cemetery. Her husband's body would have been moved from Shiloh Cemetery and interned at Bluff after the city council condemned the cemetery in 1894. Patsy and Obediah's graves are marked with the original tombstones.

Obediah and Patsy had five sons: Francis Marion, Joseph Wesley, Morgan, William Perry, and Seth Monroe. Their eight daughters were: Elizabeth J., Mary Frances, Martha Susan, Emeline, Deborah Ann, Nancy Caroline "Tine", Patsy E. and Anna Eliza Jane Kendrick. Elizabeth J. born 1837, Tine and Patsy never married. Francis Marion died during the Civil War and Emeline died by 1867. Martha Susan married William Riley Alexander as his second wife and moved to Alabama. William P., Deborah, Tine, Patsy, Anna Eliza Jane and Seth are buried at Wilson Cemetery. The cemetery is in the Monitor community and is a short distance north of the Washington County line in Benton County.

Mary Frances, the daughter of Obediah and Patsy; was born 13 November 1838. She married Thomas Alexander Phillips, the son of Thomas and Elizabeth (Looney) Phillips; about 1864. They had seven children: Martha Ann did not marry and died in 1893, George Lafayette, William Thomas, Robert Woodrow, Susan Arabella, Columbus Monroe, who was known as Roe, and Nancy Jane was known as Janie. Four of Alexander and Mary's children married Graham's, all of whom were the grandchildren of Nelson Reed and Susan Louiza (Landers) Graham. Nancy Jane married Sneed Graham, George L. married Sarah Smith and Beadie Ann Graham. William Thomas married Tilitha Bell Graham, and Arabella married John Nelson Graham. Roe Phillips married Maude White, a great granddaughter of William and Leah (Bloyd) Graham. Robert lived in Fresno, California in 1915.

John Nelson and Arabella Graham's six children were: Harvey Phillips, Katy Jane, Hobson Hugh, Ruth (Graham) Greer, Ruby Jewell McKinney and Thomas Nelson Graham. Harvey Phillips Graham and his wife Mabel Augusta Moody farmed the soil south east of Lowell and raised their family of five. Their children are: Rosalie, John Wendall, Kahylene, Mary Belle and Maureen. Kahylene and her husband Fred Arlis Vanzant reared their four daughters and two sons near her parents homeplace. Fred and Kahylene perpetuate her Graham heritage; nurturing apple and peach orchards for the populace.

William Thomas and Tilitha Bell Phillips' grandson is Dale Christian Reed of Lowell. Dale's great grandfather, Peter Graham born 8 May 1845; was the highest bidder for this sister's Nancy (Graham) Lynch's share of her father's estate. When Nancy died her husband, Martin Alonzo Lynch appointed John A. Wolf as his lawyer to sell the land at public auction so that he might utilize the funds received to educate his motherless children. (Ref. Williamson County, Texas and Benton County, Arkansas records.) This land was due west of the present day Fred Vanzant farm on the south side of Highway 264. Dale's wife, the former Maxine Trout; was a teacher in the Springdale school system. Alexander and Mary F. (Kendrick) Phillips are buried at Bluff Cemetery. Dying in 1884, Alexander was originally at the Shiloh Church Cemetery; Mary died in 1915.

Joseph Wesley born 1844, the son of Obediah and Patsy; married Susan K. Wolf, the daughter of William and Martha M. Wolf. Susan was the granddaughter of William and Marget Wolf; 1830 Shiloh settlers; who owned 40 acres of Washington County land contingent with Benton County. Joseph and Susan had no children but adopted a son Charles G. who died at the age of 36 in 1917. Joseph who died in 1922; Susan and Charles are buried in the Goshen, Arkansas cemetery.

Morgan, the son of Obediah and Patsy; was born in 1845. He married Susan E. Phillips, the daughter of Mason and Deborah (Kendrick) Phillips. Susan and Morgan are believed to be first cousins. They reared their family in Clarkston, Asotin County, Washington.

William Perry, the son of Obediah and Patsy; was born 25th August 1850. He married Mary Augusta Hoggett the 26 April 1877. Their children were: William Riley, Charlie, Perry, Jesse, Rosa Beard and Anna Marie the wife of Henry C. Gregg. Henry and Anna raised their seven children in Pocatello, Idaho. Perry moved to the Kansas City area. William Riley married Lettie Ann Anderson. Their daughter was Etta, wife of Clarence Austin. Riley and Lettie raised a year old boy whose mother had died; when this young man was sixteen he was legally adopted. Elmer Wade Kendrick was the youngest of four children of Wade and Mary Lou (Woods) Blassingame. Elmer died the 24th September 1988, his widow; Bessie Ferril; resides on a portion of the land that Patsy Kendrick apparently retained after her husband died in 1867.

Deborah Ann, the daughter of Obediah and Patsy; was born 25 February 1852. She married Granville A. Wolf, the son of John A. and Elizabeth Wolf and the grandson of William and Marget Wolf. Deborah and her husband are buried at Wilson Cemetery. Two known sons were: Irvin and Osa.

Anna Eliza Jane, the ninth child of Obediah and Patsy; was born 22 June 1860 and died 2 July 1934. Eliza married Elias S. Graham the son of Nelson Reed and Susan Louiza (Landers) Graham. Elias's first wife was Martha Amanda Wolf the daughter of John A. and Elizabeth Wolf. Elias and Martha had six children. Elias and Eliza's eight children were William Baxter, Bonnie Dee, Elizabeth Pearl, Patsy Lacynda, Alonzo Monroe, Mary Frances, Elmer Ross, and Debby Ann. Eliza's son Osie Arlington "Jonah" Kendrick was born 1 February 1887 and died 18 June 1958 in Springdale. William Baxter, Bonnie, and Alonzo M. moved to Huntington Beach, California. Elmer Ross was accidentally killed in 1918 at the age of 16 near Butterfield, Missouri. Elizabeth Pearl married William Tell Kendrick, son of Thomas Benton and Susan Elizabeth (Phillips) Kendrick. Their daughter Lorene, married Jesse Morris; and was an employee of the Boone-Ritter Insurance Agency. Mary Frances Graham married Noah Finland Cooper.

Patsy Lacynda, the daughter of Elias and Eliza; married Ward Columbus Harp. Ward and Patsy had five children; Clarence, J. R., Dempsey Laverne, Kendle Dean, and Bill Harp. Bill and his wife, Eupile Howell; raised their family of six on his father's farm. The farm is part of a 160 acre original 1851 land grant of William Harp; thus the reason a hill on Highway 68 East has always been known as Harp Hill.

Kendle Harp married Juanita Bridges of Lowell and had 5 children: Cindy Joann, Arnold Dean, Daisy Earlene, Kenny Ward and Tommye Sue. Owning a farm adjoining ours, their children and mine explored and savored the many pleasures these Ozark hills offers. Arnold and Kenny are local building contractors. Arnold married Mary Priscilla Lornston, Kenny married Margie Ruth Ellen Carter and Rita Jean Roberts. Raising chickens Joann and her husband, Robert C. Anderson; are an integral part of our poultry industry. Tommye Sue, an employee of the First National Bank in Springdale; married Michael Joel Oberley and James Winters. Daisy and her husband James Robertson Nuse of Madison, New Jersey and their seven year old son Harry Adam Nuse II reside in Round Rock, Texas.

James R. Nuse, known as Buzz; is Round Rock's city engineer. In Round Rock there is an active Old Settlers organization, Daisy and Buzz have qualified as members since Martin A. and Nancy (Graham) Lynch were among the old settlers. Nancy's brother, Elias S. Graham; is Daisy's great grandfather and Daisy as a Graham descendant is a great grandniece of Nancy's; as a Lynch descendant, Daisy; is a 2nd great grandniece of Martin A. Lynch. A hundred and thirteen years after Nancy's death there is once again flowers placed with reverence on the graves of Martin and Nancy Lynch by family members.

Debby Ann, the daughter of Elias and A. Eliza J. Graham; married Clyde Louis Harp who was a brother to Ward C. Harp. Debby and Clyde had five children; Louis C., Marcella West, Ladema Gooding, Lucille Lane and Marilyn Ledbetter. Interviewing Debby; she gave oral history of the Graham family during the Civil War period. Debbie's father, Elias; as a lad of ten was with his father, Nelson Reed Graham; when he was shot by bushwhackers in 1863. Debby and Clyde are buried in the Sonora Cemetery east of Springdale.

The last child of Obediah and Patsy Kendrick was Seth Monroe who died in 1923. Seth and Ardilla Wilson, a great granddaughter of William and Leah (Bloyd) Graham; was married while on horseback by Rev. Edward Hale. Dilly and Seth had three daughters: Zelma wife of Charles Salverson, Alice wife of Orval Ray Ralston and Minnie Pearl, the wife of Carl Otto Cardwell. Seth's two sons were Franklin and Virgil Lee. Virgil, born in 1907; married Mildred Robbins in 1933. They farmed and raised their family, Tommy, Bobby, John, Carl, and Carolyn northeast of Springdale. Carolyn married Curt Bayley, Tommy married Darlette Holt and Carl married Margie Wright. John and Bobby and their wives; Twila Weston and Jo Lassiter; are residents of Vacaville, California. Ray and Alice Ralston had two sons, Richard and James Ray. Verbalizing the name Ray Ralston, Sprindalians recall the Bear Cat filling station. There weren't many stations in Springdale in the first half of this century. Ray and the Bear Cat, located on the southeast corner of Spring and Johnson Streets, sold more than just gas for the few cars in the area.

Martin Alonzo born 25 December 1822 in Alabama, the son of James and Deborah Lynch; has not been found in an 1850 census. It is believed he made the trek westward to search for gold. About 1852, the eldest child of Nelson Reed and Susan Louiza (Landers) Graham married a young man with the surname of Kendrick. Nancy Graham was born 7 August 1832 in West Fork, Arkansas and moved with her parents to Benton County as a child. Mr. Kendrick and Nancy had a daughter Mary Frances born 24 October 1853 in Benton County, Arkansas. It was Mary Frances's daughter; Cordie Mae (Smith) Hawthorne and her family who preserved many family traditions of the Martin Lynch family. Mary Frances's father died and before 1854 Martin Lynch married the young widow. With the loss of Benton County marriages during the Civil War we'll probably never know the first name of the Kendrick man or the marriage dates of either of Nancy's marriages. Tradition in the Graham family that Nelson Reed gave his daughter and her husband a wagon and a team of mules for a wedding gift, which they used to go to Texas. Census and tax records verify the tradition. Martin A. Lynch is on the Cardwell County, Texas tax records in 1854 and the county census records of 1860 and 1870. On May 15, in 1856 he bought land in Lockhart which is in Cardwell County. Martin and Nancy's first seven children were born in Lockhart. William Perry was born the 14 June 1856. James Franklin, who is my husband's grandfather; was born 19 December 1857. Elizabeth J., known as Jenny and/or Eliza Jane; was born 22 February 1860. Margaret "Mag" was born 1862 and Martin A. Lynch, Jr. was born in 1863, Silas in 1865, and Edward P. in 1867. Sometime after the 1870 census Martin moved his family to Williamson County, Texas. In September of 1871; Martin bought his Round Rock, Texas land with $2000.00 in gold. He is on the tax roles of 1872 and the 1880 census of Williamson County. Martin and Nancy's last two children, Mattie Lynch and Elias Lynch; were born in Round Rock, Texas on 6 April 1874 and the 21 August in 1875.

On the 4th July in 1878, Nancy (Graham) Kendrick Lynch died. Her birth and death dates are recorded in her mother's Bible. I have visited Round Rock's Old Town Cemetery on Sam Bass Road; the burial sites of Martin, Nancy and their daughter Mattie. Having an old post card of Round Rock, as it looked when my husbands Lynch grandparents lived there; I walked the streets of this small town envisioning what it was like over a hundred years ago. After Nancy died, by June of 1880; Martin had married a young girl of 22 who according to tradition had been his son William Perry or James Franklin's girlfriend. This didn't make for a happy atmosphere; so Martin built a small house next to his home. There his stepdaughter, Mary Frances; lived and cared for her smaller half brothers and sisters. She had married William Mason and was a young widow with a two year old daughter named Nancy. Mary Frances had buried her small infant son, Perry; beside her mother in Old Town Cemetery; not until 14 December 1888 did Mary Frances marry again.

Alfred L. Smith, Sr. and Mary Frances had five children. Arthur, who died as an infant; is buried beside his grandmother Nancy Lynch. Cordie Mae married William Lester Hawthorne and their daughter Mary Lucille married Thomas Albert Wilhite. Roy Clarence Smith and Victoria Morgan had seven children. Charlotte Smith married Ed Sybert and had six children. Alfred L. Smith, Jr. married Mabel Roselma Smith who is a half sister to Preston Smith, a former governor of Texas. Alfred and Mable had four children, one of whom is Mrs. Fred (Nancy) Parnell of Belton, Texas.

Lucille Wilhite, Cordie's daughter; of Belton is the custodian of many lovely tintypes of the Martin Lynch family. Mary Frances (Kendrick) Smith did not die until 1944, thus many family stories were told to her children and grandchildren. Cordie said her mother told of Martin Lynch, Jr. refusing to eat food the negro maid had touched and she would touch each dish to aggravate him. Stories were told of when Martin, Sr. served in the Civil War and the terrible time that Nancy had putting out a fire in the family's mud and stick fireplace flue. After the Civil War there was an influx of German families who settled in Texas from Missouri and other states. White bonnets were made after the war and sold to local merchants to be resold to the many new German settlers. Tidies (doilies) were also made and sold. In this period of time scribble paper was known as foolscap paper.

William Perry, the first born of Martin and Nancy Lynch; married Martha Elizabeth Sanders on 26 June 1887. William died in Brownwood, Texas 10 October 1931. His children were: Nancy May wife of Lamar Durant and Henry Chester Hinson, Effie wife of William Hilton White, William Perry, Jr., Ira C., Ethel born 1898 died 1906 in Barlett, Texas, Harry Otis, Ida Ozella married James Walker and Sadie Lynch married Alpha J. Dillard. Ira, Otis, Ida, and Sadie did not have any children.

William Perry Lynch, Jr. was born 2 July 1892 and died in 1975. He and his wife, Gladys Evelyn Demorrow; had five children: Aleta Louise Weathersby, James Perry married Louise Perkins, Billy Demorrow married Nelda Copeland, Betty Jo and Kenneth Lee Lynch. Kenneth died 15 September 1987 in Snyder, Texas. William's widow, Gladys; is in a nursing home near her daughter, Betty Jo; of Odessa, Texas. Betty's husband, Ray Thomas; was an excellent swimmer but drowned while on a fishing trip the 10th August 1970. They had three daughters, Connie Jean (Thomas) Delayne born 1947, Carol Louise (Thomas) Theesfield born 1949 and Carrie Annette Thomas born 14 October 1962. Betty Jo was born 1st of January 1927 in Brownwood. Her sister, Aleta; married Altus Buel Weathersby and Kenneth married Alta Lea Turner. Neither had any children.

Martin and Nancy (Graham) Lynch's second son, James Franklin Lynch; apparently came to visit his Arkansas kin in 1885 and met the girl who was to become his bride. Belle Dora Holcomb was born 16 March 1871 east of Springdale on what is now known as Parsons Road and was the daughter of John Howard and Rhoda (Biass) Holcomb. In 1885 you didn't turn south and go around Weber Mountain to get to the present Parsons Road, you went due east from Emma Avenue and went up and over the mountain.

In 1968, James and Belle Dora's daughter, Bessie Bea; gave me a photograph of her grandfather Holcomb and shared the contents of a small white notebook she took from her mother's trunk. Belle Dora had recorded her children's birthdates and the marriage dates of her marriage and some of her children. Records seem to indicate that she eloped when she married James on the 31 October 1885 in Alma, Arkansas. It is known from tax records from this old trunk that Belle and James lived in Texas from the time of their marriage until they returned to Springdale to live in 1895. Their daughter, Minnie Pearl (Lynch) Kendrick; thought she was born in Springdale and remembered a trip to Texas as a small child with a stop in Indian Territory. Poll tax receipts of her father proved she was born in Travis County, Texas, which is contingent with Williamson County. The trip she remembered was her parents migration from Texas to establish their home in Springdale.

James and Belle Dora had eight children, their first child lived only 4 days. Their second child was, Minnie Pearl; then Bessie Bea, Bertha May, Raymond Phineas, Zenus Eugene and Eunice Gertrude. The first born child was born 15 September 1886 and died 19 September 1886; it is believed this child was buried by James' mother at Old Town Cemetery at Round Rock, Texas. Bertha May was born 9 June 1891 in Williamson County or Big Spring, Texas, she died 28 October 1907 at Springdale and is buried at Wilson Cemetery. Raymond Phineas's birth was recorded by his mother as 13 April 1897 not 1898. He was born at Springdale; for on the 8 of April in 1897 his father paid his 1897 Washington County poll tax. Zenus Eugene was born 29 August in 1900; the last child, Eunice Gertrude; was born 19 January 1907.

James often told his young grandson, Richard Lynch; about the Texas trails that he rode. This young grandson grew up thinking his grandfather was spinning tall yarns for his amusement. The Texas cowboy herded the Texas long horn cattle to the markets and both he and his father bought and sold horses. I do not know what lured James and his young family to the town of Big Spring, Texas; but I do know that James paid a ten dollar fine in the Justice court of G. W. Lake in March of 1893 for not working the public highway in Big Spring. In August of 1894 James received his mail at Terral in Indian Territory. Terral was six miles north of Ringold, Texas; and was the home of Belle Dora's sister, Cener May Seeds.

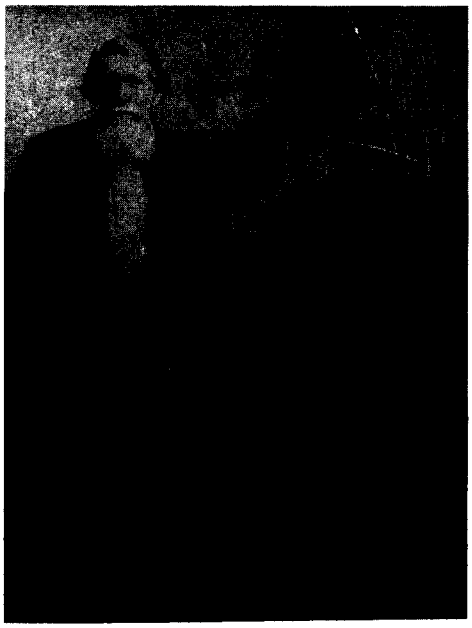
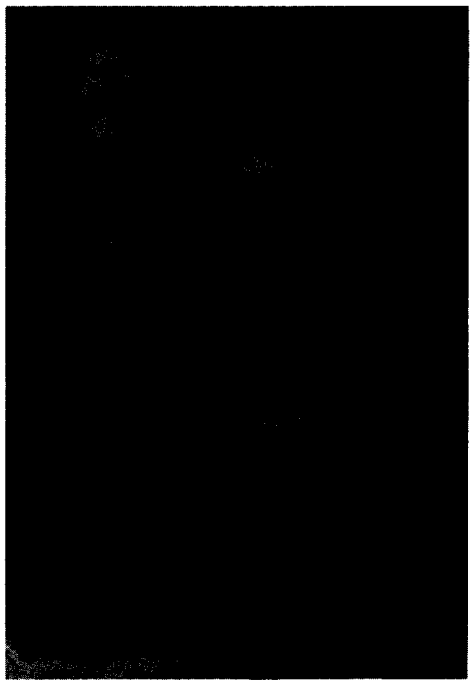
Cener's grandson, Charles L. Naylor a resident of Clovis, New Mexico; retiring from USAF after 21 years and owns a Farmer's Insurance Agency in Clovis. In 1983 Charles and his wife Rheuhema "Rhue" (Carey) Naylor came to Springdale to search for his grandmother's sister's family. Stopping at the Chamber of



Moses and Deborah Jane (Lynch) Graham



Hiram Perry and Millie Miranda (Patton) Lynch

Commerce, Charles bought a Springdale Centennial booklet. As he rejoined his wife the book fell open; revealing a photograph of Rev. John and Dorothea (Wilbanks) Holcomb. Charles had his mother, Cletus (Seeds) Naylor's; lovely red velour covered photo album with him. In this album were tintypes of the same reproduced photographs of Rev. John and his wife, but the tintypes were some of the few not identified. The pictures of Belle Dora and James that accompanies this article came from the album. Belle's sister, Cener; died 10 March 1938 in Ralls, Texas.

When James Franklin Lynch moved to Springdale he apparently continued buying and selling livestock, for he bought corn on consignment in 1897 at Evergreen, a small community east of Springdale. He bought a ten year old bay horse named Prince, a ten year old bay horse mule and a set of harness and a wagon from Benjamin W. Graham in 1902. The cost of these horses was to be paid to the Ben Graham Mill. Benjamin Wesley Graham was a first cousin of James Franklin, it is known that at one time Ben lived in the Monitor community and it is believed his mill was a transient saw mill. When James F. wasn't trading livestock he made barrel staves in our apple industry. Belle Dora supplemented the family income by baking pies for a local restaurant. As late as the 1920s; they went to the Grove, Oklahoma area to work during the harvest season. They died in Springdale, James on the 31 May 1938 and Belle Dora on the 3 October 1941; both are buried at Wilson Cemetery.

When Minnie Pearl, the second child of James F. and Belle Lynch; married Osie A. "Jonah" Kendrick; they did not know they were second cousins. Pearl was born near Round Rock, Texas in Travis County; she died 20 August 1973 in a Rogers, Arkansas rest home and is buried beside her husband at Wilson Cemetery. Jonah and Pearl had ten children: Ethel, Harold, Chester, Clarence, Robert, Rolland, Aileen, Osie, Ruby and Wilma Kendrick.

Ethel Grace Kendrick married John Jefferson Sturdy, Lester Harold married Beth Graham and raised his family in the Kansas City area. Chester Arlington married Lulu White and Evelyn Myrtle Hughes. Everett Clarence married Arla Ruth Sullins, and had five children. Their daughter, Tassy married Bobby Perry and lives in the Zion community. Another daughter, Sharon; married David Higgins and resides in Rogers.

Robert Lee, the son of Jonah and Pearl; married Grace Smith and reared his 2 daughters, Leah Sharon Hale and Sonja Ilene Daniel south east of Lowell. Jonah and Pearl's son, Rolland Edward; married Henrietta J. (Beasley) Dillingham and reared her small son Donald Jerome Dillingham. Henrietta was a descendant of John and Mary Fitzgerald, who established the 1825 two story log Inn east of Springdale. Dying in 1981, Henrietta was a U. of A. graduate with a masters in education; and was a Springdale school teacher.

Henrietta and Rolland had four children; Carolyn Sue Corbin of Orlando, Florida, Linda Ellen, Jerry Ron and Michael Edward. Linda and her husband, Jack Ray Smith; own a farm adjoining her father's south east of Lowell. Aileen Kendrick married David Bly Raglin and Franklin Monroe Doolin. Osie, the eighth child of Pearl and Jonah was born 10 September 1923; he married Billie Irene McGaugh. Osie's son, Bobby Lee; resides in Plano, Texas and his son Billy Dean lives at Lowell. Osie died of a heart attack while fishing near the Highway 68E, Beaver Lake bridge, on the 3 July in 1965. Ruby Ellen Kendrick married John James Kuxhaus. Wilma Dean, the youngest child of Jonah and Pearl; married Lonnie Eugene Phillips.

Bessie, the third child of James and Belle Dora; was born in Williamson County, Texas and married Joe Fink of Springdale in 1910. Their infant child is buried in an unmarked grave at Wilson Cemetery beside Bessie's parents. Bessie married the second time to Grover Cleve Spurgeon and had one daughter Lila Bell, who was born in 1924. Lila Belle had two children, a daughter Vanzetta and a son Roger Weldon Curry. At the death of Lila Bell; Bessie reared her two grandchildren to adulthood. Vanzetta married Tommy McGarrah of Siloam Springs; Tommy is a second great grandson of Thomas and Rachel (Graham) McGarrah. Bessie died in a Siloam Springs rest home the 10 June 1987 and is also buried at Wilson Cemetery.

James and Belle Dora's fifth child, Raymond; was an apprentice at an early age in Springdale's early 1900 barber shops. Raymond fell in love with a beautiful young girl whose home was the Frisco Depot section house. Pearl Luzelle Hunt, was born 22 September 1900 at Brentwood, Arkansas. She was the daughter of Charles Franklin H. and Julia Ann (Martin) Hunt. Pearl's father served as a Springdale city councilman and retired after 50 years as section foreman for the Frisco Railroad. Her grandfather, George Washington Hunt; lived at Rogers, Arkansas and is buried in the Rogers cemetery. Her grandparents, Benjamin Cleveland and Mary Jane (Hopkins) Martin; lived and died at Lowell, Arkansas. Mary Jane's father, Thomas Hopkins; filed on the NE 1/4 of SE 1/4 of section 7, township 18, range 29

Benton County, in 1869. Her mother, Lydia (Beck) Hopkins was of the blue eyed Beck family of Missouri. Ben Martin, the son of Joseph and Jemima A. (Barnes) Martin; worked for an unknown number of years at the Benton County Courthouse. Jemima is buried at Phillips Cemetery at Lowell; her tombstone is inscribed as Jemima Barnes, daughter of J. B. and L. A. Barnes. A descendant in Oklahoma City has the Martin family Bible; the family record gives a marriage date of 7 July 1825 for Jemima and Joseph Martin. Joseph was born 7 July 1792 in Virginia and he died 15 May 1871. His burial site is unknown.

Raymond and Pearl Lynch were married on the 14 May in 1917. Recently, I called my mother-in-law to see if Caudle Street converged with the Old Missouri Road as late as 1917 when she and Grandad were married. I was delighted when she described in detail what they were wearing the day they were married. Dressed in "a store bought white blouse with a little blue design in the material;" she wore a white pleated skirt and had borrowed a hat from her sister, Cora. Granny while laughing, described the hat; "It was a curious looking red straw hat and had a small three cornered brim." She didn't know where Cora got the hat but she liked it. Grandad, as usual; was dressed in a white shirt with grey checkered trousers and a suitcoat. "You know, I never saw him in anything but a white shirt until World War II when we were at the Navy base, and I couldn't get used to his faded blue shirts." Raymond served as a barber in the U. S. Navy and Pearl as a cook for the officers mess at the Millington, Tennessee naval base. Yes, Caudle Street did dead end at the Old Missouri Road in 1917; for they walked down Caudle Street towards their destination. Rev. Edward E. Hale on the 14 of May added two more names to the long list of couples he had married. More than one boy and girl had walked or rode horses to Rev. Hale's home. Some of the couples didn't even bother to dismount from their horses to tie the official knot. The old log cabin home was moved to HarBer Village in Oklahoma just a few years ago and originally stood due south and contingent with the present Springdale Vo-Tech School property.

Raymond and Pearl had 8 children, those living to adulthood were Wanda Marguerite, Charles Ray, James Fay, Richard Lyle, Billy Gene and Bobby Joe Lynch. My husbands parents buried their first two children at Wilson Cemetery. A tiny infant girl born 17 October 1917 and then Dale Levone who was born 22 August 1918. Dale died a sudden death while Granny was bathing him on the 18 March 1919. Their graves are unmarked, but they are buried beside their Lynch grandparents. My father-in-law died of a stroke on the 20 September 1961 and is buried at Friendship Cemetery. My mother-in-law, who is now a young 88; has been a delightful woman to know and love.

My husbands sister, Wanda; was born 10 February 1920. She married Paul Eugene Smith. Paul, the son of Thomas Taylor Smith; is a great grandson of 1855 Washington County settlers Lebon and Mirah E. (Head) Smith. His grandparents were Joseph Beatty and Matilda Ellen (Trammell) Smith.

Paul and Wanda have four children; Paula Marie, the wife of Maxwell Wade; Meri Josephine, wife of Wiley Clyde Moore; Raymond Dale Eugene and Tommy Richard who married Lucille Francis Elery and Peggy Kay Damme. Tommy's children are Richard Devon, Trina Michele, Sean Paul and Amber Kathlene. Wiley and Meri's daughter, Theresa (Moore) Neagles; is a Springdale teacher.

Raymond and Pearl's 4th and 5th children were twin sons. Charles Ray and James Fay Lynch were born 16 October in 1921. Charles married Bessie Lucille Barrett and had five children; Barbara Ann, Sharon Raye, Linda Sue, Charles Aden and Theresa Kay. Barbara married Carl Melbourne Lackey, Sr. Sharon, who resides in Renton, Washington; married Stephen Terry Tisdale of Springdale and Richard Dominic Ulrich. Linda married Bill Gibson and Don Frazier. Charles Aden married Bonnie Gibbs and Theresa married Donald Ray Gregory.

Charles served in the U. S. Navy during World War II and was a plumber by trade. He died of a heart attack in 1981 and is buried at Friendship Cemetery. Charles and Lucille have 19 grandchildren and 8 great grandchildren.

James Fay Lynch married Anna Lou Burba; their two daughters are Connie Lou and Billy Faye. Connie and her husband, Ronald Dean Proctor; have two children, Kendall Ray and Kristin Renae. Ron is an employee of Bell Telephone Company and he and Connie spend their spare time maintaining their grape and peach orchards at their home on US Highway 68E. Billy and her husband, Ronald J. Ames; reside in Rogers with their two daughters Gabriel Kathlene and Stacey. Jim served in the Army in the European theatre during World War II; he has been an employee of Laymans, Inc. for many years and is now semi-retired.

My husband, Richard Lyle Lynch; was born 31 August 1923 and was the sixth child of Raymond P. and Pearl L. Lynch. Richard and I, Bobbie Levirl (Byars) Lynch; were both born in Springdale but we did not become acquainted until the summer of 1944. He was on leave for the first time since enlisting in the Navy on the 17th December 1941. He began his boot camp training in San Diego and was assigned to the ZP Airship Patrol Squadron #32 at Moffet Field Naval Air Station in Sunnyvale, California. There, he learned to fly the non rigid airships and flew anti-submarine patrol off the coast of California. He became a photographers apprentice and advanced to a photographers mate.

While stationed at Clear Field, Utah; Richard was transferred to Adak, Alaska and assigned to the staff of the Commander of the North Pacific Force (COM-NAR-PAC) commanded by Admiral Frank Jack Fletcher. He was one of fourteen photographers with COM-NAR-PAC Staff Photo Unit aboard the Battleship Missouri and the Panamint; photographing the terms of the emergency occupation and surrender of Japan. The amphibious group command ship, AGC #13 (U. S. S. Panamint); made an amphibious landing in northern Honshu, Japan. The Ominato Guard District was where Japan's largest Naval Station was located. Richard, as one of the photographers; went ashore with the first group and the assignment was to photograph the emergency occupation. While stationed at Kodiak, Alaska near the huge air strips that my father had helped lengthen in the early part of the war; Richard was discharged as a Photographers Mate second class on 6 January 1946.

After we were married, Richard was employed by Parke Avalon Studios. We traveled a three state area taking studio photographs. A short time later he simultaneously held three jobs, employed by Railway Express; he worked the 4 a. m. and 8 p. m. trains. He established the Keepsake Studio in Springdale and made senior portraits and photographed more than his share of weddings. He was an Associated Press and Springdale News photographer and on call to cover the disasters and the many varied activities of our then small town. The pace sounds hectic but when you are young and enjoy your job, the rewards are ample. We moved to Wichita, Kansas in 1951 and there Richard changed his career choice. He became a finish contractor of homes, moving back to Springdale in 1955; his employer became Joe M. Steele. Employed by Steele Enterprizes until 1981; Richard was the building maintenance contractor and the general contractor for new constructions. As a Brush Creek township committeeman, Richard is an active member of the Washington County Central Democratic committee. He has served as a board member of the Washington County Planning Commission and the Holcomb Cemetery Board and served on the first board created for our Nob Hill community Volunteer Fire Department.

Our three children are Ricky Levirl (Lynch) Creamer, Roddy Lyle Lynch and Monte Pierre Lynch. See William Hampton Byars family story for our family data.

Billy Gene Lynch, the seventh child of Raymond and Pearl; was born 22 January 1928. Bill enlisted in the U. S. Navy in 1945 or 1946 and served for four years. He married Freida Pauline Cline of Kingston, Arkansas and surprising themselves and all our family, Freida and Bill's first two children were twins. Donald Ray and Sandra Kay were born on the 31 July 1952, shortly thereafter; Larry Gene and Janice Lynn were added to the family.

Don married Ladonna McCarty, Sandra married Tommy Dean Vanover and Ronnie Cecil Macon. Larry married Lisa Marrs and Janice married Danny Frank Villines and Bob Harrington. There are eight grandchildren of Bill's marriage to Freida.

Bill married the second time to Ladonna Sue (Watson) Forriester. Their daughter Kimberly Gene was born in 1969. Bill became an auctioneer in the late 1950s; for a few years he held auctions in his Springdale used furniture store. He eventually bought and sold cattle and horses and held weekly auctions at Jane, Missouri. When he and Sue died in 1984; Bill was having monthly horse auctions at Bentonville. Bill's son, Larry is maintaining the Lynch heritage of buying and selling livestock as a career choice.

The last child of Raymond and Pearl's, Bobby Joe Lynch; was born 23 July 1933. When he grew up he chose to enlist in the U. S. Navy. During his service in the Navy; Bob met and married a Lumberton, North Carolina girl. Elner Mattie Newberry was born in District of Columbia; but her family originated from Lumberton. After service, Bob; returned to Springdale to work as a foreman for Turkey Express, Inc. When Bob retired he and Elner moved to a ranch off Wyman Road east of Fayetteville. Elner and Bob have three children; Bobby Lee, Randy Gene and Denise Luzelle. Bobby Lee married Sandra Green, Deborah Jo Duncan, Kelly Sue Krutchmer and Susan Sloan Smith. Randy Gene and Tina Dianne Bird have a daughter, Katie Pearl.

Denise married Elmer Randall Napier. After the death of their infant daughter, Rebecca Jo; they adopted a little girl when she was three days old and chose the name Wendy Michelle for their baby. Bobby Lee and Deborah Jo had a son Mathew Duncan and Bobby Lee and Susan have a son Dustin Tyler Lynch.

Zenas Eugene Lynch, born 29 August 1900; was the 6th child of James and Belle Lynch. Like his brother, he also was a Springdale barber. Zenas married Sadie, the daughter of William and Ida Ann (Stringfield) King; on 10 December 1925. Zenas and Sadie had no children. Sadie's second husband was Ernest Horner and in 1980 she was living in Fresno, California. Zenas died the 12 December 1978 and is buried at Friendship Cemetery.

On the 19 January in 1907, James and Belle Lynch gave their youngest child the name of Eunice Gertrude. After graduating from Springdale High School, Gertrude went to nursing school at Fort Smith. There she married Oscar Ray and moved to Waco, Texas. Gertrude and Oscar were divorced and a short time later she moved to New Jersey. At Newark she met her second husband, Dayton Rollins; who was one of the early x-ray technicians who pioneered in x-ray on film. Dayton and Gertrude had two sons; George and Fred Raymond. George married Ann Soverhill and had one son, William Soverhill Rollins. Fred has never married. George and Fred moved to Los Angeles after adulthood and a few years ago Aunt Gertrude joined her sons in Los Angeles.

Elizabeth J. Lynch, the third child of Martin and Nancy Lynch; was born 22 February 1859 according to her family. She was listed as five months old in the 1860 census; thus her birth year would be 1860. Elizabeth married Simon Peter Smith of Athens, Georgia on the 10 June 1877 at Georgetown, Texas. Simon and Eliza had nine children, rearing seven to adulthood. The two infant sons are buried in unmarked graves near their grandmother, Nancy Lynch. Eliza died 1948 and is buried at Robinson Cemetery in Waco, Texas. Eliza and Simon's children were: Mary, wife of Gaylord Griffin; Elizabeth "Bess", wife of R. J. Rash; Emma, wife of William Wilson Rash; Thomas Martin; George Washington; Franklin Barto "Jack" and Charlie.

Emma (Smith) Rash was born in 1883, her husband William W. Rash of Rome, Georgia; was the son of Thomas and Mary (Bright) Rash. Emma and William were married 22 December 1902 in Robinson, Texas. William and Emma had ten children. Their fifth child, Leslie Walter was born 31 December 1912 in Waco. Leslie and Ruby Christine Falkner had three children. Leslie Rayburn and Daniel McCullough Rash were born in Waco, Texas, their sister; Cheryl Christine Ann was born in Houston. Cheryl married a veterinarian, Dr. James Alford Moore, Jr. Leslie and Christine have corresponded with me since 1968 and in 1981 while traveling to St. Louis to see a son they stopped for a brief visit. Richard and I have never been disenchanted when meeting his numerous Lynch cousins who reside in Texas.

Margaret, born 1862; was the fourth child of Martin and Nancy Lynch. She married George Doss in Round Rock on Christmas Day in 1881. She had four children: Callie, Josie, Charlie and "Icy" whose name was probably Elias. George and Margaret at one time lived in Whitwell, Tennessee. Josie wrote a card to her uncle James Lynch in 1914 with a postmark from Chattanoogna. She married Edgar Hamilton and had a daughter named Viola. Suffering from tuberculosis; Josie and Edgar died 6 days apart in the 1920s in San Antonio. Viola was being educated by the Masons and it is not known if she returned to Tennessee. Charlie Doss died as a child and Elisa "Icy" Doss lived at Birmingham, Alabama in the 1940s. Callie Doss and her husband died at an unknown date and left four orphan children. Tradition is that these four children were raised in a Catholic Orphans Home in Texas, their surnames are unknown.

Martin "Mart" Alonzo Lynch, Jr. and his wife Alta Yoe did not have any children. Mart, born in 1863; died at an unknown date in Haskell, Texas. It is known that he owned or was an employee of a candy store in Haskell.

Silas Lynch was born in 1865 and lived in Idaho when his father's estate was finalized. Both Elmore and Owyhee Counties in Idaho are counties in which Silas signed papers regarding Martin's estate. No other data has been found of this sixth child of Martin and Nancy Lynch's.

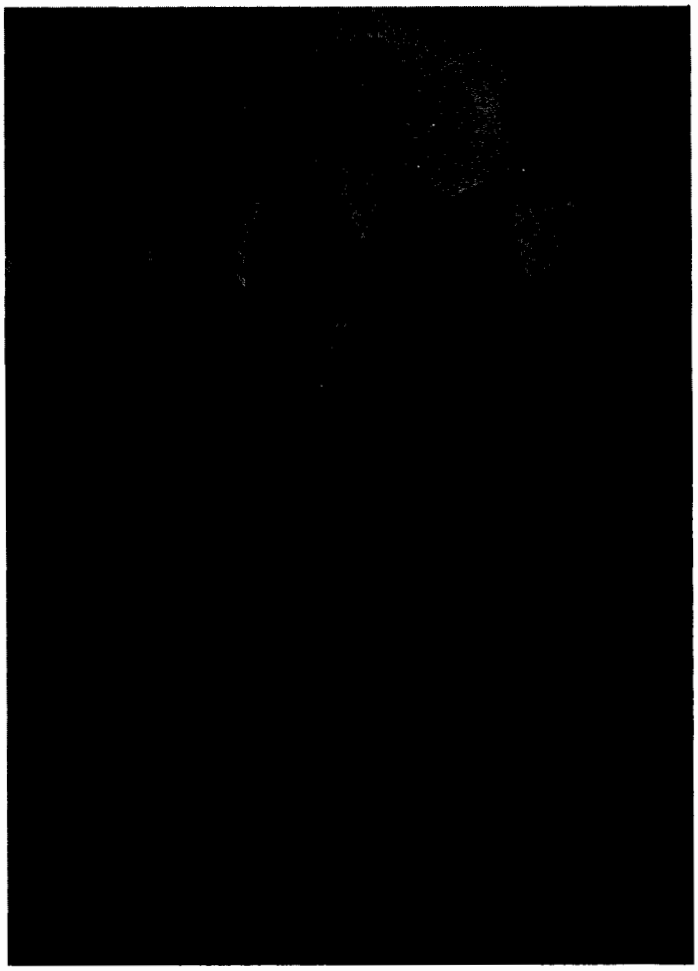
Edward P. Lynch, the 7th child of Martin and Nancy; was born 27 August 1867 and was a bachelor. He died 29 May 1938 in Waco, Texas and is buried in Robinson Cemetery. Dale Reed's mother, Bertha (Phillips) Reed; told me she could remember Ed visiting his Graham kin in the Lowell area. My husbands mother recalls his Springdale visits to his brother, James Franklin. James died on the 31st, two days after his brother Ed's death.

Mattie Lynch, the 8th child of Martin and Nancy; was born 6 April in 1874. At the age of 16 Mattie was planning her wedding; she died 13 December 1890 and was buried in the wedding dress she had so lovingly stitched.

The last child of Martin and Nancy's was born 21 August 1875 in Round Rock. Elias broke wild horses and lived in Estanca, New Mexico in 1908. It is known that he was married and had a small son who died. Elias's nickname was Icy.

Martin Alonza Lynch, Sr. and his second wife, Sarah Elizabeth Hodnett born January 1858; had four children according to Martin's will. Delila Frances, born 16 April 1881 died 8 March 1961 in Leuders, Texas; she was the wife of Linze Green. Richard Alonzo "Bud", born 2 February 1884; was never married and died in Albany, Texas. Deborah Jane Lynch born 23 September 1886 married a Mr. Schwartz. Deborah died 15 March 1962 in Anson, Texas. Benjamin Franklin, born 14 March 1889; married in 1919 to a girl named Allie. Ben died 20 March 1963 in Abilene, Texas. Sarah E. (Hodnett) Lynch Booker died on 14 March 1939 in Lueders, Texas. Sarah was married by 1900 to her second husband Elija B. Booker. In their household are Martin's four children listed above. They are shown as Booker's stepchildren. There are also two other stepchildren listed as Lynch girls. Matilda Lynch born February 1895 and Bessie Lynch born March 1898. Matilda could possibly be the daughter of Martin Lynch and born shortly after Martin died, but it is not possible that Bessie was a child of Martin's. The girls are not listed as children in Martin's will or later probate records. Allie, the widow of Benjamin Franklin Lynch; died 1972 at Dallas. She listed the brothers and sisters of her husband, she did not list Matilda nor Bessie. Martin Alonzo Lynch, Sr. died 20 January 1895 in Round Rock. He is buried in Old Town Cemetery beside his daughter Mattie. It is believed that his widow married again after the death of Booker.

Fred F. Lynch was born 12 August 1827 according to his tombstone and died 28 August 1897 in Round Rock, Texas. He is buried beside most of his family members one row above Nancy (Graham) Lynch at Old Town Cemetery. Fred and Martin Alonzo have not been found in the 1850 census records. It is possible they were in the gold fields of California. Fred married



Talitha Jane (Graham) Wolf and her sons: Calvin, Benjamin Franklin and Edward Wolf

William Perry and Martha Elizabeth (Sanders) Lynch

Mary E. Gunn, the daughter of G. W. and Martha Gunn; on the 26 August 1856 in Williamson County, Texas. Mary (Gunn) Lynch was born in 1842 and died in 1906. Known children of Fred and Mary were: Martha Jane, Alice Isabell, Mary Ann, James H., Francis B., Mattie Floyd, Thomas R. and Sam.

Benjamin Lynch, the son of James and Deborah; was born 1828 in Alabama. He married Mary Elizabeth White who was born 8 December 1842 in the Monitor community northeast of Springdale. She was the daughter of Hiram Carroll and Mahulda (Quinton) White and the granddaughter of William Davidson and Sarah (Adams) Quinton and Sherwood and Susan (Kendrick) White all of whom were pre 1840 Washington County settlers. This Mary was also the sister-in-law of Silas Mercer Holcomb the son of Rev. John Holcomb. Records indicate that Benjamin Lynch died in the Civil War. Benjamin and Mary had one son, Joseph Wesley Lynch; born 13 February 1864. (Reference - Hiram C. White family Bible.) Joseph and his mother are in the household of her mother in the 1870 census. Mary married Stephen Graham, the son of Levi and Nancy (Graham) Graham; on the 12 November 1870. They had two children, Robert Blake and Nancy Ellen who married a Mr. Stellman. Mary died after the birth of Nancy Ellen and by 7 October in 1877. This was the date that Stephen Graham married his second wife Sarah Ellen Hartley. Sarah was the widow of Jesse Yarnell and the daughter of Edward Hartley and Henrietta Hartley who lived in the Zion community. Stephen and his family moved to Weiser, Idaho sometime after 1882. He died there on the 10 of April 1922 of rocky mountain tick fever. His wife died 21 October in 1930. I cannot find Joseph Wesley Lynch after the 1870 census; perhaps he died but he was old enough to have left the state sometime after 1870.

William D. and Sarah Quinton have a five year old Sarah E. Lynch with them in the 1850 census in West Fork, Arkansas. Perhaps the unknown son born 1820-25 of James and Deborah Lynch married a daughter of the Quintons and both died and the child is being raised by grandparents. The Quintons settled in Springdale before moving to West Fork in 1843. This Sarah Lynch grew up to marry Nathan Caughman. No other data is known of this family. This first book of Washington County marriage records that deteriorated while stored in a cave during the Civil War would solve many of our missing family links.

Hiram Perry Lynch, the son of James and Deborah; was born in Illinois on 26 December 1828 according to his tombstone at Zion Cemetery south of Springdale. He married Millie Miranda Patton. Hiram died 8 July 1912. Millie's father is believed to be Jesse Patton, her stepfather was William Graham; the widower of Leah Bloyd. Her mother Mary was the second wife of William. Millie and Hiram, both stepchildren of William Graham; were married 1 June 1854 in Washington County. In 1857 Hiram filed the first recorded claim on forty acres, the NW 1/4 of the NE 1/4 of Sec 18 Range 29 Twp 17; in the Zion area. William Graham had filed on 80 acres in 1851 in Section 7 which shared a common corner with Hiram's property. Hiram served as a private in Company D 1st Arkansas Cav. in the Civil War. Millie and Hiram had seven daughters; Martha J., Annie, Katie, Deborah E., Lovey, a daughter age 6 months and unnamed in 1870 census, and Delana born 1872. Although the tombstone says Lovey Lynch, the carving on the old sandstone rock is primitive; it is possible her name was Lucy. Hiram and Millie raised only three daughters to adulthood; Lovey died at the age of 4 years, Annie was 12 years old and Martha died at age 24. They are buried at Friendship Cemetery near their mother's brothers who were killed in the Civil War. Delana, born 1872; married John Mankin on 13 November 1925. She died in 1929 and is buried at Zion Cemetery.

Hiram's daughter, Deborah; was born Decemher 1860 and died 18 December 1918. She married R. Martin Hartley, the son of John and Manerva Hartley; on the 14 August 1882. Martin died in 1884 and Deborah buried him at Friendship Cemetery. Martin and Deborah Hartley had only two children; Floy Ann and Bruce. Deborah reared her children in the Zion community, never remarried and is buried at Zion. Bruce Hartley moved to Missouri and married Rose Mack. They had one child, Harold; born 11 November 1907 at Bosworth, Carrol County, Missouri. Bruce died in 1908.

Floy Ann Hartley married Sterman Eidson in 1902 and their children were; Frank, who died at the age of fourteen; Wanocar died when 16 days old; Rosalee born 1 December 1907; an infant son born in January 1907 and Milburn Eugene Eidson born 24 October 1916. Milburn married Lucy Catherine Bishop, a great-great granddaughter of William and Keziah (Graham) Sneed.

Rosalee Eidson married Norman Edward Ivey on the 16 January 1923 in Springdale. Norman's grandfather, the Rev. J. Thompson Boyd; performed the ceremony. Rosalee and Norman had one son, Clarence Edward; born 22 July 1924.

Clarence married Phoenix Skaggs of Huntsville on the 4 August 1946. Their four children are: Edward Andrew, Carla Ann, Kent Alan, and Linda Arlene Ivey. Andrew married Marsha Taylor, a fourth great granddaughter of Rev. John and Dorothea Holcomb. Carla married Lester Wayne White, a third great grandson of William and Leah (Bloyd) Graham. Kent married Rhonda Schrum. Linda married Ricky Joe Smith and Laymon Faulkner.

Deborah Jane, daughter of James and Deborah Lynch; married Moses Graham on 18 November 1851 in Washington County. With the marriage of Debby's mother to Moses father in 1856; they also became halfbrother and sister. Mose and Deb had 12 children; Talitha Jane born 17 September 1852, Mary born 1854, Rebecca Ann born 1855, James Wiley born 1856, Edith Leah born 1858, Benjamin Wesley born 10 December 1862, Docie born 1864, Emily born 14 March 1865, Martha S. born 19 March 1867, Lucy born 1872, Charles G. born 1874 and Cleveland A. born 14 March 1873 who died 20 January 1886. Their daughter Mary never married and died in June of 1871. Deb, Mose and all but three of their children are buried at Wilson Cemetery.

In 1853 Moses's mother-in-law, Debby Lynch; deeded Moses the NE 1/4 of SW 1/4 of Section 29, Range 29, Twp. 18 in Washington County. In 1857 Moses filed the first entry on the SE 1/4 of SW 1/4 of the same section, range and township. These two transactions gave Moses ownership of 80 acres. This land is located on the south end and the east side of Fitzgerald mountain in the Monitor community. By 1870 Moses had moved his family to Cross Hollows in Benton County and in 1880 he was living once again in Washington County. Most of his descendants stayed in the general area of Monitor and with time spread eastward to Hickory Creek, Nob Hill and Pilgrim Rest communities east of Springdale. Talitha Jane married John A. Wolf, the son of William M. (born 1812) and Martha M. Wolf. John and Talitha had three sons: Calvin, Benjamin Franklin and Edward. John's birthyear was 1846; he died seven months before his son Edward was born. When Eddie was almost fourteen his mother married Silas Marion, the son of Nelson Reed and Susan Louisa (Landers) Graham. Silas was a widower; his father and Talitha's father were first cousins.

Calvin Wolf married Sarah Elizabeth Johnson, the daughter of Andrew J. and Louisa Jane (Trammell) Johnson. Calvin and Sarah E. did not have any children. Benjamin, who was nicknamed Dick; married Anna McGlone in 1893 and after having eight children died in 1917. His widow married his brother Eddie in July of 1818. There were no children by this marriage.

Dick's and Anna's children were: Robert L. who married Millie Mae Sizemore, Frank J. married Mildred E. Mulkey, Lillian married Ray Mulkey, Cora married John Carl Carney, Ivey married John Mulkey, Roxanna married Leonard Short. There were two children, Clide and Iris; who died as infants.

Robert and Millie had two children, Mrs. Howard (Thelma) Simmons and Vernon D. Wolfe who resides at Nob Hill. Vernon and his wife Hazel Sarah Bryant have two sons, Melvin Dewayne and Roy Laverne who is a Springdale paint contractor. Roy married Doris Middleton and Karen Sue Winters. Doris and Roy had twin infants who died at birth or shortly thereafter. Melvin married my daughter, Ricky Levirl Lynch and Janice Cozetta Graham. There were no children by Ricky's and Melvin's marriage.

Frank and Mildred Wolf named a son Perry Ray, perpetuating the Lynch family name of Perry. Perry married a local girl, Virginia Lea Areman; and moved to Gooding, Idaho. Ray and Lillian Mulkey had three children, James R. L. and twin daughters; Lora and Fredora, the wife of Gene Hulse. Fredora resides in Fort Smith and is a registered nurse. Ray and his son, R. L.; were Springdale building contractors. R. L. and his wife Peggy Gulley are residents of Alvardo, Texas.

Rebecca Ann, the daughter of Mose and Deb; married William M. Wolf. William was a brother to John A. Wolf, who married Beccy's sister Talitha. William's descendants have retained the spelling of the name as Wolf; whereas some of his brother John's descendants spell the name as Wolfe. William and Rebecca had seven children that I am aware of. Biddy Ann married Andrew J. Presley; Azehilla; Fannie Bell married Peter Lee Whittle; Tate married Nora Whittle; Burris G. married Cansadie Miller and Margaret known as Peggy, married Samuel Thornly Baker.

My notes indicate that William and Rebecca lived on the road to Mayfield. Many of their descendants are buried at Wilson and Joyce Cemeteries. Biddy Ann is buried at Sand Springs, Oklahoma. Tate and Nora had ten children, one of whom is Theodore R. known as Buck. Mr. Wolf is a lay minister of the Nob Hill Holiness Church. He married, as his second wife; Millie Mae (Sizemore) Wolfe. Millie had first married his second cousin; Robert L. Wolfe. Buck and Millie's daughter was Frances, the wife of Raymond Vernon Wade and Arnett Wilson. Their son, Elvon Wolf; is an employee of Laymans, Inc., he married Lois Dean Bowlin.

Ollie Ann, the wife of Frank McGarrah; is a daughter of Peggy and Samuel T. Baker. Frank was 96 on the 4th of July in 1988, he is a great grandson of Thomas and Rachel (Graham) McGarrah. Frank and Ollie's daughter Mary Belle is the wife of J. D. Mounce. Their daughter, Christina; died in 1986 and was the wife of Rudolph Frost and Harlan Mounce. The Mounce's are known for their brick and stone mason abilities.

James Wiley Graham, the son of Moses and Deb; married Zada Biass the daughter of Washington Armstrong Biass and his second wife, Mrs. Katherine (Bass/Biass) Hawkins. The surname Biass is often spelled various ways in the legal records. Some Biass descendents today spell their name as Byas. Records indicate that Katherine was perhaps a first cousin of her husband. James and Zada married 30 January 1884 and had eleven children. Oliver, as a youth drowned in War Eagle River; Oscar L. died 1954 in National City, California. Cornelia known as Nellie married H. Adrain White in 1906. Dallas married Mary Vaughan, Alice was a twin to Dallas and died when she was young and her brother, Walter, died about 1962 in Bakersfield, California. Elsie married Frank Adams and Delpha "Pete" Wilson. Flora married Mitchell Wolfe and Ray Skillern. Ray was a son of Julia "Fannie" (Lichlyter) Skillern of Washington County. Mary Madaline known as Maggie married Clark Davis Gordon. Mildred "Milley" was born at War Eagle the 10th July 1904; she died 1977 at Proctor, Oklahoma. Mildred married Charles David Sanders. Eula Edith married Charles Oney Mathis. Many of James and Zada's descendants live in the Tahlequah, Oklahoma area.

Edith Leah Graham, the daughter of Mose and Deb; married John Charles Ellenbarger in 1893 as his second wife. Their children were: Cora Jane, Daisy May, Bertha E., Mark, Winnie J., James R. and Francis Ellis. Cora Jane was born 1895 at Spring Valley and married Lester Downum. Dying in 1977, Cora is buried beside her husband at the Elm Springs Cemetery. Their children were Ellis Dee, Wayne, Bob, James Gordon, Cecil, Tommy, Reba Louise wife of Paul Alderman and Jo Dean was the wife of Carl Clark.

Daisy M. Ellenbarger married Paul Graham, a great grandson of William and Leah (Bloyd) Graham. Their daughter Ruby married Marlin Taylor; they reside in Ponca City, Oklahoma. Their children are Marlene and Robert, who is a gynecologist. Daisy's second husband was Ernest E. Marshall. Their children are Letha, wife of Russell Griffith; Earnestine, wife of Leroy Swaim; and James. Daisy May, a resident of a local rest home; was 91 in October of 1988.

Mark Ellenbarger married Nettie Gibson, the daughter of Littleberry and Cynthia (Johnson) Gibson. Their two sons are Roland Devere and Raymond. Roland married Ruth Ann Burrows, a third great granddaughter of Rev. John and Dorothea Holcomb. Raymond was born at Spring Valley in 1923 and married Juanita Bowen. They had two daughters; Gail and Rhonda. Gail married Ralph Parsons, the son of Jody and Mary Evelyn (Harp) Parsons. Gail and Ralph's two children are Eddie and Stacey, who was 16 the 29th of March 1988. Gail and Ralph are the fourth and fifth great grandchildren, respectively; of Peter and Nancy Graham.

James R. Ellenbarger was born 1904 at Maysville, Arkansas. He married Lizzie Redrick and Jessie M. Gamblin. Jessie and Jim had five sons; Jack, James Lewis, John, Joe, and Jeffery. Their daughter, Jerry; is the wife of James R. Mitchell. Jim Ellenbarger was an employee of Downum's Nursery. Downum's, for many years; was one of only two florists shops in Springdale. Jim died in 1972 and is buried at Wilson Cemetery.

Benjamin Wesley, the son of Mose and Deb; married Cynthia Ellen Graham, the daughter of Peter and Easter E. (Winningham) Graham. Both Benjamin and Cynthia were first cousins to my husband's grandfather Lynch. Ben's mother was a sister to Martin A. Lynch and Cynthia's father was a brother to Nancy (Graham) Lynch. Ben's birthyear was 1860, he died in 1941; Cynthia Ellen died in 1943 and they are buried at Wilson Cemetery. Ben and Cynthia had fourteen children: Marsellie Lowell, an infant daughter, William Tell, twin infant sons, James Franklin, Mrs. Otto (Esther Jane) Atkinsson, Horace Edgar, Wardie Lee, Otto J., Forrest Ellis, Mrs. John (Elva Mae) Turner, Alvis, Cordelia and Herman Sneed Graham. Herman Sneed died 1972 at Salem, Illinois; Forrest was a resident of Ketchum, Oklahoma and James F. was a resident of Tyler, Texas.

Docie Graham, daughter of Mose and Deb; married John William Wilson. John was a son of Hardy and Clarrisa Jane (Musteen) Wilson and a grandson of John Wesley and Rebecca (White) Wilson. His grandfather, John Wesley Wilson; was working in his blacksmith shop in the Monitor community when he was shot by bushwhackers on the 1st February 1863. The bushwhackers killed Nelson Reed Graham, son of Peter and Nancy; the same day. Wilson's wife and some of his daugbters dug his grave in the orchard behind their home and according to tradition this was the first burial at Wilson Cemetery. I believe that John's in-laws, Sherwood and Susan (Kendrick) White; who died before 1850; were probably among the first family burials. I have recently been given a zeroxed copy of Sherwood and Susan's family Bible records; I have written his name as Sherrod White in past articles, his name was Sherwood and he was known by the nickname of Slick, the name was mispronounced as Sherrod.

Known children of John and Docie (Graham) Wilson were Arthur, Doss, Ross and Garland. These children's names came from a family record in possession of Jo Ann Allenbaugh of Carson City, California. Jo Ann's grandfather, Joseph Wesley Wilson; was a brother of John William Wilson. Docie died in 1949 and is buried at Wilson Cemetery; if her husband was buried at Wilson the grave was not marked.

Emily Graham's son, Earl known as Dump; was raised by Emily's sister Martha. Emily did not have any children by her marriage to Francis Marion Anderson. Martha S. Graham married Andrew Jackson "Andy Jack" Graham, the son of Elizabeth Graham and William Watkins. Andrew's mother married Watkins in 1866 and had Andy Jack and S. Columbus. William Watkins abandoned his wife Elizabeth and their two sons and his three step children, Peter, Asa and Rebecca; after the birth of Columbus in 1869. Shortly after 1870, Elizabeth initiated her own women's liberation movement; she retained her maiden name and raised all five of her children as Graham's. Born 27th August 1837 in Taney County, Missouri; Elizabeth was one of four children orphaned shortly after 1840. She was the daughter of Peter Graham born circa 1808—1809 and the granddaughter of William and Leah (Bloyd) Graham. There were no children by Andy Jack and Martha's marriage.

Lucy, the daughter of Moses and Deb; married James A. McGlone after his first wife, Cora Howard died. McGlone was the son of James A. and Elizabeth (Currie) McGlone. Lucy and James are known to had seven children. The sons known are Perry, Elvin and Otis and the daughters are Isa May and Buelah. Perry lived in the Kansas City, Missouri area.

Charles G., the eleventh child of Mose and Deb; married Ada Estella, the daughter of Alexander and Susan (Davis) Gobble. Ada was born in 1875, both she and Charles are buried in Fields Cemetery at Grove, Oklahoma. Their ten children were Jolly E., Ed, Carl, Nellie, Mamie, Jewell, Fred, Bruce Elbert, Willie and Norman. All are deceased but Jolly and Norman. Mamie, who had no children; was the wife of Fay Anderson. Nellie died at the age of eight of severe burns due to her clothing catching afire. Norman lives in Washington and not long ago his son Jeffery assisted in the filming of the television program Alaskan Wilderness. Bruce married Leona Reynolds and had two sons, Dalton Ray and Willis Wayne. Willis Wayne was an employee of Cargill Feed Mill and died from injuries of an accident at the mill parking lot in 1975. Leona, Dalton and his family reside east of Springdale in the Nob Hill community.

Jolly, the first born child of Charles and Ada; was born in January of 1895. In June of 1919; he married a pretty fourteen year old lass named Nellie. Nellie was the daughter of Littleberry and Cynthia (Johnson) Gibson and the great granddaughter of Shaderick Gibson. This Gibson family was well known for their split oak woven baskets. Due to the craftmanship; the baskets are in existence today and sought by museums. Jolly and Nellie had ten children in a span of twenty-two years. Their children were Eugene Howard, Johnie, Roberta, Lavell, Cecil, Paul who married Carol Ann Ferguson, Glenn Allen, Lawrence. The two youngest children born in 1945 were twins; a daughter Joyce and a son Joy. Joyce married Joe Little and Keith Patterson.

Jollie and Nettie's second child, Johnie was born in 1923. When Johnie decided to put a ring on the finger of the young lady he wanted for a wife in 1944, he choose a girl new to the Nob Hill community. Lavaughn Edna Hays was born in Finley, Wisconsin. She had graduated from Plat, (originally named Windyville) Missouri and had moved to Nob Hill in 1943. Her parents built the Hayes Grocery Store in 1947. Her mother, Ella (Carter) Hays; taught school at the Hickory Flat School. Lavaughn, also a school teacher; retired in 1971 after teaching fifteen years at Evergreen School and nine years in the Springdale school systems. Johnie and Lavaughn added two sons to our Lynch lineage; Tommy Dean and Jack Leland Graham.

Five of Jolly and Nettie's sons; Cecil, Paul, Glenn, Lawrence and Joy moved to Easton, Washington. Their other three children, Eugene Howard, Mrs. Don (Lavell) Watkins and Mrs. Willie (Roberta) Sizemore; reside in the Nob Hill area. Willie is the present fire chief of the Nob Hill Volunteer Fire Department. This rural fire department is the only one in the county that had built and maintains three rural fire stations. They are the Nob Hill, Sonora and War Eagle stations.

Eugene H. Graham married Verna; the daughter of Henry and Nina Rose (Fletcher) Whittle. Their children are Janice Cozetta, David Howard and Donna Elizabeth. Jolly and Nellie are now living with their daughter Joyce and her family at Anderson, Missouri.

The threads of our ancestry are interwoven repeatedly with that of our forefathers who were among the first settlers of the Springdale area. Many of our young people will step into the Twenty-First Century with a blend of the lineages of the families who created our city of Springdale and settled the surrounding rural areas. The Lynch, Holcomb, Graham, Wolf, Fitzgerald, Lichlyter, Biass, White, Wilson, McGarrah, Kendrick, Gibson, Reynolds and Harp descendants will continue to multiply and all will contribute to the escalating metropolis of tomorrow.

Byron Franklin McAllister

Byron Franklin and Mary Cramb McAllister first came to Fayetteville in the summer of 1901. They had been living in Moberly, Missouri, for a year where B. F. practiced medicine. The previous winter was so severe that they decided to move further south. They had a friend whose family lived in Fayetteville who recommended the climate highly. Their name was Loving.

B. F. had quite a history before he was married. He was born in Millersberg, Iowa, which no longer exists. His father, a Civil War veteran, had opportunity to homestead a section of land just outside Concordia, Kansas, a French Canadian town with the only schools in the area.

When B. F. started to school in the first grade, there was a new teacher who could neither read nor speak French. B. F. acted as interpreter for the class even though there was one other English speaking child in the class whose name was Berty McCoy, who became the mother-in-law of Jim Reed, of Fayetteville.

A whole book could be written about B. F.'s mother who was 5 feet tall and red-headed. Incidentally, the Chisholm Trail cut across one corner of their farm in Kansas.

As is well known, those drovers now known as cowboys were a pretty rough bunch, so Sarah Jane Brown McAllister always carried a 44 caliber pistol, and knew how to use it. Her father was a West Point graduate and spent most of his life in the Army.

An example of her ability occurred one cool October day when B. F. was about six months old; she had left him asleep on a bed in the dug-out in which they lived for the three years before their first house was built. After working in the garden, she'd gone to check on B. F. Curled up beside him, seeking the baby's body warmth, was a rattlesnake. Sarah Jane raised her 44 and shot the head off that snake.

B. F.'s father, Able James McAllister, was six feet two, first a farmer but also served in the Kansas legislature four years and served a term in the U. S. Congress.

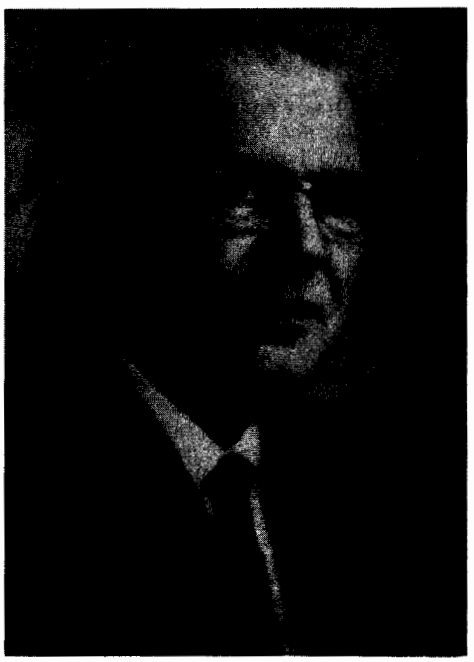
He claimed he didn't seek re-election because only a few men ran the Congress, and he figured he was just wasting his time. His son, Wilson McAllister, one of nine children, lost his life in the Spanish-American War.

When B. F. finished what would now amount to high school, he went on to Great Bend College in Kansas for two years. After he finished, he was considerably in debt.

A cousin of his named Joe Cheesman came through Kansas about this time on his way to Colorado to the "gold rush," so B. F. decided to go with him to learn about gold mining. They took jobs with a large placer mining operation.

Since all mining ceased in winter, most workers went to Denver to get summer jobs until recalled. Jobs were scarce, but B. F. went to Denver to the company office for which he worked and asked for any kind of work. They needed someone to guard a rich operation up in the mountains. He was told that he'd be snowed in until spring and wouldn't be paid until then. All the supplies needed for survival for the next five months were furnished him. The shack was well built with plenty of wood and kerosene for his lamps. For company, he was given a long-haired dog named Caesar and a burro. The only personal belongings he took with him were his clothes and a copy of Gray's Anatomy.

Spring was late that year (1896 or 1897), and B. F. was getting restless, so he left a little early. The nearest town was 60 or 70 miles by road but only 12-15 miles through a mountain pass. So, he and Caesar, his few personal things and his book, started out for town. Snow was still in evidence everywhere, and when the townspeople saw him coming from miles away, they expected an avalanche to bury him and the dog at any moment. By the time he reached the village, they were out in force, cheering him on as if he were a hero.



Dr. Max F. McAllister, MD, of Fayetteville, Arkansas - prominent opthomaligist, Civic Leader and decorated officer of WW II. Portrait hung in Washington Regional Medical Center honoring Dr. McAllister for service as Chief of Staff in the 1970s.

That pass had never been named, so the town named it McAllister Pass. Today an important state highway runs through it, but the map shows the name clearly.

B. F. went to Denver, drew his pay and headed back to Kansas for a few days before going on to Chicago to enter medical school. In those days there were dozens of medical schools in the big cities. He found one which would give him a student assistantship in anatomy, for which he received a small stipend.

Back then, after a two year (twenty-four month) course, you received an M. D. degree. B. F. was offered a good paying job as anatomy professor at Kirksville College of Osteopathy in Missouri. He moved there and taught for two years.

The school was so pleased with his work that they conferred a degree of Doctor of Osteopathy upon him. This is where he met and married Mary Cramb and, later that year, moved to Fayetteville after a short practice in Moberly, Missouri. He had no trouble passing the medical board in Missouri for his license, but it was to be a different story in Arkansas.

In the meantime, Joe Cheesman had discovered gold and acquired a large farm on the outskirts of Denver. He married and built a large brick farmhouse on the land but never had children. The farm was willed to the city of Denver and is now Cheesman Park, similar in size and type to Forest Park in St. Louis.

Not long after B. F. graduated from medical school, the American Medical Association was formed, and their first job was to eliminate many of the medical schools in the United States. B. F.'s graduate school was absorbed by the University of Illinois Medical School.

When Dad applied for permission to take the Arkansas State Board, he was denied on grounds that his M. D. was fraudulent, insofar as his school no longer existed. This ruling stood for many years because an influential but jealous Fayetteville M. D. was on the State Board of Examiners. Ironically, this doctor only retained his own license because of the "Grandfather Clause" act that otherwise required a person to be a graduate of a medical school.

B. F. and his family had a rough time those first years before Osteopathy was widely accepted. He'd have given up if not for his wife, Mary, who received a comfortable income from an aunt's estate.

Active in civic affairs, B. F. belonged to the only business men's club in Fayetteville and helped organize the Chamber of Commerce which would take the place of the Business Men's Club. He helped form the first Elk's Club and Rotary Club and though not a charter member, was the first Rotarian received into membership after their charter.

He also organized the Isaac Walton League of Washington County and later of the state. This group preserved fishing for the sportsman, not the seiners and dynamiters. The group was purely a lobbying group, but it paid off.

An ardent fisherman, he was reputed to be the best fly fisherman in northwest Arkansas. He died in 1943 while cleaning a catch of black perch under the old Woolsey Bridge on south Highway 71 with Mr. Abner Hurst (a Fayetteville lawyer). He was 73 years old.

Mary Cramb McAllister was born in Galena, Illinois, October 2, 1880, daughter of Oliver W. and Lidia Stevens Cramb. Rev. Cramb was a member of a well-known New England family, born in Maine.

His family moved to Boston when he was very young. Early on he had ambitions to become a Methodist minister and was offered a scholarship at Northwestern Methodist Theological School in Evanston, Illinois. He was in the first graduating class (mid-1800s).

He was assigned a small church in south Chicago where the wealthiest, most prominent people lived at that time—people like Marshall Fields and the Stevens family. The Stevens were distinguished by ownership in mercantile, hotel, banking and real estate as well as for their many philanthropies.

Lidia Stevens was a very religious young lady. She and Oliver had twelve children, eleven of whom reached adulthood. Mary Cramb was the oldest of the two girls, eighth of twelve children.

Due to Oliver's superior education, he didn't use the King James Version of the Bible for his sermons but translated original Hebrew volumes of the Old Testament or the Greek and Latin of the New Testament.

As pastor of the Methodist Church in Galena, Illinois, Mary's birthplace, a distinguished member of his congregation was Ulysses S. Grant, said to have dropped a $5 gold piece in the collection plate.

When elected Bishop of the northern half of the state, he and Mary moved to Missouri, but his health deteriorated and he resigned his position as Bishop and moved his family to a small farm on the outskirts of Fairburg, Nebraska, where Mary Cramb received most of her schooling. One of her classmates, Francis Schmidt, who was to become football coach at the University of Arkansas.

As his health improved, he ran for Congress and it was an easy victory. He, like A. J. McAllister, only served one term, disillusioned by the same few men who seemed to run everything.

On his last day in the chamber, he delivered a lambasting about the way Congress was run. Scholars of Congressional oratory said that his speech was equal to Henry Clay's or Daniel Webster's famous oratory.

Oliver left the farm to move back to Kirksville, since they had several children in school there. Finances had never been a problem since the Stevens family had written their wills in such a way to provide for the children and grandchildren to receive substantial checks from the estate.

Mary Cramb, after college, moved with her family back to Nebraska but didn't want to teach school. Becoming restless, she enrolled in and graduated from the College of Osteopathy. It was there that she met and married Byron Franklin McAllister. Three children were born to this union: Ila, b. June 21, 1902, Max Franklin, b. May 2, 1904, and Donald Byron, b. July 23, 1908, d. early 1950s.

Ila attended the old Washington School and Fayetteville High School, graduating in 1920. At the University of Arkansas, she was a member of Chi Omega Sorority and obtained a degree in Home Economics in 1924. After graduation she taught for three years at Marianna, Arkansas, High School and married Marvin Eugene (Buster) Newbern. He was a graduate of Washington and Lee University and later was a sales representative for their family wholesale grocery which did not survive the Great Depression.

Buster later obtained a job as a buyer of used school books for the La Follette Book Co. of Madison, Wisconsin. While he worked with universities in the northeast, Ila chose to enter Syracuse University in the field of Library Science to obtain entrance credits for her Masters Degree. After a year, Buster transferred to the midwest and sold to schools there. They moved to Lafayette, Indiana, and Ila entered Purdue University and received her Masters Degree.

Buster grew tired of travel and bought the book store at Arkansas State Teachers College in Conway, Arkansas. Since no librarian jobs were available, Ila assisted in the management of the book store until the State Legislature decreed that profitable college book stores should be operated by the state. The state, having already revoked some state bonds also appropriated the book stores at state institutions without compensation to the owners. Buster put in a claim with the State Claims Department and received $600 for merchandise and equipment valued at more that $100,000.

Buster died of cancer, and Ila resumed her teaching career. During World War II and for years afterward she taught in the Springdale, Arkansas, school system. Upon retirement, she moved to Memphis, Tennessee, where she lives with Marvin Eugene Newbern III, her son.

Donald Buron McAllister was a sickly child. He developed encephalitis from a smallpox vaccination and recovered, but he was left with a tic that caused an involuntary head movement. He was very artistic and mechanically inclined. According to friends and relatives he was quite resistant to having his mind changed once it was made up. A graduate of University High School, he attended the University of Arkansas Pre-Med for two years. He was a member of Sigma Chi Fraternity and was an excellent student.

His first job was with the Red Cross Drugstore, then the Palace Drugstore. A workaholic, he worked as hard at a soda fountain job as he did on his school studies.

The money he'd saved from working was used to transfer to the University of Alabama where he received a BS degree and honors in the Reserve Officers Training Corps.

His interest changed from medical to dental school and he graduated from the Kansas City School of Dentistry having Bess Meiser McAllister, wife of Dr. Max McAllister, MD, Fayetteville, Arkansas. This was made during her senior year at the University of Arkansas, 1930. Note the Sigma Chi fraternity pin. It was the fashion in that era for the girl to wear the pin of the boy to whom she was engaged.

roomed with Dr. Howard Henry, of Springdale, while he was in school.

After much investigation, he opened an office in Drumright, Oklahoma. While visiting Dr. Henry, in Springdale, he met Helen Hale. Helen's father was a Presbyterian minister and her mother was a correspondent for the Arkansas Gazette. The romance bloomed into marriage, and they moved to Sapulpa where he established a very successful practice. Two children were born in Sapulpa, Donald McAllister, Jr., and a daughter, Mary Margaret.

As a Reserve, Donald was called up early in World War II and sent to Alaska with a unit from northwest Arkansas. He was rotated home and assigned to West Point Military Academy for the duration. Donald elected to remain in the military but selected the Air Force rather than the Army because of a promotion to Major. He requested and was assigned as Professor of Military Science and Tactics at the University of Illinois (where his father had graduated). He'd requested the assignment because of the opportunity offered to take courses at their excellent school of oral surgery.

He developed an intense pain under his breastbone while eating lunch at his desk, and the head of the Department of Internal Medicine, whose office was next door, admitted him to the hospital suspecting a heart attack. Since it didn't fit the usual symptoms, a correct diagnosis could not be made in time to administer the life-saving treatment needed. He died at 4 p. m. that same afternoon. The Air Force pathologist's report revealed he had died of acute thrombosis of the pancreas, a rare cause of sudden death even to the present day.

Helen and the children returned to Sapulpa where she taught in the high school there until her retirement. At last report, her children have graduated from college, but nothing further is known.

This will be written in the first person as a contrast to the material preceding.

I was born May 2, 1904, in a house which has since been torn down, presently a used car lot at the corner of East Street and Meadow, across from the old Goodyear Store. Not long after, the family moved to a house at 216 West Dickson Street. This house still exists, but has since been moved to the next street north. A restaurant stands where our house did on Dickson.

As a child, my resistance was low and I was sick a lot, especially in winter. Many times, the result was an earache in both ears. This affected my ability to hear normally.

When I was about six, we moved again out on Washington Avenue. This house no longer exists, but Dr. Dorsey Jones' house is now on that lot. To the north, on the other side, was the old Bert Lewis home which still stands.

The Lewis family had three children; Helen, Herbert and Jimmie. Herbert was my age and we played together every day.

In the fall of 1910 we both were six years of age and ready to start school. Washington School was in easy walking distance from our house. That first day we started to school was one I'll never forget. We thought we were so big we didn't want our mothers to go with us. So we struck out by ourselves. When we reached Lafayette Avenue, we looked back at our mothers watching us. As we turned the corner and started down Lafayette Avenue, we started walking closer and closer together, and by the time we got to the steps and that long walk up to the building, we were holding each others hands so tight it almost hurt.

Our teacher, Mrs. Anna King, welcomed us and assigned our seats. She was a wonderful first grade teacher, dedicated and understanding.

That first year was hard, because I was out so much with earaches. The cotton in my ears, together with the infection, kept me from hearing a fourth of what was said in class, especially by classmates. I had difficulty learning to read; this bothered me my elementary school years. Now I know it was dyslexia, which plagued me until puberty. I never did learn to spell well, although in other subjects I excelled, particularly in Math.

High school was one of the high points in my life as it is with most kids. All the subjects were easy for me except Latin. I took first year Latin all four years I was in high school. Miss Naomi Williams was my teacher. She tried as hard to teach me as I did to learn. I'd go to her house after school even in summer. She wasn't required to tutor me, but she was understanding enough to realize I just didn't have the talent for foreign language just as others may lack talent to learn music or math or art, etc. She gave me a passing grade my senior year, or I probably would be there yet.

I played on the first school sponsored football team at Fayetteville High School. I had a picture of that team with its coach, "Speedy" Dunn, which I sent to Grant Hall at the Northwest Arkansas Times several years ago. Some of the members of that team were Herbert (Buck) Lewis, Elbert Pickel, Larry Nunnley, Dick Grabiel, Ralph Winfrey, the two Tidball boys and Johnny Waters.

The class of 1922 was an unusual class. Every member of that class, except one, went to college. That one was Wayne Wyatt, and he was the only one to become a multi-millionaire.

John Waters went to the University of Nebraska, and I entered the University of Arkansas in September of 1922, in the Arts and Sciences School. The dean was Dr. Droke. I took the regular premedical courses. The subject I enjoyed most was chemistry, and the professor who had the greatest influence on me was Dr. Harrison Hale. I was no scholar by any means, but I did manage to keep a "C" average.

During my junior year I suffered a ruptured appendix. In those days, before antibiotics, this was serious. As a result, I lost a year of schooling. The next year was just a repeat of most of the things I was unable to finish the year before.

My senior year was just a matter of picking up the requirements for graduation. I continued with ROTC, and was a cadet major of one of the battalions. The previous year I was honored by the ROTC by becoming a member of "Scabbard and Blade", an honorary advanced ROTC organization. Incidentally, I received my commission as a 2nd Lieutenant in the Army Reserve, Infantry branch, in 1926.

When graduation approached I went into the Registrar's office to pay for my cap and gown, diploma and share the cost of Senior Walk. I was told to see Mr. Fred Kerr, the Registrar.

A conflict between graduation exercises and an obligatory ROTC Summer Camp had required a written excuse from the Registrar's office to skip the graduation. I had obtained the signatures of President John Futrall, Dr. Hale, Dean Ripley and Dean Drake. The only signature I lacked was that of Dr. Kerr. I went to his office and was told that I would have to attend graduation exercises the following year before he would give me my diploma.

Continued conflict with Mr. Kerr went on. His unbending attitude prevented me from receiving my diploma because final exams in Medical School were always held during graduation week in Fayetteville. In desperation, I appealed to President Futrall, a long time family friend. He was indignant at Kerr's action, and after my witnessing a thorough "dressing down" of Mr. Kerr by Futrall, I was presented my diploma and warm congratulations by President Futrall.

About this time, while doing some research, I ran across a copy of the fully abridged Koran. I read it cover to cover, and with the abundance of footnotes at the bottom of each page, I really learned the workings of the Mohammedan religion.

I never realized it would ever do me any good, but during World War II, while I was in north Africa, it put me in a position of authority on Arab behavior and, later, resulted in a very important assignment for me in the whole of North Africa and the Middle East.

The Palace Drugstore on downtown Dickson was the college students' favorite "hangout." While there with two Sigma Chi brothers, C. D. Christian and Marcus Fietz, two very attractive girls came by. One, Rebecca Jackson, I knew, but C. D. introduced me to her friend, Bess Meiser of Paragould, who was attending summer school at the U of A.

It was love at first sight for Bess and me. I was so smitten, I hadn't even caught her name. I had to call Rebecca to get hold of her. Bess and I had a date that night and were constant companions from that time on. At summer's end we were engaged but reconciled to waiting for marriage until I completed Medical School.

Bess did wait for me, teaching school. When our senior class at Med School held a dance, I invited her down for the weekend. When she arrived with 3 or 4 suitcases, I thought it strange, but I didn't question it.

That night we never did get to the party and dance. We just talked. It was then I asked her to marry me right away. She said she knew that I would ask her, and that had been why she'd brought all her clothes.

The next day we got the license and made arrangements with a Presbyterian minister who was very much in the local and national news. His name was Hay Watson Smith.

I had morning classes, so we set the ceremony for noon. I left class early, drove over to get Bess and her friend Dorothy Flowers, who was to be our witness and Bess's bridesmaid.

We were a bit late getting to the church, and just as we were going in, Dr. Smith was coming out in gold togs and carrying golf clubs slung over his shoulder. We'd almost missed him, but with all the dignity he could muster dressed in knickers and sox, he performed the ceremony. I gave him the license and $10.00. One must remember this was the depth of the Great Depression.

As soon as the ceremony ended, I took Bess and Dorothy downtown where they had shopping to do, and I went back to school to a very important lab that I didn't want to miss.

Later, I picked up the girls at the Gus Blass Store, and then Bess and I left for Memphis. It was cloudy and dark and began raining, and rained all the way to Memphis.

My car was a Ford hard top coupe with a rumble seat and wire wheels. As a senior, I needed a car since most classes were held in various hospitals around the city with no shuttle service.

We were married on February 12, 1932, on a weekend, and that one night in Memphis was the extent of our honeymoon. We spent one day with Bess's folks in Paragould, since I had to return to school on the following Monday morning. We drove all the way back to Little Rock on unpaved roads that were nothing but mud.

Bess's friend, Dorothy, helped her find an apartment we could afford. It had no heat. We spent one night there before we found a better one with a very nice private bath and heat. We remained there until graduation.

Fayetteville was home until I had to report to my internship at St. Mary's Hospital in St. Louis. This was during the Great Depression and Bess could not find a job that suited us both, so she returned to Paragould and taught school in a one-room country school house.

I had been promised a residency in surgery by the chief of the department, but my honor and conscience deprived me of that residency because I was unwilling to falsify a diagnosis.

Three days before I was to complete the internship, Dr. Coughlin called me into his office to explain why he was unable to place me in St. Louis, but offered me an opening in Knoxville, Tennessee, at St. Mary's Infirmary. He said the training might not be as good as in St. Louis, but it was a first rate place and he advised me to accept. He said he'd wire them if I accepted, and I did.

That evening I called Bess and told her we were going to Knoxville. I doubt she'd ever heard of the place, but she agreed to get ready, since I was not due there until the 10th of July, 1933.

When I got to the hospital, I got the surprise of my life. It was brand new, having been open only a few months before, and I was resident MD. And, instead of the $100 a month I expected, the board said $75 was all they could pay.

The most welcome surprise was the doctors I had to deal with. I'm sure I learned more surgery in the time I was there than had I stayed in St. Louis.

Things developed rather strangely and slowly. The internists were asking me to see their patients in emergencies; the OB-Gyns did the same, so I was Jack-of-all-Trades. It was rough on me being the sleepyhead that I am, going to bed at one a. m. and getting up again at six a. m.

I completed my training at Knoxville and decided to try general practice in Fayetteville. Dr. Walker had died, and I thought it was a good idea to take over his office and add some new equipment to it. The office was upstairs on the corner above Lewis Bros. Hardware on the northwest corner of the square. I shared the waiting room and receptionist with Dr. J. Nolen Moore, a local dentist in his sixties.

That first year I never worked as hard in my life. There was no lack of patients, but none had money. In other words, had it not been for my family, we would have starved. With rent and three mouths to feed, I was actually running a free clinic. It was rough during that phase of the Great Depression.

I had a chance to go into State Public Health work, so I took it in desperation. I became Public Health Officer with offices located in Bentonville, Arkansas. I learned all the back roads and school houses that existed in Benton County from that experience.

I received a letter from the Army asking for doctors for CCC Camps. The pay would be regular Army pay. As a 1st Lieutenant, I jumped at the opportunity.

In the meantime, I was transferred from Benton to Miller County, to the town of Texarkana. We were there only a short time, I remember few experiences. I had applied for CCC because the Army pay was about twice what the state paid.

My application was approved, and I was ordered to Clarksville, Tennessee. We packed again and drove to Tennessee in an old second-hand "rattle trap."

We loved Clarksville and its people. I had a car assigned to me with a driver, and four CCC Camps to cover each day. It was pleasant work and rewarding.

Bess was pregnant most of the time we were there, and I wanted the best obstetrician I could find for her. I chose Dr. Milton Smith Lewis, head of Obstetrics at Vanderbilt Medical School.

On a cold snowy night, January 22, 1936, Max, Jr. was born. I managed to get to the hospital, but Dr. Lewis never made it. So, one of his residents actually delivered the baby.

I got some great training from that tour of duty. I was allowed to do all of the surgery, since the doctor who was supposed to operate only stood by and supervised.

After about two years in Clarksville, I was transferred to Jackson, Tennessee. We didn't care for Jackson. The people weren't as friendly, and my work load was heavier. With another baby on the way, I didn't complain. We wanted Dr. Lewis again. The new baby, John Garrison McAllister was born on February 23, 1939, in the same hospital under identical near-blizzard circumstances.

The Army sent me next to the Smokey Mountains, and it really was pleasant, except it seemed to snow a foot each night. But at that age, I really enjoyed it.

I was assigned a car and a truck, too. On rounds the truck could get to places unapproachable by car. Our living quarters were comfortable, and we made two close friends, a Dominican Priest, who was camp chaplain and Earl D. Sherman, grandson of the famous general who marched through Georgia causing such destruction during the War Between the States. It was liberal education to talk to these men.

Bess didn't do as well, because she had few friends or contacts with other women, except for the wife and daughter of a distant cousin of hers named Enroe, who lived in Waynesville, North Carolina, about 35 to 40 miles away.

I made an effort to get a residency in Eye, Ear, Nose and Throat about that time. I was turned down every place I applied except from the Veterans Administration. So I resigned from CCC and was told to report to Hines Hospital, Maywood, Illinois, a Chicago suburb. We moved our two babies and few possessions.

When we arrived, I was told there was no opening for an EENT resident, but one in internal medicine. Since we were already there, I accepted with the hope of an EENT opening the following year.

I complained a lot about being in a field of no particular interest, but before I knew it I was ordered to Outwood, Kentucky, to assist a surgeon in a tuberculosis hospital.

Outwood was well named. It was 40 miles north of Hopkinsville in the middle of nowhere. The advantages were being able to work with such competent and friendly people and being furnished a three bedroom house.

I soon discovered that I was not the only surgeon. The head of surgery was a giant of a man with a lot of chest surgery experience. He had an Irish father and a Blackfoot Indian mother. Originally from Minnesota, he'd played football (and been paid) and had gone on to the University of Washington to play football and to be on the rowing team.

Soon after this, President Roosevelt ordered a large number of Reserve medical officers back to duty, and I was one of them. This was in the fall of 1940.

I was ordered to Ft. Knox, Kentucky, to the 1st Armored Divison, then being organized. There were few there when I arrived and most were high ranking officers while I was a 1st Lieutenant. My job was office manager of the Division Surgeon's Office. I kept records and assigned new medical officers to their units upon arrival.

Major Holmes, division surgeon, was Regular Army and later became famous for founding the first MASH unit and for being the medical officer serving on the panel during the Nuremburg Trials. He took a liking to me and left me pretty much in charge of the Division Surgeons when he was away.

The ink was barely dry on the Declaration of War on December 8, 1941, when they sent me to Ft. Dix, New Jersey, in preparation to go to Ireland. The officers sent with me were Headquarters Officers under the command of Brig. General Lunsford Oliver, who was the oldest person in the 1st Armored Division. He'd graduated in the top 5% of his class at West Point, in the Corps of Engineers.

We worked together at the Norfolk House in London in preparation of "Torch," the invasion of North Africa. It was he who had me placed in command of the medical services for the invasion troops who went ashore along the Mediterranean.

General Eisenhower had to approve my appointment and called me in to ask if I could handle it. He looked me straight in the eye and said, "You had better be sure; for you are going to do it."

Since this theatre of war was considered British, we were actually part of the British 1st Army, but to clear the record - the invasion of Morocco was strictly American under General George Patton.

Before we left Liverpool for North Africa, General Oliver asked me to accompany him to talk to the British Navy people at Navy Headquarters in the Liver (pronounced Leever) Building. I was allowed to sit in on the briefing regarding the convoy. The meeting took place in a huge room filled with detailed maps.

Our ship was named the "Durbin Castle," and was the first fully air-conditioned ship ever made. It carried all the admirals and generals and their staffs. It was well protected by many cruisers and battleships, destroyers and small anti-submarine vessels. In addition, we had a British aircraft carrier.

Once out of Liverpool, we proceeded in a zig-zag pattern at a rather slow rate of speed. Though not the "point", we were the first troop carrier.

The night before we were to land, General Oliver told me we were going to rendezvous with a British submarine to pick up Col. Mark Clark and Col. William Thompson. Both men were fluent in French and had been perfect for their previous scouting mission.

I was the lowest ranking person on the bridge that night. Of course, it was pitch black, and no one could tell who I was anyway. We used infra-red binoculars to await rendezvous.

With the Mediterranean so full of phosphorescent algae, when the sub surfaced I thought for sure we'd alerted everyone. The water was lit up like the 4th of July, but it couldn't be seen from shore.

Few people alive today remember seeing this important bit of World War II history being made. Perhaps I'm the only one still alive who stood on that bridge that night.

While celebrating with food and drink, Col. Thompson came up, grabbed me by the shoulders, and asked "What are you doing here?" He'd remembered me from my ROTC training at Fayetteville. Thompson had been my instructor.

During combat my experiences were no different from millions of others. I made a lot of friends and, because of my job, just as many enemies. I've never worked as hard before or since.

I was lucky enough to meet many of the great names in history; General Patton, Randolph Churchill (son of Winston), Theodore Roosevelt, Jr., Wild Bill Donovan and Field Marshal Alexander of the British Army.

General Alexander bestowed on me the third highest military decoration that can be bestowed on a foreigner. I wore it proudly. I also received the Croix de Guerre from the Free French.

After the North African part of the war ended for the 1st Armored Division, I was made head of the United Nations Relief Occupation for North Africa and the Middle East. Though still in the Army, I was "borrowed" by the State Department for this job.

I was then assigned to Ft. Knox to write a medical field manual entitled The Medical Services of Medical Units in an Armored Division." Its number was 17-80, and the last time I checked, it was unchanged and still in use.

While at Ft. Knox, I was also ordered to inspect Medical Units that were to be assigned overseas. This job came with its own airplane, and there were few posts or camps I didn't visit during the time I served there.

When the war ended, medical officers were not allowed to leave the service because of the shortage of doctors to process the GIs who were being discharged.

After several months of asking to be assigned to a general hospital in order to practice medicine again. I was finally assigned to Moore General hospital in Asheville, North Carolina, and was able to practice medicine from Eye, Ear, Nose and Throat to general medicine and even internal medicine.

The head of EENT at Moore Hospital, nearby, was in a car accident, and I transferred there as head of the department. Almost half the patients at Moore were GIs being treated for "Jungle Rot" by a Dr. Hopkins, who'd been head of the medical school at Cornell University in New York. He was a genius at treating this insidious disease, and I learned a great deal from him.

I was so late in getting released from the service that most hospital residencies in St. Louis had been filled. However, I went to Dr. Leslie Drews and explained my plight. He took pity on me and took me on trial in EENT. I remained with him two years.

I then went into private practice with Dr. Seldon Spencer and Dr. Payne. Spencer's father had been the first specialist of any kind to practice in St. Louis and we still had his original specialist chair in the office, until Payne decided to modernize and threw everything out including the chair.

I retrieved the chair and kept it in my own office for 20 years. When Harvey Jones was equipping a doctor's office at his museum in HarBer Village in Grove, Oklahoma, I donated the chair, and it remains there today.

I knew all along that my goal was to practice EENT in Fayetteville. So, in the summer of 1950 we returned to northwest Arkansas, and I bought the old Williams house at Highland and Dickson and had my office downstairs. We lived over the office for eight years. While living there I served on the City council for ten years, was inducted into the Royal College of Surgeons (London), and was listed in Who's Who in the South, and took part in other civic organizations like the Chamber of Commerce, Rotary, United Way, Board of Stewards at the Methodist Church, Chief of Staff at WRMC, etc.

We bought three lots on top of Juanita Heights and built there. The nearest house, at that time, was a block away—no water, sewer or gas. I had to pay to get them connected. Of course, once I'd done the groundwork, the others could connect to my line without paying me a cent. We moved into our new home at 329 Oakwood in late December, 1955.

We lived there for 25 years, and that's where our boys grew to manhood. It was the gathering place for all ages and groups, it seemed. The swimming pool was put to good use.

When Bess's health began to fail, and I could no longer keep everything up (with heart trouble and leg-problems), I continued to practice but, finally, at age 75, I retired. We had made trips to the Rio Grande Valley where our boys had settled.

John G. had majored in English and Journalism and hated cold weather, so he moved as far south as he could and still remain in the United States. He was with the Brownsville Herald for two years before going into the field of education where he remains today.

Max, Jr., upon retiring from the Army after years of teaching computer science, went into the education field too, but specialized in Vocational-Education.

I took Bess to Houston Medical Center for an evaluation. As I expected, she had Alzheimer's Disease. Her mother had suffered similarly with the same thing, and Bess knew what was coming. We agreed to move to the Rio Grande to be near the boys. She preferred to move away from friends to spare them seeing her become like her mother.

I'd built a house on the Rancho Viejo Country Club ground years earlier and Max had lived there with his family. Since they wanted to move closer to his work, we moved in the vacated house and redecorated it to Bess's specification. She had around-the-clock nursing for a year and a half.

Her condition continued to worsen, so I made arrangements at a new Golden Palms Retirement Home, complete with medical facilities in Harlingen, Texas. I bought a one-bedroom condominium while Bess was under care in the medical section. She lived only four months after our move, until March 19, 1987.

I submitted to her wishes to be cremated. I brought her urn back to Fayetteville where she is buried next to her mother and father at Fairview Memorial Cemetery.

Epilogue: Because of the good quality of life in northwest Arkansas, many families of the military spent the WWII years in and around Fayetteville. All "war wives" made a tremendous sacrifice while their husbands were away. Raising a family on military pay, struggling with gasoline and food rationing was no easy task. Many women worked in defense plants, unknowingly, setting the stage for the future exodus of women working outside the home.

Bess McAllister, not being a native to northwest Arkansas, found friends in this group of war wives who busied themselves with war bond drives, Red Cross work and other war related activities.

Her relaxation was participating in music, bridge and garden clubs. She and the boys were active in the Methodist Church and other youth activities that were not limited by the war.

When discharged from the service, I held the rank of full Colonel. Now, at 83, I suppose I will soon join Bess. Our lives were quite full, and I'll be content to do that. There is so much more I could tell, but space simply won't permit.

William McClellan, Captain in Virginia Militia, Revolutionary War, was born in Virginia 1743. The family moved to Tennessee about 1787 - near Knoxville. He married Barbara Walker (in Virginia). They had nine children, all born in Knox County, Tennessee. William died there in 1827, age 84. Only two sons, John and William became involved in history of Washington County. John married Mary (Polly) Wallace, 1794. They had nine children, born in Knox County. In 1820 John took his family down the Tennessee River in flat boats to Somerville, Alabama.

William T. McClellan married Elizabeth Sevier, daughter of Governor of Tennessee in 1810. He and John both fought in the War of 1812. William was an Indian Agent. In 1825 he was appointed by President John Quincy Adams to locate an Indian Agency for the Choctaws in the Fort Smith area. He sent for his nephew, John's son Charles McClure McClellan who was a surveyor, to come and survey the area around Fort Smith. Charles heard of the beautiful country north of the mountains and after looking it over he acquired some land. He was first of his immediate family to come to the area. In Goodspeed History he is listed as an early pioneer. He is in the 1830 Census of Cane Hill Township. Though the first of his family, Charles was not the first pioneer to come to the area.

After the Revolutionary War pioneers began looking for places to locate. They came from Tennessee, Kentucky, Virginia, Alabama and other states down the Mississippi River to the Arkansas River. Then on to Crystal Hill and Batesville, above Little Rock. They heard that the Indians were being moved west from the land north of the river. They sent James Buchanan and Guilford Pylant to look over this area. They returned with a glowing report of the rich land, beautiful springs, good timber for building homes, flocks of wild game, fruit, berries, nuts — many things useful to the settlers.
